It was one of mother's "bad days," when all she wanted was to be left quite alone and to lie, perfectly still. So after seeing that the blind was drawn to keep out the hot sunshine, and that mother's pillows were as she liked them, Betty stole softly past the big grandfather's clock on the stairs—that seemed to tick, oh, so loudly this afternoon—to where Jackie sat on the rag hearthrug playing with his bricks.

There he sat so good and quiet that the idea of having "just a peep" at her new book entered Betty's head, and she tiptoed upstairs again past the loudly ticking clock, and crept quietly into the best bedroom; for it was in the top drawer of the great oak chest that Lizzie had carefully put away the book "to keep it out of the dirt," as she said.

The chest of drawers was so high that Betty found she could not reach to pull the drawer open. So she carried an old oak chair across the bedroom, and standing on it managed at last to open the drawer.

Her cheeks were crimson with all the excitement of finding the book and very quietly pushing the drawer in again. For mother was only in the next room, and Betty wouldn't willingly have disturbed her for half a dozen books.

By the time the chair was carried back to its proper place Betty's legs were trembling a little. So it was quite natural for her to sink down comfortably for a minute or two on to the big wide window with its great soft, chintz covered cushions.

And as she sat there resting she began to look at the pictures in her book. And the words under the pictures made her begin reading the tale to find out all about the people in the pictures.

So, of course, in about ten minutes Betty was lost in her book, and had clean forgotten all about Jackie and Willie and Lizzie, and even poor mother herself. As for the noisy old clock, she simply didn't hear a single tick!

The first thing that brought her back from tale-land was a curious smell—like something burning, she thought, and for half a moment she wondered if the farm-man was burning gorse somewhere out on the fields.

But the next instant a great fear seized her. Throwing her book down, she slipped off her shoes and flew in her stocking-feet down the stairs. The smell of smoke was terrible!

Yes, it was as she had feared! Jackie had been playing with a box of matches, carelessly left by Lizzie on a candlestick on a lower shelf behind the kitchen door. Jackie still held the matches in his hand, and was just going to burst out crying, but Betty shook her fist at him so angrily that he stopped to stare at her.

She caught hold of him, and ran outside and across the garden with him, and, pushing him into the hen enclosure, bolted the gate.

Then she rushed back to the kitchen, and saw that the smoke was much thicker, and that it was thickest near the window and by the table. Oh, it was the cotton table-cloth that had already a great hole in it, and the burning edges would soon burst into flame!

Water! She ran to the scullery, and there at the scullery door stood a man—a stranger—and one who looked like a tramp! P'raps he was a thief! But it couldn't be helped if he was.

"Man! Help me!" she cried, "the kitchen is on fire."

Instantly he seized the pail she had already in her hand, and filled it from the great pot standing full of well water, and strode after her to the kitchen.

Not an instant too soon, for the cloth had burst into flame, and was sending out thick clouds of thick, suffocating fumes.

The man at once drogged the cloth off into the middle of the red-tiled floor, and rolled it over and over, and poured water on it, and stamped on it, and finally seized it, still smoking, and dashed out into the yard with it.

It was all done so quickly that Betty could do nothing but just watch and gasp. But at last she found words to thank the stranger, who was looking at her in such a funny way, she thought.

"P'raps he's hungry," she told herself. "I'll give him some cheese and apple pie and a glass of milk. And I won't ask mother first, because she would want to know all about it, and would be dreffully upset over the fire."

So she asked the man if he would please sit down while she got something ready for him to eat. And he said he would like to go and give himself a wash, if she didn't mind. And she said she didn't, but was much surprised to see him go straight to the little back parlour, where, in a corner, there stood the washstand which mother always used when she was downstairs, and which father had made her have to save her from standing about in the draughty scullery.

Betty thought very hard as she laid the table, putting a nice clean white cloth on it. Every now and then she glanced at the stranger, with his ragged boots and thick beard.

"Shall I make the tea?" he asked. She had meant to put milk on the table, but she said: "Yes, please." So he put the kettle on the fire, and then, taking the tea-pot from the shelf, went straight to the cupboard and found mother's old tea caddy and put a heaped-up spoonful of tea into the pot.

By this time Betty's cheeks were scarlet, and her eyes were growing brighter every minute.

"Oh!" she cried suddenly, "I've left Jackie in the henpen. Will you go for him, please?"

"And who is Jackie?" asked the man pleasantly.

"Oh, Nellie's baby! Sister Nellie's

SOME WOMEN AND MANY THINGS

Victoria is following the lead of New South Wales and appointing policemen to do duty in Melbourne. As elsewhere, their work chiefly lies in the care of children and girls.

The women of Victoria are making their way on bodies formerly composed of men. A woman has a seat on the Melbourne University Council and another on the Board of the Botanical Gardens.

The Hon. Maude Laurence and Miss Muriel Talbot have been appointed members of the Advisory Committee in London to consider applications for exemption from expatriation. Most of the applicants are women.

Mrs. St. Clair Stobart's Hospital is doing splendid work in Serbia. She has instituted a most useful scheme of wayside dispensaries for the relief of the civilian population between Kragujevatz and Belgrade.

The most notable woman inventor in Australasia is said to be Mrs. Myra Juliet Taylor, a young widow living in New South Wales, who has twenty-four inventions to her credit, the latest being a "defence fence," which the Department confesses is what it professes to be.

It is said that a large amount of the success attending Australia Day is said to be credited to the shop girls in Sydney, who, despite their long hours and scanty leisure, turned their deft fingers to good account making toys, flowers and curios for sale on the great occasion.

Amongst the debutantes this year in London is Miss Joan Dickson Poynder, daughter of New Zealand's late Governor, Lord Islington. She is hauntingly pretty. Her main hobby since going Home has been swimming, in which she has won many trophies in competitions.

baby," she repeated with a quick glance at him.

"Sister Nellie's baby!" he said slowly, as he went out and across the garden.

When he came back with Jackie, who was quite friendly with him, the kettle was boiling. So the stranger made the tea, and they all sat down at the table.

Nobody said much, for the stranger was very hungry—very hungry indeed. Betty had to cut another plateful of bread and butter, and bring some more apple pie.

At last, when the plates were empty and there was no more tea in the pot, Betty slipped off her chair, and touching the stranger's shabby sleeve, she said:—

"Will you please come up and see mother—'cause I know you're Jim."

The man started and shook his head, and then asked her how she knew.

"'Cause you're so hungry. Father always said you'd come back ever so hungry—and you have. And you knew just where that washstand was, and the tea-caddy, and the henhouse, and—oh—everything! And I know for sure you're Jim! So do come and see mother! I think it will p'raps make her quite well again."

So the wanderer followed the child upstairs, and the mother opened her eyes to see a great bearded man at her bedside.

"Jim!" she cried at once, and burst into happy, healing tears.

And then they had a long, long talk, and Jim, with his arm round his little sister's waist, at last said:—"I just came to have a look at the old place—not to stop, or tell anyone who I was, you know. But Betty here, she found me out, though she wasn't born when I went away."

"And it was all through Jackie setting the cloth on fire that I wasn't afraid of you—wasn't it?" said Betty.

HOLIDAY PICNICS

IN SUMMER WEATHER

AMERICAN CHURCH SUNDAY SCHOOL

PICNIC AT SAN ISIDRO.

San Isidro was en fete yesterday, at least it had that appearance, when numerous groups of holiday makers drifted thither at an early hour.

It had been arranged that the American Church picnic should be held there again this year, and no more perfect weather could have favoured the outing.

Down by the river side, under shady trees, in the grounds of the Quinta Aguirre a day was spent which was thoroughly enjoyed by the many people present. It was possible to remark that for one cause or another many familiar faces were missing, but the large number present could not have had a jollier day.

At ten minutes past nine in the morning Retiro was left behind, and so numerous was the happy family that two extra carriages, specially reserved, had to be switched on to the train. The railway arrangements were splendid and most generous. The management, to whom many thanks are due, ran specials there, and back which pulled up exactly opposite the chosen site, and avoided an unnecessary walk from the station. The general arrangements were in the capable hands of Messrs. A. T. Nickson, Stanley Parker, R. Harrison, and W. L. Pritchard, who also officiated at the sports, which were a great feature of the afternoon.

The commissariat was splendid, and it was due to many ladies who supplied great hampers of goodly things that put everyone in the best of spirits.

After lunch the sports commenced, and races of all kinds were the order of the day. The results were as follows:—

1. Flat race, for boys under 8.—1 Teddy Westmorland, 2 Chris. Clark, 3 Howard Field.

2. Flat race for girls under 8.—1 Cecilia Heywood, 2 Gracie Storer, 3 Mary Nickson.

3. Flat race for boys under 12.—1 Fred. Heywood, 2 E. Clark.

Flat race for girls under 12.—1 Carrie Vam Domseller, 2 Annie Tibaldy. Flat race for boys under 14.—1 Robert Hopkins, 2 E. Maver.

Flat race for girls under 14.—1 D. Heywood, 2 Elsie Wright.

Flat race for boys under 16.—1 C. Turner, 2 A. Wright.

Flat race for girls under 16.—1 H. Saunders, 2 N. Arnholder.

Race for Ladies of the Church.—1 Mrs. Nickson, 2 Mrs. Storer.

Three-legged race for girls.—1 A. Tibaldy and D. Heywood.

Sack race for boys.—1 C. Turner, 2 E. Hopkins.

Potato race for girls.—1 E. Tibaldy, 2 Carrie Van Domseller, 3 H. Saunders.

Three-legged race for boys.—1 A. Wright and R. Hopkins, 2 L. Hopewell and B. Edwards.

After many a strenuous contest the sports were concluded, and Mrs. Boardman gave away the prizes amidst much enthusiasm. These had been given by Messrs. J. and J. Drysdale and Messrs. Harrods, and were immensely appreciated. And so the day wore on, under a perfect sky, and with a wonderful example of energy.

A short walk to the train was the scene of an incident which attracted much attention. A motor-car belonging to Mr. Frieche, of La Plata, who with Mrs. Frieche was present at the picnic, stuck deep in the mire at the roadside. A cart came to the assistance, and soon had the car out of difficulties, but not before the leading horse of the team (unused to cars in such a place), had precipitated a peon into the roadside ditch amidst much hilarity.

And so ended the picnic, to a repetition of which next year however, all are looking forward.

ST. ANDREW'S SUNDAY SCHOOL

The best of good fortune favoured the annual picnic of the St. Andrew's Scotch Church Sunday School picnic to Pereyra yesterday. Nothing could have been more generous than the weather, with the result that this coupled with the tempting beauty of the place brought out no fewer than 800 parents, friends and little ones.

All the Sunday Schools, those of the town, St. Andrew's, Constitucion, Barracas, Talleres and Temperley were fully represented and a most noticeable thing was the large attendance of parents.

For several years in succession Pereyra has been chosen as the happy play ground for this annual day of laughter, frolic and fun.

The estancia grounds which had been lent by Mr. Pereyra, were looking delightfully fresh in their spring colouring when the special train after an early start from Constitucion unloaded a joyful crowd at 10 a.m. Thanks are due to the management of the Southern Railway for stopping the train at the estancia.

There were many hungry little (and big) ones to feed at breakfast time 11.30 and the day of Wednesday was a busy one of preparation. No fewer than 220 dozen sandwiches, with cakes, hams, tea and a hundred and one other things were provided voluntarily by many lady members of the Church.

When the time arrived for breakfast, Dr. Fleming blessed the meal and festive were the proceedings until the time arrived for the commencement of the sports, which were to occupy much of the day.

One piece of misfortune was in evidence. The prizes for the events, which had been specially ordered from England had not arrived in time and so patience from the youth and prowess of the Sunday schools is called for.

Notwithstanding this unforeseen accident, the enjoyment was immense. All games were indulged in. Swings had been fixed overnight and everything prepared and well prepared.

Barracas and Talleres held a "lively" football match and much excitement was aroused when 11 engine drivers from Talleres challenged the world at a tug of war. Incidentally their effort to pull 25 at the other end failed.

The sports consisted of 20 items, races for boys and girls, 3 legged races, tugs of war, and in fact every possible event was indulged in. Barracas as usual won the tug of war.

Many thanks are due to the kind manager of the estancia, and his assistant, Mr. Castle.

Everything looked at its very best and brightest and the balmy air with the scent of eucalyptus did all the good in the world to the little ones.

The leading light in the arrangements was Mr. Montieth Drysdale, who with Mr. Curtis and Mr. Cameron acted as officials of the sporting events.

It was a great day and one which will not readily be forgotten by the dozens of tired and weary youngsters who arrived home in the region of seven o'clock.

A LEGEND OF THE RHINE.

(German bakers are now producing cakes with "Gott strafe England" on them).

Young Heinrich at the age of ten, An offspring of the Huns, Joined manly hate of Englishmen With childish love of buns; And so it filled him with delight When bakeries divulged A plan whereby these passions might Be both at once indulged.

In fervent love of Fatherland Young Heinrich swiftly brake The patriotic dough nut and The loyal currant cake; To guard his hate from growing less Through joy at this repast He saved—precocious thoroughness!—The "strafe" bits till last.

HOLY TRINITY, CHURCH, LOMAS

Saturday, Nov. 13.

Once again the children of the Holy Trinity Church at Lomas shewed their patriotic tendencies and kind thoughts for our fighting warriors by sacrificing what would have been a fairly expensive visit to some distant pleasure ground, and having their annual outing inside their own suburb, thus helping to swell other, and, at this time, more deserving funds.

The Committee of the Lomas Athletic Club most willingly lent their playing grounds and pavilion in order that the children might attain their object. The weather was perfect, and the pretty summer costumes of all the children as they gambolled about on the green sward made a very animated scene.

Sports were the chief item of the day, although naturally tea was also a "star" attraction. The children all voted at the end of the day that they had fully enjoyed themselves and this was confirmed by the look of content on each face.

Many ladies and gentlemen had generously contributed prizes and thanks are also due to Messrs. G. McHardy, and Dennchay and Co., for the special prizes given by them.

The ladies responsible for providing and arranging the tea were Mrs. Heywood, Wiggins, Mrs. Black, Mrs. Goodfellow and Mrs. Boxall, and the Committee are very grateful to these ladies for their kindness.

Rev. J. D. Morrow, ably assisted by the Superintendent, Mr. Boxall, was kept very busily employed throughout the whole day, but he expressed great satisfaction at the result of his efforts. The gentlemen responsible for the races were Messrs. Rudd, Cooper and Black.

At the close of the proceedings Mrs. Heywood kindly presented the prizes to the respective winners.

The following are the names of the prize winners:—

Girls race under 12.—1 Amalia Reynolds, 2 Ida Bruxley, 3 Georgie Cooper.

Girls race over 12.—1 Veronica Hughes, 2 Celia Ghirardo, 3 Kathleen Guyther.

SOLDERER'S DREADFUL DEATH

An appalling death overtook a luckless solderer yesterday, who was at work on a gasometer of the Compania General de Obras Publicas in Calle Tunuyan. He was using a self-generating soldering machine when a frightful explosion occurred, indeed, it is supposed by his lighting a cigarette at the flame. The poor fellow, Adolfo Siewert, a Russian, fell screaming, and it was found by his shocked workmates that his face was quite destroyed.

An ambulance from Comisarla 24 was requisitioned to convey him, still breathing, to the Rawson Hospital, but he was dead on reaching the institution.

He had apparently no relatives in the country.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

The last mails from England have brought full details of the vigorous fighting which took place in Flanders and Northern France during last month, and which resulted in substantial gains for the Allies. We are also able to present this week several interesting pictures illustrating the various phases of the fighting. The first gives some idea of the difficulties against which the Allies have to contend when they endeavour to make headway. In some cases the German trenches are reinforced with steel and concrete, and our frontispiece shows an armour-plated casemate for a trench gun, which, however, was destroyed by the violent bombardment to which the German positions were subjected. The French forces, as well as the British, took many German guns, a group of which are shown on exhibition at the Invalides. Many of the English papers strongly contend that the British authorities should follow the example of the French and let the people see the evidence of the prowess of their troops, but at present the people in England do not see such displays of trophies. The intensity of the bombardment of the German positions left some of the trenches just as they appear in the next picture. The following two pictures deal with the Balkans. The rest gives an excellent idea of the base of operations for the Allies, and of the country through which the campaign is now being waged. The companion picture shows the King of Greece on his way from the Royal Palace to attend the celebration of a national fete. A vigorous picture is that of a charge at Loos, the village which was captured by the British. At the moment the German trenches were reached, so the officer who made the sketch reports, there rose a shout of "Give them Hell boys!" The men who had charged to the weird battle-cry of "Marmalade for Ever!"—many of them had come from Dundee—obeyed this order ferociously. The last picture shows some of the men after the charge, wounded but smiling and happy.

Church Services.

The Rev. W. J. Sugden conducted the services at the English Church Hall on Sunday last. Mrs. Sugden and Mrs. Walters played the organ at the two services in the absence of the regular organist (Mrs. Talbot Wright) who was unavoidably absent. Intercession service was held on Monday afternoon at 5 p.m. for the soldiers and sailors engaged in the great European war.

Billiard Tournament English Club.

In the semi-finals of the Billiard Handicap held at the English Club Mr. Harris Smith defeated Mr. Ferguson. The final which was played last Saturday night between Mr. Harris Smith and Mr. Fowler proved most exciting only one point separating the contestants at 150. Mr. Fowler after a hard struggle finally scoring the 200th point first and winning the valuable billiard cue, kindly presented by Mr. T. G. Ferguson.

Spring Tennis Tournament Cordoba Athletic Club.

Several matches were played in the Spring Tennis Tournament at the Cordoba Athletic Club on Sunday. In the semi-finals of the men's singles M. L. Zimmer beat T. G. Ferguson, 6-2, 6-3. P. P. Schultz was successful against E. W. Marks 9-7, 6-2. In the semi-finals of the mixed doubles some very fine tennis was displayed. Mrs. Walters and Mr. Morton were returned victors against Mr. and Mrs. Marks by the scores of 6-1, 5-7 and 6-4. Now that the last of the football matches has been played the tennis committee policy request all players who have matches yet to play kindly to put in an appearance on next Saturday and Sunday in order that the tournament may be brought to a close.

The Tennis Team of the Club have been challenged to a match by the Cordoba Lawn Tennis Club, and it is expected that a contest of mixed doubles will be arranged to take place in the near future at the courts of the Cordoba Athletic Club.

The Cordoba Athletic Club have invited the Devoto Tennis Club of Buenos Aires to send a team to play against the local club.

Theatre in Prison.

The authorities of the local Penitentiary have resolved to instal a theatre thereat on the same scale as the prisons in the United States. A temporary stage was erected on last Sunday and the well known actor Pablo Podestá and Company gave a performance which was greatly enjoyed by all the inmates whose behaviour was perfect in all respects.

Beauty Contest.

A beauty contest is being conducted by one of the leading newspapers here and much interest in being manifested therein. It is almost impossible to buy a paper without finding the coupon cut out. There are about 100 contestants, the leaders being Miss Lidia with 1035 votes, Miss Carmen Diez with 1014, and Miss Rita Maldonado Ortiz with 700.

Football.

A very interesting football match took place on last Sunday afternoon at the Cordoba Athletic Club between the team selected by the league to play in the inter-provincial and international matches against Buenos Aires and Uruguay and a team composed of members of the first teams of the league strengthened by five of the General Paz Juniors who have re-entered the league after resigning just before the important matches mentioned above.

After a very spirited game the former team were victorious by 3-1. The excellent passing which was indulged in when the Uruguayan team were here was conspicuous by its absence. Instead of the players remaining in their places and waiting

INTER-TURKISH AFFRAY

AT NO. 4 DOCK.

By reason of its polyglot character the population of the capital is liable to gusts of feeling not to be generally encountered elsewhere. It is stated that some of the stricter Turkish professors of the Mohammedan creed have again demonstrated that they are zealous even unto slaying and started in to do a little massacring, on the Armenian model, on their compatriots who were either "Christian dogs" or of a more tolerant opinion as to the Prophet's Law. On Wednesday, one of the latter, during an animated political discussion damaged Yussuf Ali a True Believer of the strictest fold both acting as stevedores at No. 4 Dock. On November 12, about 11 o'clock however a body of similar contempters of all gilaours and accursed infidels collected near Dock 4 armed with staves, iron bars, knives and pistols. At first the police took no notice, until their excited and threatening demeanour rendered an explanation advisable. They then mentioned their intention of caving in the heads of the compatriots of the liberal fold, with all speed. Upon this Comisaria 22 turned out its guard and formed a line forbidding the Turks to pass. The latter who numbered some 150 men at first maintained their truculent attitude but the Comisario, a diplomatist, as well as a man of courage, pointed out the folly of resistance and they ultimately dispersed except 56 who were arrested, and gave up their arms. Among these were many formidable bludgeons, 15 huge knives, numerous iron bars, several pistols, razors and heavy sticks. The affair might, but for the good sense and firmness of the police, have turned into a very disagreeable affair.

for the pass, the whole front line seemed to rush forward in a group and attempt to score by a general onslaught instead of working the ball along by combination play. The defensive play of the local boys is always especially strong and I have yet to see a safer back in action than M. Unamünzaga of the Belgrano team who acted as Captain of the Cordoba Combination during the series of important matches which has just been brought to a close.

$3,000 Jockey Club Classic.

A large crowd of race goers attended to meet on last Sunday at the Hipodrome, General Paz. The principal event the Jockey Club Classic, 3,000 metres for a purse of $3,000 presented by the Jockey Club of Buenos Aires, was the race of the day and was won by Gleusman, Sir Florizel, the favourite, finishing last.

Summer Entertainment.

The Sarmiento Theatre and Cordoba Park will soon be opened to the public once more for the summer season. This year many of the features of the Japanese Gardens of Buenos Aires have been brought here and no doubt the new novelties will attract many people during the warm months.

Exposicion

The applications for exhibitors intending to participate in the "Exposición de Productos de Granja" which is to take place in the extensive building which has been erected at Sarmiento Park, will close on November 24.

Red Cross Funds.

The following letter has been addressed to Mr. A. D. Dunbar, Banco de Londres y Rio de la Plata, Cordoba, by Mr. F. H. Chevallier Boutell of Buenos Aires:—

Harvest Prospects.

Although experience has proved that in this district the farmer can never count on the harvest as secured until he has the money for it in his pocket, he has well founded hopes of a good thing this year when the prospects of a good yield and good prices are considered. Weather conditions could scarcely have been more favourable up to the present. Frequent rains and mists have supplied abundant moisture both for roots and foliage. The late winter, although it kept growth back in the early stages of the plant's new life, will probably make harvest later, and thus minimise the danger from frost that is so much feared at the end of this month and beginning of next. Frost, hail and wind and floods are the enemies ahead and against them there is no defence.

The white grub has again done damage in many districts. On the authority of one whose business takes him through most of the country districts, and who is in close touch with the farmers, the damage may be estimated at 20 per cent over the whole zone. Some, of course, have lost over 50 per cent. of what they would have had, whilst others are scarcely touched. Its ravages are worst in land newly broken up out of grass, or in badly worked land, and probably the only way of effectually combating it will be to fallow new land and work it all better.

If prices keep up, they will more than compensate the district as a whole, although individuals will be heavy losers.

Pastoral.

Feed is plentiful and stock in excellent condition. The wool clip has been exceptionally good. Pastoralists have had an especially prosperous year with a good lambing and high prices, never before heard of, for fat stock and wool.

The Annual Feria of the Sociedad Rural.

The Annual Feria, when stud stock, farming implements, machinery, etc., are on-exhibition and for sale, is the event of the year for the country community. It has been a success from every standpoint this year. Some good stock was exhibited, and found purchasers at good prices.

Amongst the best were those of Sebastian Costa, Manuel Hurtado, Puchuri, MacLean and Winks, Indalecio Mendiberri, Raimundo Piñero.

Sebastian Costa secured the highest price for a Clydesdale stallion at $1200; MacLean and Winks sold some good types at $550 and $750. For a Durham bull Raimundo Piñero obtained $3000 for a really good animal. In Lincoln sheep $1500 was the highest figure quoted, Sebastian Costa again making the best sales. Indalecio Mendiberri secured $700 and $325 for some of his, and MacLean and Winks sold some typical thick set, well woolled progeny of New Zealand rams at $450 and $500.

Tres Arroyos is noted for its inventors, and this year there were some new inventions on show. Istilart and Cia exhibited a patent race for carrying sheep forward into the dip. It consists of a moving footboard after the style of the elevators of a threshing machine, made to revolve by horse power. The sheep on entering the race are thus carried forward whether they like it or not, to their bath. Sheep men showed considerable interest in the invention, and several sales were made.

Another ingenious invention is a machine for the classification of grain. It does not work by riddles as of old, but air suction draws or blows all the grains below a certain weight out from the rest. The invention is the result of the constant fighting between buyers and sellers as to the standard weight of the grain, and is meant to prevent the exploitation of which many farmers consider themselves victims on the part of the buyers. It can be attached to any kind of thresher, and it is claimed will thoroughly clean and classify the grain without any loss of time. Sres. D'Alessandro y D'Giani are the inventors and José D'Marco the local agent.

The new thing in machinery that attracted most attention of the public, however was a flour mill, suitable for an estancia or farm, of N. American origin, and exhibited by the International Harvester Co. It is simple and cheap, and is worked by the same motor or engine used for shearing, pumping water, corn crushing, etc.

Another N. American novelty was a sheep shearing machine (á nafta) for one or two shearers, suitable for small farmers.

New and Extensive Machinery Works.

Rumours have been abroad that enterprising local men intended establishing machinery works on a large scale in Tres Arroyos. Istilart y Cia are widely known for their works, which give employment to so many men. The "Herald" correspondent therefore interviewed Sr. Istilart, who at once confirmed the rumour. "We can bring the raw material to Bahía Blanca at a low freight in normal conditions, as many grain boats come in ballast only," he said. "We can secure cheap labour during 8 or 9 months of the year, because in the district the harvest and shearing hands find it difficult to secure employment in anything else. We have petroleum from Rivadavia, which is a truly economical fuel. And then we have to look after our own interests. Supposing the United States were at war with some naval Power, how would we gather in our harvest? We have had a lesson, and must develop local industry. Further, I have discovered that many of the young Argentines have a mechanical turn of mind, and only need leadership to do something worth while. It is true arrangements are on foot to commence something on a big scale, to include the manufacture of all kinds of farming implements and machinery."

Argentina needs a few thousand Istilarts.

Street Paving.

After all, the protest of the property owners of Boulevard Moreno has been of value, although legally they lost their case when presented to the Supreme Court asking that the contract for paving the street with asphalt be annulled. It has been annulled, for our principal street is now being paved with ordinary granite blocks. It will be a great improvement, as the unpaved streets have been in an awful condition. The municipality has done excellent work in levelling the streets during the winter and spring, thus giving employment to a number of men and improving considerably the town.

DRUNKEN MURDERER

SHOOTS MAN FOR WAKING HIM.

The danger of drunken brutes being permitted to carry firearms has been again exemplified in the case of Eulogio Marmol, who having got into a condition of bestial intoxication, was sleeping on a table at the Bar de Portones, 4180 Santa Fe, on Thursday. Being awakened about 3 a.m. by the chief mozo Bonaclini, who knew him and tried to induce his peaceful departure, Marmol drew a pistol and shot the former fatally, as the unfortunate man died at the Juan Fernandez Hospital. These German manners require severe repression, and a few cases of hanging murderers would be the best treatment.

THE TURF

PALERMO

What happened to the races, or rather at the races, at Palermo on Sunday is difficult to say. Not that the public suffered any more than is usual, because when favourites did not roll up they were there or thereabouts in every race except the second, but the point of the meeting was the running of one or two horses who ought to have got home whether favourites or not favourites.

The classic may be practically ignored. Digital won, after dominating her adversary from start to finish and making her look somewhat like the "donkey on the sands."

It is useless to criticise La Nitita, except to say she could not have done better. Just a few people (some $7000 worth of them) were foolish enough to forget that she was "out for her feed" in that the second prize realised $1500.

It is difficult ever to impress these items on the Palermo public.

The event was one utterly without colour or interest.

In our opinion Cardoso has certain things to explain concerning Sunday. Ermita utterly failed even to get a place in the first event, which is utterly ridiculous and incidentally a scandal. If it were true that the mare was off her feed and not fit, why was she run? Once before the exact opposite was recorded, when fit and well (as proved by her immediate subsequent running) she was withdrawn even after money had been played on her. This was at the official veterinary surgeon's mandate. It was a heavy track and rainy day!

We can understand her being beaten, but not even a place amongst the class of this particular race — whew! It must have been a case of Daniel in the lion's den. Riparia won $14.65 from Joli Jeu $26.65 and La Brava $8.15. 'Nuff said.

How Ficara won the second event on past running is beyond comprehension. Admittedly there was but one filly (perhaps two) which was any good on past running, but the "good" was knocked out of her by a length and a quarter and to the tune of $57.90. Now by all that is reasonable how did Ficara beat Hnarmi?

We will explain how she did it. Since February 7 she had run seven times up to Sunday, and on some occasions had less to beat than then. In each event she has come somewhere, which means nowhere not even fourth. Hence she won. See? It is so simple, so ridiculously simple, both arithmetically, geometrically and progressively. Can't you see it? Not yet? Well remember in future that 7 noughts into the eighth run equal $57.90, and then you have it! Sounds something like logarithms or trying to square the circle, doesn't it? And this in fact it really is. And so to the third event won fairly and squarely in a hack canter by Polavieja.

El Principe surprised somewhat by beating Pico de Oro out of second place by a neck, but these occurrences are natural.

Fandango ran like a goat and Mogador did not run at all. He ambled.

There was nothing in the fourth race to annoy the "talent" except that Velasquez ran "stiff." Congrio won on his merits, but only by a head from El Tony, who was well enough in at the weights. Solis disappointed and we now regret that we trusted him. When again ready to pay $33 Solis will win alright.

The remaining events after the classic were good, fair, reasonably and sporting.

Sombrio proved himself a bit better than his last outing declared or put it that Nitrate proved himself a bit worse than expected, but one cannot expect everything right, and after a 57 dollar "touch" Navarro must have been tired. Sombrio's win was quite reasonable, and so were both the placed horses, Bizet and Cracker.

Don Federico, although a hot favourite, ran nowhere, but why on earth was he a favourite? He has done absolutely nothing to justify it, particularly against the "set" he met in this race.

It is as well to remember that the youngsters are now coming to handicap class and that it is necessary to jog up a bit and reckon with them from a different standpoint.

Another thing, the race season is over and "back end" racing is very deceptive. If you do not believe this statement, there is little doubt that Señor Cardoso, who knows much more than we do, will give you, from his experience, his opinion.

That Last Reason could win the seventh race was no surprise was shewn by the fact that he was practically joint favourite with Retrechero who is still running. Aguerido ran second and La Sonambula third. This is the whole race in a (k)nutshell.

Siskin won the last race from Folleto and Prologo and the only point of interest was Calambour's running. He was the favourite of the public and the particular favourite of the "talent," who did not (perhaps they do now) realise that Calambour has gone off very much. He needs his stable for several weeks even more so than La Nitita. Prologo too is a different beast than he was a short time ago.

There are others—several of them—who should not be running at Palermo to-day. To mention a few that appeared on Sunday.

Debutante, Tata Dios, Asia and perhaps Campesino. For the moment they are done. Having earned their "little bit of corn," at least as much as is likely at Palermo at the moment, why not rest them and save entrance and public money?

So much for Sunday's racing.

LA PLATA

The racing at La Plata on Sunday provided some excellent sport and the only mistake the public made was to forget Old Maid and India Brava II., which was a most unreasonable thing to do considering the manner in which the daughter of Old man has run at Palermo.

The public had an excellent day generally both with their sport and the weather, but many of them were "holding up" for the big meeting on Friday, Nov. 19, which will be one of the best meetings for entries ever held at the old provincial capital.

Many "hot things" are going and Palermo horses are taking part in the races to such an extent that some old La Platitas will have to jog their memories and refrain from sticking to the old favourites down there or else will lose their money.

Sunday's results were as follows:—

SMASHER

A SUCCESSFUL OPERATION.

Smasher has been operated upon and from information obtained yesterday afternoon, it is stated that this famous race horse is progressing favourably.

The operation, which consisted of the amputation of the injured parts of the off hind leg, was performed by the veterinary surgeons Doctors Cassai and Bossio. Naturally, the greatest aseptic and antiseptic precautions were taken and the operation was completely successful. More than that Smasher has progressed favourably since.

It is yet much too early for any statement to be made as to the ultimate value of the operation or even to go so far as to suggest that Smasher is over the worst.

In medical and veterinary parlance the meaning of a "successful operation" is totally different from the construction the average lay mind puts upon the term.

From information received yesterday afternoon he is taking his food well and moving about his box seemingly none the worse.

The question of an apparatus to take the place of the amputated leg and foot, is now exercising the minds of the veterinary surgeons.

Dr. Lerro has submitted a model which he believes will prove effective and at present a proper sized pattern of this model is being manufactured.

It would indeed be a matter for much congratulation should Dr. Lerro's apparatus prove successful.

CYCLIST KILLED BY TRAM

VICTIM OF IMPRUDENCE.

Cycling in the centre of the capital is a peculiarly dangerous form of locomotion. To the inexpert it is little better than suicide and the guard and motorman of a car which knocked down Jesus Puis on Sunday at the corner of Suipacha and Viamonte have been released.

The unfortunate was actually learning to ride and, choosing the frequent spot indicated for practice, fell a victim to his own imprudence.

BASEBALL

ARMOUR v. LA PLATA.

(Contributed.)

Well kind friends in the words of San Martin "we met the enemy and we made him like it."

Those Armour boys christened Finney field with the tears of the famous La Plata team headed by the far famed Schick and sad to relate kind friends, the loyal rooters of the La Plata crowd were witnesses.

We like Schick and everything he offers. He showed he is a good game fellow and that very few go aloft with better grace. The score 29 to 6 tells a tale, and establishes the Armour team in a position as leader from which it will take a lot of good playing to shift them. Lopez who took the mound for Armour introduced himself to the La Plata boys by whiffing their leader with the ash, and from that time until the eighth innings, when Captain Gottman sent him out to right garden because he wanted to introduce another of his string of boxmen. He fed those heavy hitters a mixed diet with a smile that would not come off. Well you know how it is when a batter with a respectable past walks up, and Lopez smiles upon him, why he feels happy, that smile looks good to him, but when he swats space three cruel blows, and then receives that smile—well he does not like it.

Mr. Wilson who officiated in the last two stanzas, can close up a performance with an artistic touch. He drew the curtain, by issuing a ticket good for one trip by the S.O. line to the last La Plata batter. The weather was real baseball weather, piping hot.

Umpire King announced just before the battle that a La Plata merchant offered a straw hat to the first man on either team who would score a home run. Strange to say that although 38 runs were scored during the game there was not a real "homer" in the lot. Jack Stratton drew a through ticket, but forgot to touch one of the stations. So the hat still remains a trophy.

Manager Parks, Captain Gottman and Catcher Galloway of the Armour team are well pleased with the result. The following is the box score of the game:—

THE LEAGUE

QUILMES v. BELGRANO.

This fixture postponed from October 24 was played at Quilmes on Saturday.

Play could not possibly have been closer on in general more evenly contested.

Quilmes won the match by 5 matches to four, but as is somewhat extraordinary, they lost the majority of games by a substantial margin. The sets turned out exactly even, each side winning 10.

This result is a most exceptional one in the tennis world.

The play was as follows:—

Belgrano A. C.

Prescott and Smyth beat Hetley and Hoare, 6—1, 6—3; Crispin Bros., 6—3, 6—4; Mackill and Bell, 6—0, 6—0.

The result of the tournament was that about $150 will be handed over to the Red Cross Funds.

Miss Griet and Mr. J. E. Forsdike won the Tournament with a score of 68, while Miss M. Casares and Mr. Lush tied with Miss R. Pelliza and Mr. Pratt for second place with a score of 65.

CRICKET

BELGRANO v. BUENOS AIRES.

Cricketers are just beginning to get their hands for the coming season, and several friendly games were played on Sunday. Belgrano journeyed to Palermo and scored a comfortable win in a friendly with the B. A. Club.

The weather was perfect, and considering also that the wicket was in good trim, it is rather surprising that no large scores were registered. Belgrano, batting first, were dismissed for a fair total of 165, the top scorers being Palmer with 43, and Dorning 33. G. Brandon had the best bowling figures with 4 wickets for 49.

With the exception of George Brown, Horton, Sheridan and Brandon, B. A. fared very badly, and were all out for 129, thus leaving Belgrano winners of a pleasant game by 35 runs.

The 34 registered by G. G. Brown was the highest score. Dorning bowled very well, and captured 4 for 38.

The details of play are as follows:

BUENOS AIRES 2nd v. LOMAS 2nd.

This game, played at Lomas on Sunday, ended in an easy win for the visitors, who, thanks to Hussey, who scored 63, and G. Langfield 75, knocked up a goodly total of 210. McGaul for Lomas played a fine innings of 57, but with these exceptions there was but little else doing.

Apart from Langfield's fine innings, it was also his day out with the ball. He captured 8 wickets for 72.

Finally B. A. won by 83 runs.

HURLINGHAM v. SAN ISIDRO.

Another friendly was played at Hurlingham against San Isidro, the visitors, who turned up short.

Hurlingham batted first and knocked up a whacking score of 356 for 6, out of which W. W. Gardom, the captain, claimed 97 not out, and C. T. Mold 78. M. W. Jackson was another to pass the half century.

With this rather tough proposition against them San Isidro went in to bat, and considering everything, played well and pluckily. C. F. Lacey was the only man of the side, however, to reach 50. The innings closed for 122. R. Stuart got 5 wickets for 37, which was a creditable performance.

WESTERN TELEGRAPH v. BELGRANO 2nd.

An enjoyable friendly match was played on Sunday at Belgrano, when the Western Telegraph Co. were the guests and incidentally the winners by 25 runs.

The visitors batted first, but with the exception of Langston and Holloway were not successful. The final total of 98 looked tempting for the homesters. They fared, however, even worse and were all out for 73, with W. A. Watson top scorer with 27 to his credit. Although the play was not of a high order, it was a most enjoyable game, played in perfect weather conditions. The final scores were:

TIGRE REGATTA

SUNLIT WATER, BUNTING,
GOOD RACING

PRETTY GIRLS AND FROCKS

One realised on such a day as Nov. 11 that there the name Henley of South America is not inappropriate to Tigre on Regatta Day.

The weather indeed was ideal, warm and sunny yet not exhaustingly hot; with a pleasant breeze which rippled the water without making it choppy. As usual the river was crowded with craft, ranging from the Rosario and Parana, Tritons among the fluvial minnows down to the frail pointed single scull outrigger the very minimum which will support man on the surface. And there were handsome motor boats, motor house boats and yachts of all sizes and small boats of all colours, yellow, rose, red, blue, purple, pink, green, brown, white and black while every staff and set of halyards streamed bunting among which it was pleasant to observe that the Allied colours largely outvied the red, white and black.

It may here be observed that there is notable a yearly improvement both in punctuality, very good indeed this year and in the good order observed on the course, which indeed was no place for small craft even after the competing boats had passed, with half a dozen powerful motor boats charging up stream, each with bone in her mouth and kicking up a big stern wave. There were however no casualties. The Presidential party watched events from the decks of the Rosario moored opposite the Tigre Hotel while banks landing stages and everything else were covered with spectators.

The first Race, Junior Fours, "Premio Ferro Carril Central Argentino," for outriggers and coxswains, over 1500 metres was contested by Club Hispano-Argentino, Rosario Rowing Club, Campana Boat Club and Scandinavian Rowing Club. All started well but Campana Boat Club. The Campana boat fell out of the race early. After a close race between the remaining three contestants, Rosario Rowing Club crossed the line first in 5min. 43sec. with the Scandinavians second.

Second Race, 1500 metres, Senior Double Sculls, "Premio Club de Regatas de Avellaneda," was won by Scandinavians after a well rowed race and a close finish by one length in 6min. 12secs.

Third Race, 1500 metres, "Junior Fours B," was contested by only San Nicholas and Canottieri Italiani, the other four entries not appearing. Canottieri hugged the right side rather closely and got embayed at the bend under the counter of a police steamer, San Nicholas winning by a length in 6min. 48secs.

Fourth Race, 1000 metres, Junior Single Sculls; "Premio Compania de Seguros"; Canottieri Italiani, Rowing Club Argentino and Club Nacional de Regatas de Montevideo took part, the latter's representative, D. Artagaveytia winning a very popular victory by 2 clean lengths in 4min. 27 seconds.

Fifth Race, 2500 metres; Senior Fours, "Premio Copa de America," was an easy win for Buenos Aires Rowing Club, none of whose opponents appeared; time, as you please.

Sixth Race, 1500 metres; Senior Single Sculls, "Premio Tigre Boat Club," was another walk over, this time for Alfredo Rumbado, Club Regatas Hispano-Argentino, no rival appearing.

Seventh Race, 1500 metres; "Premio Ministro de Marina"; 12 oared man-o-war galleys. This race excited great enthusiasm. There entered the Escuela de Grumetes, Cruiser 25 de Mayo, Depósito de Marinerías and the armoured gunboat Rosario, Crews from the Torpedo School and the gunboat Patagones had been knocked out in the preliminary races. Starting with a short fast stroke the Rosario began as usual to forge ahead

--THAT SIGNATURE!

From the American Banker is extracted the following pathetic poem; its sentiments will doubtless find an echo in the depths of many a business man's heart:

Some unknown friend sat down and wrote

To me a kind and pleasant note,
His sentiments were mighty sweet
His penmanship was plain and neat
Until he tried to write his name,
And then a fit attacked his frame,
He must have suffered fearful pain
To make a drawing so insane;
Methinks I see him paw the air
And bite the rungs out of his chair!
I only hope that some kind soul
Was there to push him with a pole
Into the ice chest—there to lie
Until the fierce attack passed by.
How sad it is so many men
Climb up and ride upon a pen,
And splatter ink and bust their hames
When they attempt to sign their names!

The note to which I have referred—
Could anything be more absurd
I've studied it with tears and groans,
Sometimes I think the name is Jones—
And then again, I'd say it's Brown,
With sundry letters upside down.
Perhaps it's Smith—it may be Duff,
I give it up! I've toiled enough!
There ought to be some chloride cures
For men with dizzy signatures.
They make the angry passions rise,
They bring hot water to the eyes,
They waste the time of busy men
By their gymnastics with the pen."

(they won last year) and very speedily a foul between the Escuela de Grumetes and the 25 de Mayo, disqualified the first-named. The race was restarted and fought out with great determination and excitement among the spectators. As the boats approached the winning post and the Rosario, the latter's rigging, funnel, ventilator and tops were seen to be covered with waving arms and when the Rosario's went in first again their shipmates sent up a great shout. Time 6min. 55secs.

Eighth Race, 1800 metres; Senior Pair Oars, "Premio Ruderverein Teutonia," was won by Club Canottieri Italiani against Hispano-Argentino in 6m. 38secs.

Ninth Race, 2000 metres, was a finely rowed race. It was Junior Eights, "Premio Club de Regatas Hispano-Argentino"; all four crews, La Marina, Hispano-Argentino, Canottieri Italiani, and Campana Boat Club seemed in good training. After a severe struggle Campana shot in ahead by four lengths with Marina second. They deserved their victory and their style as far as one could gather looking through a forest of legs, flags and bodies was excellent; time 7min. 15 seconds.

Tenth Race, 1000 metres; Novices Fours, "Premio Club de Regatas La Marina" was for four oared outriggers with coxswains. After a spirited contest, in which Buenos Aires Rowing Club fell out through breaking a rowlock and losing an oar, Club Canottieri Italiani won in 4min. 37 seconds, followed by San Nicholas and La Marina.

Eleventh Race, 2500 metres; Senior Eights, "Premio Copa del Rey de Italia," was contested by Buenos Aires Rowing Club and La Marina, the latter winning in 9min. 3sec. after a good race.

The regatta was in every way very successful and as already observed, the behaviour of boats for and about the course was an enormous improvement on previous years. Everybody and everything were on their best behaviour. May the conditions continue. As for the Press boat, sitting in a spray of naphtha with a footstool of bottles (empty) is pleasant and stimulating and the arrangements made by the authorities were quite good and considerate. The starters were Mr. Matthew Kay and Sr. Juan Richter; Judges of the course, Sr. Hermann Bauer, Dr. Jorge Casares, Sr. A. E. Ruffer; of the winning post Sres. José Fonseca, F. Heiberg and Chas. H. Roberts; Comisario general, Sr. E. H. Sanguinetti; time-keeper, Sr. Angel Jardon.

BELGRANO HIGH SCHOOL

ANNUAL SPORTS MEETING.

Belgrano High School annual athletic sports were favoured with weather conditions which could scarcely have been bettered yesterday. The extensive ground attached to the School had been attractively arranged for the occasion, and when the time for opening came, a large concourse of residents, parents and friends of the children were present. Mr. and Mrs. Laidlaw have had the excellent idea of doing something for The Good Cause (which, it need scarcely be said, is the British Red Cross), and attractive young ladies in white with red bows, carried pretty bags with red crosses whereby and with the ridiculously small sum charged for tea, something near $300 has been collected. As for the sports themselves, they went off splendidly, and one who had seen the prizes confessed to feeling envious of the fortunate winners. "REMY"

THE NEW CARD GAME

Enquiries have been received regarding "Reym," which was described in THE HERALD yesterday. In reply it is stated that Reym (pronounced "ray-m") is as original as Bridge was, with Whist as its antecedent. Its inventor produced it for the first time for publication in the HERALD, thinking that the Argentine like England, the States and other countries, ought to have a card game of its own.

FOR SIX PLAYERS.

The twos are taken out of the pack, leaving 48 cards, which are dealt out, 8 to each player. Dealer declares the number of tricks he wishes to start with and bidding goes round, the highest bidder following this procedure: we will call him B, next player on his left C, next D and then E, F and G. As each will have an independent score throughout the game, their names are set down in this order along the top of score sheet, the dealers taking their turns according to this order B calls out: "Who has the ten of Hearts?" or any other card he wishes to name. Supposing F is the one to possess it, he says so and becomes B's partner. B then calls for the two or three of any suit, the one holding it also becoming B's partner. Say, it is G—then B, F and G are partners versus C, D and E. D changes seats with G, so that each player has an opponent on either side of him.

The player next on B's left (in the above case, C) plays down the first card, after B has called Trumps, and the game proceeds in the same way as Reym for four players, the only difference being that now there is no dummy. B collects the tricks for his side, and C for his. At the end of the hand the total number of points won by B are put down to him, and a like amount to each of his partners. C's total earnings are similarly treated.

C is the next dealer, G shuffling and B cutting the cards for him. Bidding goes round. Say, E is highest bidder, he chooses his partners, who might happen to have been his opponents in the previous hand; but this does not matter, as each player has to work towards the total 500 independently of the others. The penalty of a revoke is 50 points to be deducted from the score of the player at fault only. In the four-handed game the penalty for a revoke should be the same.

Seven thousand have been set aside for this purpose, and application may be made any day except those on which other lotteries are played between 2 and 5 p.m., by those who have one hundred and fifty dollars or so to dispose of. THE FAT STOCK SHOW

SENSATIONAL PRICES

A YOUNG STEER, THE PROPERTY OF DUGGAN BROS., SOLD FOR $11,000.

The sale of the competing animals at the Fat Stock Show took place on Nov. 12 when some remarkable operations have again to be recorded. There were few visitors within the Show grounds previous to the sales, but as the bell tolled for the last time a considerable number of estancieros and representatives of the various freezing companies were noticeable among the audience. Had any one ventured an opinion regarding the possible trade for the fat stock, he would have been taking a great risk, as there was absolutely nothing to account for the sensational prices afterwards realised for not only one or two lots, but right through the sale. The largest company operating in this part of the world is the La Plata Cold Storage Company, Ltd., and right through the sales Mr. Prior was the principal factor whenever any animals of outstanding merit were exposed, or if he was interested in the acquisition of customers' consignment. He was accompanied by one of his principal and most trusted buyers, Mr. William Black, and that company contributed principally towards making the sale. I have on many occasions written that what the freezing companies had done for this Republic in many and diverse ways, had never been recognised near its true worth, and what they are still doing, one and all of them in paying fabulous prices to encourage the better finishing of our Argentine steers. The sales were effected according to the prize list, and the other lots balloted for their rotation. Mr. Arturo Bullrich acted as auctioneer in his usual efficient and persuasive manner, and experienced a great reception and very frequent acclamations on the part of the public on attaining some of the remarkable prices realised for many of the lots.

THE SALE.

The first steer to enter the ring was the champion animal belonging to Señor Miguel A. Martinez de Hoz. This animal is a splendid type of beast, being particularly good on his back and splendid over his loins, that most valuable part of the carcass. The bidding commenced at $3000, and bids came freely till the $9000 dollar line was reached, at which price he was knocked down to the La Plata Cold Storage Co., Ltd., amidst great applause and enthusiasm on the part of the visiting public. From the freeness of the bidding one could now see that any price might be realised for a particular specimen, the property of some estanciero, if the opposing companies desired to handle his cattle. The other two steers which, along with the Champion, were the winners of the La Plata Cold Storage Company's Cup, now entered the ring, and were claimed by the La Plata Cold Storage Co., Ltd., at $4600, with the option to select the best, but Mr. Prior was not mincing matters, but took both at that figure. The next steer, a useful white animal, was sold to La Blanca at $1,000, while the last animal of the Chapadmalal lot was knocked down to the Messrs. Armour at the moderate figure of $600. The exhibits from Santa Aurelia, the property of Sr. Bartolome Ginocchio, now entered the ring. The reserve steer, a very level fleshed roan, was presented by his owner to "The Patronato de Infancia," and when exposed for auction, was keenly competed for, but after spirited bidding was knocked down to the La Plata Cold Storage Co., at $10,000, amidst great cheering and enthusiasm, while another exhibit from the same property was sold to Messrs. Armour and Co., at $1100. The exhibits belonging to Señor Alberto E. Castex next passed through the ring, and were sold by Messrs. Yriondo and Co., at $2000—$1200, and the La Plata Company taking the lot at $1000. The same company bought the next six at $800, being their opening bid, and paid $850 for the following six. A very nice well fleshed white steer, the property of Mr. Lorenzo Casey, was the next to pass through the ring, and realised $2000 to the La Plata Cold Storage Company, another steer making $1000 to the same buyers. Two very nice young steers from El Retiro were sold to the Messrs. Armour at $500 each, while two very good handling butchers' cattle were claimed by the La Plata Co., at $600 each. Five very nice quality butchers' steers, the property of Señor Theodoro de Bary, realised $1000 for one, and $700 each for the remainder. There was nothing sensational for several lots till six big, good fleshed butchers' beasts belonging to Messrs. Duggan Bros. entered the ring, and were knocked down to La Plata at $800. This was a very useful lot of cattle, and included two younger animals. Only average prices were again obtained for a few lots till ten big useful sort of steers belonging to Señor Carlos A. Diehl, were keenly bid for, and finally claimed by La Sansinenna at $2000 each, taking the lot. With an interval of a lot or two, the ring was filled by the entry of 20 steers, the property of Señor José M. Malbran, and amidst cheering were knocked down to La Plata at $900 each. These animals were a very level lot, and presented a very pretty picture in the ring. Señor Villatte Olaguer had 6 steers from Santa Maria, and they were also purchased by La Plata at $900 each. Coronel A. F. de Urquiza next sold 12 big good steers to Messrs. Armour at $750 each.

A HEREFORD CALF.

The sensational sale of the day was now recorded when a perfect specimen of a Hereford young steer, with his milk teeth, realised the great figure of $11,000, being acquired by the La Plata Cold Storage Co., Ltd. Tremendous enthusiasm was evident among the spectators, and loud cheering was given for the purchaser of this extraordinary specimen of his breed, and, as I said in a previous report, "possibly the most symmetrical animal of any breed within the Show grounds, and a great testimony to the high excellence of the cattle bred by the Messrs. Duggan." The great price realised for this "calf" ought to encourage the more general feeding or marketing of steers at an early age, and as a carcass of "baby" beef will be one of the most perfect ever hung up.

The La Plata Cold Storage Company continued operating strongly to the finish, acquiring in many instances considerable numbers in one lot, at high figures. These beautiful Herefords, the property of Mr. Charles A. Brown, were all secured by the La Plata, one at $2500, one at $1600, and the other three at $1500. That well-known feeder, Mr. John E. Stent, sold the large number of 15 steers, at $1500, to La Plata. A nice lot belonging to Señor Ayerza, were acquired by the same company at $1550 each for the lot. There was no other sales of note till the entry of the Aberdeen Angus Champion, the property of the Messrs. Brown. This steer was the winner of the first award in his class, and also the Aberdeen Society's prize, as the best animal of his breed. The invincible La Plata were again the purchasers of a truly splendid specimen of a butchers' beast, at the sum of $3000, while they also secured another pair at $2200, and six at $1800. Señor Alfredo A. F. de Urquiza sold 14 big useful steers to the Las Palmas Co. at $1000 each. These were a bunch of great useful well fleshed cattle.

The Frigorifico Armour de La Plata secured 5 steers from Sra. A. Turo de Sansinenna at $1500 each. A big, well fleshed cross-bred blue steer, the property of Messrs. Duggan Bros., also went to the Armour Co., at $3000. The La Plata Cold Storage Co. were the purchasers of that handsome cross-bred Aberdeen-Angus steer shown by the Samuel B. Hale Co., and probably one of the best butchers' beasts in the yard, at the price of $3900, while the same company paid Señor Alberto E. Castex $2100 for another good specimen and well brought out. Five splendid "Doddies" from Señor M. Muniz Barreta were knocked down to La Blanca at $1100 each. These animals are likely to kill well, and give carcasses which will be much admired on the Smithfield market, as they are of surpassing quality. No further high figures were recorded till the Champion of the Chacareros and Dairy classes was paraded in the ring when the La Plata were the buyers at $2000. Only moderate figures were obtained for the few other remaining lots which were all most satisfactorily sold out before lunch. This year's Show will be remembered for the keen bidding and high averages realised by all the better lots of cattle on offer, and will act as a great stimulant for encouraging the more general use of artificial foods, and consequently the better preparation of all steers prepared or destined for export.

THE MARKING OF PEDIGREE STOCK

The Sociedad Rural according to the decree recently issued insists that all imported pedigree animals after May 1, 1916, shall carry in their ear a distinguishing tatoo mark which corresponds with their registered number in the pedigree books of the respective society to which the breed belongs. This initiative has been brought about through the exertions of Sr. Pedro Pages, who has always been known as one of the staunch supporters of every thing bred in this country. This new order will only have the effect of causing a little more trouble to the importers of pedigree animals to this Republic. It is noteworthy the fineness to which we are arriving in discriminating between "faked" imported animals, and those which might possibly be liable to some slight error here, that is the only way one would dare to hint at the possibility of any person in this country having all his calf crop registered as being the progeny of some famous sire, (the numbers registered on more than one occasion have caused considerable thought to the secretary of the herd book) and this on more than one occasion. Again some people aver that a valuable pedigree cow never misses a year but what she has a calf, even in the Argentina such facts are notorious, and we do not require to scrutinise imported animals to discover divergences from what ought possibly to have been done. The result of this new regulation will be that imported bulls will land here with each ear filled with tatoo marks while breeders here will do as they have done before, take advantage of any openings that may present themselves towards the road to financial gain.

CAMP NOTES

(By Our Agricultural Editor.)

The event of the week has been the Fat Stock Show, though up to the day of sales practically no interest has been shown in this most commendable exhibition. Mr. M. McCormack was judge, and his awards gave general satisfaction. The show of Short-horns was a fairly good one, though there was a large end of rough cattle stalled that were never under any circumstances likely to annex any prize, nor make a very favourable impression regarding the judgment displayed in "feeding for show" such brutes. I have always advocated the more general use of artificial feeding for outside steers; but do not recommend the expenses incurred in showing many animals not up to the ordinary quality to be seen in many "rodeos" in the camp. I think I have seen the Shorthorn better, though the Aberdeen Angus were a grand show this year. Three very nice level, well fleshed animals, the property of Messrs. Enrique Brown, Bros., were particularly noticeable as grand specimens of this most popular breed of thrifty butchers' cattle, and many experts even went as far as to say they, as a group, might have occupied a higher position if quality was being considered. The Blacks were certainly worth seeing, and it is to be hoped those enthusiastic pioneers of the breed here will continue persevering, as the present exhibition augurs well for the increased popularity of the Aberdeen Angus in this Republic.

The various Hereford classes were also well contested, and some particularly nice animals were shown by the Messrs. Duggan Bros., and Mr. Charles Brown. A most symmetrical animal was shown in the class for steers with milk teeth, and had many admirers for his truly beautiful lines and splendid handle, and as an example of "baby beef" was possibly the best in the exhibition. Mr. Charles Brown is the owner of another very nice specimen of a Hereford steer, which was first in his class, and has the splendid record of never having yet suffered a defeat, but has seven first prizes to his credit.

There were two sections for sheep, those for breeding purposes, and the other classes for butchers' sheep. With the exception of Dr. Malbran's exhibits there was really nothing of much merit for a show of fat sheep, and I would say the exhibition was disappointing considering the many well-known flocks that did not see their way to send a few competing pens. Señors Leonardo and Martin Pereyra showed a large number of big, fleshy, dark faced wethers which were an excellent class of most useful carcass sheep, though some of the pens were not prepared as show sheep ought to be got up. The competition in the various pig sections was decidedly poor, considering the large number of pig breeding establishments in this Republic, and the desire shown by several of the Freezers to buy pigs of a suitable class and weight, for the encouragement of this undoubtedly payable industry. The Champion and Reserve Champion of the Middle White Yorkshires, the property of Señor Emilio Meyer Pelligrini, were the only pigs of any merit to be seen, and were well deserving of their honours.

The attendance at this Show has been most disappointing, and reflects the small amount of interest shown by estancieros in a part of their business which ought to interest them most, for the reason that the feeding of fat steers has always been one of the most remunerative branches of the estancia. For a number of years practically all the Cabaños were losing money, but such was not the case with the feeder who has been backing the winning horse all the time.

Many well-known camp men were in town during the week, including Mr. W. Hartnett, Espartillar; Mr. George Lawson, Azcuenaga; Mr. T. Watson, and Mr. Wm. Gammie, El Retiro; Mr. Kennedy, La Carlota; Mr. Gustavo Rutgerson, Darraguera; Mr. John Tosh, San Juan; Mr. Wm. Forbes, Tatay; Mr. Andrew Elliot, Barreta; Mr. A. St. Clair Simpson, San Carlos; Mr. Alexr. Bruce, San Ramon; Mr. John Strong, Marion; Mr. James O'Conner, El Dorado; Mr. Harry Blunt, Sanquilda; and Mr. George Matheson, Las Barrancas, the latter of whom utilised his time to good advantage and for a worthy cause, in collecting and handing over for the Nurse Cavell Fund over four hundred dollars, collected from friends and sympathisers.

On November 12 in their Yard, San Martin 153, Messrs. Yriondo and Co. conducted a sale of imported bulls, the property of Messrs. Sidey and Poels, when a fair selling trade was experienced, and the satisfactory average of $2400 was secured for 13 bulls sold.

Messrs. A. Bullrich and Co. conducted a most satisfactory sale of Lincoln rams bred by Sr. Puchuri, within their yards, on November 12 when ten rams gave the satisfactory average of $2120 each.

Among the competing animals at this year's Palermo Show there was not one single specimen that showed any signs of "staggyne" or type of toruno, meaning that they had been originally intended for bulls, and castrated at a later date. This marks a great improvement on former shows, only a few years back, when a great percentage of the competing cattle showed by their heavy full necks and head that they had been originally intended for bulls, and castrated at a later date.

The following prizes were won at "Rio 40." Show, Nov. 7, 1915, by Short-horns from Cabaña "San José," in Roberto Cano, property of Bernardo Wirsch:—

1st Prize, Champion and Gold Medal and Premio Soc. Rur. Argentina.—"Prince Augustus 1," 32,989, by "Prince Augustus," 25441, and "Princess," 027793.

SHEEP FEEDING FOR EXPORT

The sheep of Argentina have always been overshadowed by their bigger brothers, the cattle, and their merits are often belittled when they have in no small way contributed towards the great pastoral riches of this country.

Sheep as a rule are generally associated with a drier soil than is convenient for cattle; hence the larger number of sheep to be seen in the Bahia Blanca district, where some of the best natural sheep camps exist, that it has ever been my pleasure to see. The old race of Merino sheep, big strong boned animals are still in favour on some of the drier camps and where water is scarce this hardy race grow their fine wool and when matured the wethers give a heavy carcass of lean meat, though on account of its dark colour it is not very suitable for consignment to the British market. The carcass is also not as compact as many other breeds, possessing as it does a long leg, which gives a plain looking "gigot" while its narrow back and shoulder do not favourably impress English butchers. The great advantage of this breed of sheep is their ability to withstand trying droughts and subsist on hard bare pasture while retaining a certain amount of fleshiness, possibly better than any other breed of sheep in this Republic. The old ewes of this race give a most suitable class of lambs for early feeding when mated to Lincoln rams, the progeny being in that case a sort of Corriedale, a typified breed of half breeds which are now in much acceptance in New Zealand, where flockmasters make a speciality of the fat lamb trade and never fail to obtain the higher prices for their produce. With more New Zealand care and better management this country's flocks would experience a vast improvement.

The introduction of the big strong Lincoln brought about as great an improvement in the quality of the sheep in this country as did the boned and heavily woolled English Shorthorn improve the native herds. The real "criollo" sheep are still to be seen in some parts of the republic while in Paraguay I have seen a class of "criolla" sheep after the style of the "fat tailed" sheep in South Africa, only in Paraguay they do not have that valuable appendage which their South African brothers possess. The Indians in the Chaco still retain small flocks of these animals, which have dropping ears and are covered with a very short useless hairy class of wool. The generally good strong land in this country soon feeds the sheep, and in many cases I have observed the breeding ewes too fat for breeding purposes, if a good crop of lambs is the object aimed at. The big heavy fat, useless sheep for export purposes one so frequently saw here years ago, were invariably acquired for the local consumption, as following the system of dressing sheep in this country, the great thickness of fat all along the back was carefully stripped off and the leaner meat which remained was saleable in the local markets. These big fatty carcasses were at one time practically unsaleable on the Smithfield market, so estancieros who were more interested in the early maturity of their sheep and desirous of catering for the increasing demand of the freezers, set about improving the quality of the carcasses by the introduction of dark-faced rams. For good quality sheep 54 to 62 pounds, or for lambs 36 to 42 pounds were the best selling weights on the London market. Where wool is the first consideration the Lincoln will always be recognised at his worth; but as the flocks are now more graded up, and a firm demand exists in the home markets, some of the dark-faced breeds are going to increase in popularity here, as their values as carcass sheep become more generally known. The high prices paid to those fortunate owners of dark-faced lambs for the freezers, amply justified the more general use of the dark-faced ram which mated to cross-bred Lincoln ewes give a most valuable carcass lamb of great fleshiness, and most acceptable for export.

In this Republic we are only beginning to realise the advantage of early maturity. Supposing that a dark-faced ram has been put to the oldest flock of ewes, the lambs can be sold off, and later the old ewes can be marketed, leaving clean ground for some other mob of sheep. Ewe lambs, as well as wether lambs, would be sold for fat, but only in this flock of the older sheep, as the ewe lambs from the other flocks would keep up the supply of breeding females.

The artificial feeding of sheep, unless pedigree animals, has been very little practised here, and conditions so far have not demanded any fatter sheep, but the time has come when estancieros who largely cater for the export trade will find it to their advantage to get a dark-faced cross sheep for export, and the prices paid will amply justify the procedure. The class or breed of sheep most adapted for one camp would not possibly give the same result under different conditions of pasture on another, but where sown down grasses are to be pastured by sheep then it will be most advantageous to have a black-faced cross and sell the lambs off early for the export trade at the period when they have attained the most acceptable weight, say 40 pounds. Within the last few years the quality of the mutton exported from this Republic has improved very much, owing to the estancieros themselves finding that it pays to produce what the freezers want to buy with the mutual advantage for both parties, and higher reputation earned by this country for the excellence of its mutton.

FEEDING STEERS

SOME COMMENTS.

The Annual Fat Stock Show has again come round, arranged, it was understood, for the convenience of the freezing companies, so as to leave them a sufficient interval for the slaughter of the prize winners, and get them consigned, to arrive in time for the Christmas trade at the Smithfield market.

The freezing companies deserve far more credit than they very often get for the generous support they give the sales, which is in great contrast to the dilatory methods of certain Government departments who have not yet paid over the money promised to the Rural Society two years ago for the awarding of prizes to encourage certain most worthy objects in the direction of cattle improvement. A most marked improvement is now noticeable in the quality of the competing animals, from that of some of the earlier shows, and a great deal more interest is being evinced by stock owners in the better preparation of their steers. There could be no more convincing argument in proof of these statements than the high prices paid by the "freezers" when they see what they want.

The seller, if he means to be successful must cater for the buyer, who in turn is influenced by the home market, where the demand is for young steers and of prime quality. The owner who classifies his steers into level lots and tends them well can always depend on getting a firm price bid for his cattle as they are level right through and of a uniform quality. What is required is more general use of a supplementary ration of maize, linseed or bruised oats according to what the estancia yields, or the prices ruling for such grains for export. When a supplementary ration of crushed grains can be given, the feeding cattle, the result will justify the general adoption of this more approved method of "finishing off" the steers. Several circumstances have an influence on whether it may be possible to carry out this system. The property must be so divided as to permit of the changing of the cattle according to the state of the pasture or climatic conditions, as any one knows it would mean ruin to a camp to attempt to than appear at first sight.

bring to the feeding troughs a large mob of feeding steers during wet weather or while the ground in the vicinity of such troughs is sodden. Such systems as giving a supplementary ration of artificial food stuffs, have been successfully followed for a number of years on some of the most advanced properties in this Republic, and could be imitated with advantage by many others. The manurial value to the soil, which could be periodically ploughed, and big crops of linseed or maize grown after the alfalfa or grasses sown down had given out, would be immense, as notwithstanding the great fertility of the soil in this Republic, I have personally observed that it most readily responds to any slight manuring.

The evolution of cattle feeding here is slowly following the accepted methods practised in older and more densely populated parts of the world. The very favourable climate here will enable the animals to have a free run of the fields. In that respect there will always be the difference that "house feeding" will not be required to the same extent as in North America and Britain, where the vigorous climate compels stock owners to "house" their cattle during the winter months. We are far more favourably situated in this Republic as we grow all the food stuffs necessary, and by consuming them by cattle on the property the continued fertility of our lands is maintained and not shipped to Europe in the way of maize, and linseed (a very impoverishing crop for the land), alfalfa, etc. The more general cutting of all available alfalfa or rye grasses to be stor-

THE GARDEN AND ORCHARD

HINTS TO AMATEURS

(By "The Rustic.")

Garden.—Follow the same instructions given in our last article, viz.: Mowing of lawns; have your evergreen trimmed, and roses pruned or unnecessary shoots; transplant the season's flowers from the nurseries to their place in the garden beds. Sow new varieties as per previous list. Graft roses in accordance with previous indications, and destroy weeds, etc.

Orchard.—Thin excess of fruit. Prune unfruitful branches. Place supports under heavily laden branches. Prune vines of unfruitful branches. This operation, of course, must be done with a certain amount of discretion and care, and must be principally limited to the elimination of what are termed suckers, that is, new shoots coming out of the old wood (the trunk, or last year's bearers). otherwise they are likely to destroy possible fruit bearing branches for next year.

Plagues and Insects.—Sprays should be repeated at intervals of 15 days or 3 weeks, according to the results previously obtained, which can be seen by close inspection of the parts attacked, either by the total disappearance of the insects, or destruction of same. The sprays to be used, according to our previous indications, are as follows:—For aphids, tobacco juice, kerosene emulsion, or pyrethrum; for "bicho del cesto," orange butterfly, or other masticators, poisonous sprays based on arsenic. For scales, such as the orange and olive scale, Diaspis Pentagona, etc., sulphur and lime, or kerosene emulsion. For slugs, snails, etc., poisoned bran, and for wood worm on peach and other trees, the treatment given in our previous number, viz., severe pruning, and an energetic manuring and besides for all cryptogamic plagues Bouillie Bordalaise, or flowers of sulphur, as already indicated. Last, but not least, unfortunately are the black ants, which are making their appearance in full force just now.

GENERAL INFORMATION.

There are quite a number of insecticides and manners of destroying black ants, but it depends very much on how these enemies present themselves, what means of destruction should be used. If the nest is in an open field, and its numerous entrances can be located, it is easy enough to destroy the whole nest by digging it up early in the morning when the ants are all at home, and destroying the whole brood by filling up with water and mixing up the loose earth just dug out and literally drowning them all. Or else by using any of the smoking machines offered on the market, provided that care has been taken previously to close all exits, except the one through which the smoke is being pumped in.

It must be borne in mind, however, that many of these nests are very large, and extend over considerable areas of ground, and in some cases several large nests are connected by underground galleries, so that when it appears that a nest has been destroyed, the poisonous smoke may not have reached some of the more distant parts of it, or one or other of ed in well-built stacks, is a necessary guarantee for the stockman, and it was only through the carrying out of this preventive measure that the managers of many large establishments, carrying a big number of breeding cattle, were able to bring their animals through even last winter, when breeding cattle were in many cases dangerously thin. This Show is worthily fulfilling its object, in developing a greater interest in the better feeding of our fat steers, and bringing them to unheard of weights at an early age, and will give far greater benefits to the country the separate nests has not been reached and a new outbreak takes place. Therefore it is necessary to persevere and principally to observe the movements of the ants closely, to see where they come from, and apply the smoke again. The principal weapon is perseverance. When it is seen that the pump works hard and smoke forces its way through the mud which has been used to close round the pipe or to stop up the remaining entrances, it is a sign that the nest is full, and the results must be waited for. Sulphide of carbon gives excellent results in similar cases, and must be poured down the holes at the rate of one or two eggcupsful at a time, and once a match is applied the hole is stopped up so as to oblige the heavy gases to penetrate into the nest. But this stuff is very dangerous to handle owing to its inflammable nature, and should be carried about in small quantities in bottles, which should be placed at a distance before the hole is fired, and ought in no case to be handled by incompetent people or children. It should be stored in a cool place.

The persecution of ants which have their nests under floors or in neighbouring gardens is a more difficult thing to tackle. They will find their way through numerous crevices in walls or burrow long passages, many yards long, to reach the plants, and if their nests are under buildings between the ground and the flooring, it is easy to understand how difficult it would be to destroy them with smoke, which if successfully sent in the direction of their nests would have no effect on them as it would all disappear through the many openings.

It is therefore necessary to persecute the ants continually, and destroy them little by little until the nest can be discovered and destroyed. There are many ways of attacking them. By putting orange peel near their entrances and for which they have a great liking, large numbers can be killed by pouring hot water over them when the orange peel is full of them. Also they can be very successfully warded off by continually applying sulphide of carbon to their exits, specially if it is made to penetrate deep into the passages and exploded. In the same way may be used kerosene or kerosene emulsion, Acaroina, Condy's Fluid, etc. There is another method which is perhaps more successful if used with perseverance, and that is to put either pyrethium or powdered cyanide of potassium round the entrances. In this case the ants will walk over the stuff when going to their nests and once inside this will work its effect on them, and they will die, and will be carried out at once by others, which in their turn will walk over the powder and return to the nest to die, and so on until the nest is considerably weakened and the young ants or eggs will have no workers to care for them, and the nest will be eventually destroyed. But it is a long and persevering job. The pyrethium powder must be very fresh, otherwise it will not act, and must be renewed daily, as the damp of the ground will soon destroy it, and as regards the cyanide of potassium, this must be used with every precaution possible, as it is most highly poisonous, and the least quantity is capable of causing death to human beings or animals, and can only be used where access is not possible to children or animals.

A visit to the rose garden at Palermo close to the lake, just now is worth the trouble, besides being instructive and useful for the selection of varieties for the future formation of gardens. The gardens are laid out in English fashion, and the roses in standard or bush forms, or trailing over trellises, have a background of beautifully kept green lawns shown up here and there with beds and circles of blue flowers. All the plants have their corresponding names clearly printed on labels enclosed in glass tubes attached to each plant. There are hundreds of varieties, and many old friends, such as the beautiful large white "Entente Cordiale," the high pink and large petalled "Mode Maurice de Luze," the large handsome "White

ALBERT OF BELGIUM

INTERVIEWED BY COUNT DE BESA

A ROYAL HERO

"Sainte Adresse, near Havre, in Flanders, is now the capital of Belgium. It is one of the beautiful summer resorts of the locality, and was founded by M. Dufayel, a wealthy Parisian.

"France loaned the town to Belgium, with a generosity and a nobility that appealed strongly to the Belgian people and the Government. The town is now used as the capital, and though the Belgian capital therefore now stands on French soil, the Belgians feel content and know that there is safety and that their capital cannot be taken from them.

"From Saint Adresse I travelled with Count d'Alviella to Paris via Amiens, and from there we took an automobile to a small village in Belgium which were the headquarters of Albert, the heroic King of the Belgians. On arrival at headquarters, I was struck by the simplicity and complete lack of ceremony.

"King Albert is a tall man well over six feet and is a clear blue eyed blonde, with broad shoulders, a soldierly bearing, is fond of sports and fresh air, and entirely unpretentious and modest. When he talks, a serious demeanour spreads over his face. He is the idol of his soldiers, with whom he constantly mixes even in the firing line.

"The King treated us with every kindness and consideration, personally gave orders for our comfort, for he surely noticed that we were cold and tired after our long journey, and he had many a kind word for us in his modest, refined and simple way. In answer to a remark of mine that he was sacrificing much for his cause, he answered: "I am only doing what I want all Belgians to do—complying with my duty!"

"He expressed himself as proud of his people and absolutely certain of the ultimate victory. I told him I was writing a book of my experiences on this travel through Europe as a neutral spectator, and I asked him for some expression that I might publish in the book, and he answered: "The greatest thing in the world is to have justice and faith, both of which is what my people have."

"Our further conversation concerned the revolution in Mexico, and the King asked me concerning the loss and sufferings of his people in that country. As well as I could I told him the history of the revolution."

In these words Count de Besa related to a representative of THE HERALD the story of his interview and reception by one of the most royal and heroic figures in the world to-day.

This interview was kindly granted as an especial favour, and is one which has never before been published.

Lady," large crushed strawberry "Mistress Crawford," etc. Very notable varieties are the "Hugh Roller," which has long narrow petals, yellow at the base and red at the tips, "Ma Tulipe," purple red, and of silky appearance, very similar to a tulip. "Pride of the Valley," of a beautiful pink, "Royal Mondaine," dark velvety red, with just a white streak at the tips. "Madame Charles de Luze," with perfect buds of a very handsome pink hue. The "Rouennaise," dark red, the climbing "Marquise," a very dainty five-petal rose; "Pelle de Feu," a raggy high pink with yellow base to the petals; "Dora van Tets," a handsome red, and many other varieties which it would be difficult to enumerate fully here, such as one bed which was laid out on a green lawn with varied standard roses, and between each plant bushes of small red roses.

YOUNG MEN'S SOCIAL CLUB

Wednesday, Nov. 17

The whist drive held at the Young Men's Social Club last night was the usual success that these functions always are.

One is from an Italian gentleman now in the 31st Infantry, and, like the others, is of great interest. Since publication of last number, two of the F.C.O. men, Messrs. Appleyard and Roberts, are alleged to have been wounded, but the statement is unconfirmed.

THE WAR COUNCIL OF THE ALLIES

FRIDAY, November 12, 1915.

We honestly believe that the days of severe criticism of Britain's conduct of the war are nearly over, and the work of the critic—the much misunderstood, and much reviled critic—is almost finished, though the critic himself has yet to receive, as he will undoubtedly, and in full measure receive, the thanks and applause of his own critics. Things advocated for months past by the critical newspapers of the United Kingdom are being done now with almost startling rapidity. Changes and alterations, each and all declared to be unnecessary and impossible, are being made one after the other, and events are tumbling over one another as though in haste to demonstrate that the critic has been right all along. The Government appears to be possessed of a frantic desire to fulfil the programme set by its critics, and presently the critic will have nothing to criticise for the simple reason that all he has contended for in the face of so much opposition has been done.

The critic brought up the question of munitions supplies. That difficulty has been remedied. He attacked the Government for permitting the sale of British cotton to neutrals who sold it to Germany. Cotton is now unconditional contraband. The critic called for active propaganda against Germany's campaign in neutral countries. Every mail to this country now brings British official publications in the Spanish language, and there is a special department in the Foreign Office created to handle the question. The critic pleaded for a concentration of control of the war, in place of the division of it throughout the whole Cabinet. There is to-day a Council of Three, and one of them is Mr. Lloyd George, a man in whom there are all the qualities of a dictator. The critic has urged a closer coordination of the plans and efforts of the Allies. With "unpatriotic" frankness, and almost brutal insistence, he showed that the Allies could not succeed when they were not in real unison, while every country formulated its own strategic plans, and opened its own campaigns, irrespective of the common needs and requirements of all. Yesterday we published Mr. Asquith's announcement in the House of Commons, that an Allied War Council is in process of formation.

Has the critic been right, or has he been wrong? Has he done his country and the cause of the Allies, a service, or has he traitorously injured both? On this particular question of the formation of an Allied Council he could not have been wrong, or if he were, then the British Government is now wrong with him. The British Government is not wrong; it is tardily right. It required no heaven-sent genius of a statesman, nor a politician of forty years experience to see the obvious, nor could all the irritable argument of those two make the obvious obscure. When the Allies went to war they clearly needed more than anything else to understand one another. They did so on general principles. They knew they were all fighting a common enemy, and they all agreed to fight him to the end. Occasionally they sent their special envoys around to visit one another, and discuss the general situation. Mr. Lloyd George had a conference with M. Albert Thomas, on the question of munitions. Lord Kitchener met General Joffre once or twice in fifteen months. Not once in the whole course of the war, so far as we are aware, have the whole of the Allies been in direct concert at any time, when they should clearly have been in hourly agreement on every important detail.

What was wanted was what is now to be done. Many critics saw the necessity for this War Council months ago. It was advocated even by a woman, a remarkable woman, a born organizer and fighter—Miss Christabel Pankhurst. In an article from her pen which we have before us she gives a lucid and striking reason why the formation of such a Council was imperative. In urging the formation of the Allied War Council she says that to ensure coordination of effort there must be such a body to "live constantly in an atmosphere which enables it to gain and to maintain the realisation of the war." In other words, there should be created a Council representative of all the Allies, and that it should exist and direct the war from a common centre as near the most important fighting front as possible. Instead of that we have had the war directed from Whitehall, from Paris, from Petrograd, from Rome, (poor Serbia and Montenegro left to their own resources), with an occasional telegram between the various centres acting as a link of communication. And yet even on this question we have been told the critics, or advocates of method, of system and of common understanding and common action, have been mischievous, wicked and hypocritical. If the critics were less honest, sincere and patriotic than they are, they might well smile to-day, and feel arrogantly superior. Instead they are only happy; happy to know that they have not spoken in vain. The formation of the Allied War Council means that the end of the war is brought appreciably nearer; victory made appreciably surer. Britain will not "muddle through." She will win through, because she has decided that she shall be part of an organization that is irresistible.

THE SINKING OF THE ANCONA

SATURDAY, November 13, 1915.

It is interesting to note that the press of New York is giving more attention to the latest Teutonic horror than is that of London. In the latter capital the sinking of the Ancona in circumstances of frightful barbarity, has we doubt not, been accepted more or less as a matter of course. Britain and the British long ago exhausted their vocabulary in denunciation of similar crimes. They have protested to the world in the name of civilisation a score of times, expressing surprise and horror at the calculated atrocities of their enemy. To-day Britain knows that protest is useless. She has come to regard such crimes as within the ordinary course of war as practised by Germany, and nothing that the latter and her allies might do would surprise Britain. She feels for Italy and the murdered victims of the Ancona, as much as any nation could, but she will probably merely add the crime to the long indictment against Germany and proceed without futile comment on it with the task of rendering that nation impotent for ever to wage war.

In the United States, however, the case is different. The majority of Americans are with the Allies in sentiment, and in every possible way they have translated their sympathy into action. The very outcry the New York Press is now making is solely directed toward compelling the United States Government to act drastically and to determine once for all that Germany shall not outrage civilization, and affront the American Nation. How the Government will act no one can say. We presume some official notice will be taken of the atrocity which involved the loss of some American lives, but we do not think the United States will go further than to enter a formal protest. Germany will, of course, find some excuse, or if Austria be the culprit an excuse will be found for her action. There is really none that should be considered for a moment, but that is immaterial from Germany's view-point. If it cannot be asserted that the Ancona was armed; that she carried ammunition or reservists—and as she was outward bound to New York these excuses cannot well be put forward—or that she tried to ram the submarine, then she did something that in Germany's eyes would justify whatever happened, even the firing on the boats.

To invite excuses or explanations in such a case is worse than useless—it is foolish. The only result is to receive an answer which is an insult to the intelligence. Germany has not yet managed to evolve an excuse or an explanation for her systematic violation of all codes, Divine, Moral or Legal. She has tried, but she has failed. A few of her master criminals have at least had the virtue of honesty about them, if there can be any honesty in a criminal. They have not argued about their crimes. They have simply claimed the right to perpetrate them because they have the might to do just whatever pleases them. They candidly assert that America does not count, that no neutrals count, that nothing counts, but Germany and Germany's desires. It is almost possible to have some respect for these gentry, for at least they do not humbug us, or weep crocodile tears. They are frank free villains, perfectly unashamed, and there is no doubt they speak the truth. Germany is out to murder, she does not care whom, and the sooner America realises this fact that has been driven home to the British and their Allies, the sooner she will spare herself diplomatic labours that are futile. The United States cannot by mere protests make Germany alter her conduct of the war. At least Germany has said so as plainly as deeds can speak.

From a British point of view there is still, however, a good deal of interest in what the United States may do, or say, over the Ancona tragedy. Recently the United States has protested to Great Britain against the blockade of Germany, and the prosecution of the search for, and seizure of contraband. Britain has been asked to conform to the principles of international law relative to the "right of visit and search." It has not yet been shown that any infractions by Britain have involved the loss of the life of a single American citizen, or for that matter of any neutral, man, woman or child. It is still a matter for investigation whether Britain's conduct of the war has yet involved any American citizen in serious monetary loss. We do not require to state what Germany's infractions of international law have involved. The point at issue is: Can the United States seriously ask Britain to yield a single point in her policy of attack on Germany, even should that policy injure American commerce, while Germany is not forced to abandon her policy of ruthless slaughter of innocents of all nations? There can be only one answer.

EARL KITCHENER'S MISSION

TUESDAY, November 16, 1915.

Although the most emphatic denials have been given in London to the statement that Lord Kitchener has resigned the post of Secretary of State for War, and the "Globe" has been suspended for affirming the contrary, the departure of the great soldier on a special mission, really means, in our opinion, that he has relinquished, perhaps permanently, the office which he held in the Cabinet. Just what his mission is nobody apart from Lord Kitchener himself and the Cabinet can say, but it is not unreasonable to assume that it involves the full control and direction of the affairs of the Allies in the Balkans and Egypt. Up to the moment the war in what is known in British diplomatic circles as the Near East has not gone favourably to the Allies, despite what may be said to the contrary, and that Lord Kitchener should have been despatched to take a firm grip of the situation there, is the most feasible explanation of his departure from London.

The "Berliner Tageblatt" appears to have formed the same opinion of the nature of the special task which has taken Britain's first soldier away from the direction of the war in general. This German paper says that Kitchener has been entrusted with the duty of checking Germany's movements in the Balkans, and frustrating her plans for an attack on Egypt. It speaks of him as a general who is not likely to be influenced by any moral considerations. If this is intended as a reflection on Kitchener, or on the Nation that is proud to claim him as its faithful servant, it savours somewhat of a joke, or at best an unctious piece of hypocrisy, coming as it does from a nation whose whole military history is one of ruthless trampling upon every finer consideration, and whose military heroes are notorious for their brutality. However, it may be intended otherwise, because the "Tageblatt" goes on to say that Lord Kitchener is a man not to be despised, evidently because of his acknowledged capabilities and his determined character.

Kitchener is not known to his own people as a sentimental soldier, and perhaps it is fortunate that he is not, for the task which lies before him certainly calls for all the strength and vigour which have always characterised his conduct of a campaign. The position in the Near East demands the presence of such a man as Kitchener—an organiser, a fighter, and an inexorable master. There is much to be done that only a man like him can do. The various forces require welding; apparently conflicting plans need co-relating, and direction and coordination are vitally essential, if success is to attend the fortunes of the Allies.

Success cannot be measured alone by what may transpire in the Balkans. Much bigger stakes are being played for than a disputation with Germany for a right-of-way to Constantinople. The fate of Egypt and India, and perhaps of the whole of Britain's Empire east of Suez rests on the issue. There can be no doubt of this. We may like to delude ourselves that Germany has no serious intention at this stage of the war of endeavouring to wrest half the Empire from Britain. We may believe that she is exhausted and beaten, but there is not one sane student of the war who does not realise the tremendous importance of

WEDNESDAY, November 17, 1915.

Mr. Winston Churchill has again provided a political sensation of the first magnitude. After a brief, but stormy, career as a responsible minister in time of war, he has resigned office and turned critic. The ex-First Lord of the Admiralty has undoubtedly rendered good and valuable service to his country, and in the deepest sincerity we cordially acknowledge the special debt of gratitude which is due to him for his keen attention to the preparation of the fleet, and its maintenance in a state of readiness for war. It is true that Mr. Churchill has not been a brilliant success under the strain of actual war, and that his name has been associated with several unfortunate happenings. There was something in the nature of a political fall in his being removed from the Admiralty to the obscure post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but here again it must be admitted that he took his defeat, or disgrace, or reduction in office, like a good sportsman and a patriot, and not until on the eve of retiring from politics did he utter one word of complaint. Had he gone to the blood-red fields of Flanders without speaking he would doubtless have impressed his admirers still more with his courage and self-sacrificing devotion to his country.

Mr. Churchill has, however, unburdened himself in the House of Commons, and has alleged that he has been bitterly and unfairly attacked. By his speech he has done two things. First of all he has given the British people a great deal more information about the inner-history of things than they might ever have expected—in other words he has told Cabinet secrets. Secondly he has turned critic, and two of the most trusted men in Great Britain, Lords Kitchener and Fisher have met with his partial condemnation.

The situation is one difficult to analyse, and probably not until after the war has ended will it be possible to attach responsibility to either Mr. Churchill or those with whom he has been associated.

In the absence of Lord Kitchener in the Near East, it is not possible to obtain any explanation, or defence, from the Secretary of State for War. Lord Fisher, however, has already spoken, and to the effect that even in self-defence he does not feel this is a time for explanations. This remark by the former First Sea Lord is obviously to rebuke his one time Civil chief.

Probably the most interesting feature of a discreditable business is the series of contradictions which has arisen from the Churchill resignation. It will be remembered that only a few weeks ago, Mr. Asquith distinctly stated that Mr. Churchill was not solely responsible for the Dardanelles venture, and that it had been deemed advisable to undertake the expedition, even against the wishes of Lord Fisher. Mr. Winston Churchill now informs the House of Commons and the British people that Lord Fisher did not give clear guidance before the operations against the Dardanelles were initiated. Who is to be believed? Mr. Asquith or Mr. Churchill? If a Premier, in his anxiety to defend a colleague denies the truth of allegations made and then within a short space of time that colleague admits that there was some foundation for the charges levelled by the critics, can the public be blamed if they lose confidence in their Ministers?

Mr. Churchill's "defence" is nothing but an admission, couched in semi-hysterical terms, that someone has blundered. In order to evade responsibility he opens the doors of the inner chambers of Downing-street to the public gaze and then seeks to throw the onus for whatever mistakes have been made on the shoulders of the military and naval advisers. Mr. Asquith, as is his custom, endeavours to keep the doors closed, and denies that anything untoward has ever occurred.

Now that Lord Fisher has declined to add to an undignified series of contradictions by offering any "defence" of his own, the whole unsavoury business may be allowed to be forgotten. At any rate, the ex-First Sea Lord's action will assist in that direction. It should be remembered however that Mr. Asquith—although the responsible leader of the Government—has once again made statements only to be contradicted subsequently by a member of his own Cabinet. This is not the type of man necessary to lead the Empire to early victory.

the issue of the struggle in the Near East, and who does not recognise that if Germany can defeat the Allies in the Balkans, link her forces with those of Turkey, and establish Constantinople as a base of operations, she will certainly make a bold bid for Egypt and India. It must not be forgotten that part of the price of Turkey's assistance was Germany's promise that Egypt should be restored to her. It must not be forgotten also that Britain nipped in the bud an attempt made through the ex-Khedive to bring about a revolt in Egypt in favour of Germany.

We believe that Lord Kitchener has been relieved of his ministerial duties to devote his great talents to the problems we have outlined. It is not likely that he has received any instructions or advice on the subject, because no man in the Empire could appreciate more than he can the importance of the work that lies before him. No man is better fitted to carry out that work. He is the man who made Egypt. He knows that country and India better than any other man at Britain's disposal. The history of modern Egypt is merely the record of Kitchener's genius for control and administration. His whole life has been spent in winning and securing portions of the Empire, and to him the Orient is an open book, its pages merely chapters of the record of his Imperial service.

In some quarters in the United Kingdom it is evidently felt that the suggestion that Lord Kitchener has resigned from the War Office, because his services are needed elsewhere, is a slur on Britain. We cannot understand this view. In our opinion it is the greatest piece of good fortune that Britain can spare from the War Office such a man, for such a task as that which Kitchener has assumed. There are plenty of men available for the office he has vacated, but there is only one man to take charge of the fortunes of the Allies, and particularly those of Britain, in the Near East, and Kitchener is the man. If his mission be what we believe it is—one of the most important and vital of the whole war—then Lord Kitchener can serve the British Empire to ten times better purpose in fulfilling that mission, than ever he could have done by directing Britain's War Office.

BRITAIN'S REPLY TO THE UNITED STATES

THURSDAY, November 18, 1915.

It is asserted in official circles in London that the British reply to the note of the United States Government respecting the blockade of Germany is now ready and will be despatched shortly. Accompanying this statement is a forecast of the terms of the reply, a forecast which we believe will be proved to have been substantially correct. It is indicated that the reply is distinctly friendly in tone, and couched in terms that cannot fail to impress the United States still further with the determination of Britain to be firm in the maintenance of her own belligerent rights, and fair and frank in her relations with neutrals who may suffer to some extent through her insistence on those rights.

According to the forecast of the reply Britain insists that the means adopted by her to enforce the blockade are completely in keeping with the international law, and that if neutrals have suffered damage, such damage is inevitable under the peculiar conditions of the war. Britain, actuated by the most friendly spirit towards the United States, undertakes to do everything in her power to reduce loss and damage to neutral interests to the minimum, if not to eliminate them altogether. This reply conforms to the general anticipation of the manner in which Britain would receive the protests of the United States. We hardly expected that Britain would claim that all her actions were strictly in accord with the letter of the law, because we did not see that she was called upon to make such a claim. No law is so perfect, and so inexorable, that it must be followed to the last detail. This is particularly true of international laws which cannot be framed to meet every condition, and every change of circumstances.

In the case of Britain we believe it is recognised in the United States that she is honestly and sincerely observing the spirit and intention of every international law that has ever received her endorsement, even though, under stress of peculiar conditions she may not strictly adhere to the letter of the law. No American citizen, other than those under the spell of German influence, doubts the bona fides of Great Britain, nor, we believe, expects her to forego any rights she may have, or which may be created for her in this war. In the case of the blockade, and particularly in the cases of the seizure of American cargoes, Britain's procedure may have inflicted injury on individual American interests, but such injuries are the inevitable consequences of the prosecution of a war by a belligerent who does not intend to leave anything to chance, when she is determined to defeat her enemy. These cases are always open to redress, where the injury is not warranted, or where it is excessive. In the others, of course, neither the individual, nor America can claim redress. An American ship, attempting to run a blockade, or to carry contraband to Germany, has no redress if she be captured, and her cargo confiscated.

It has never been alleged that Britain's conduct of the war has in any way prejudiced the national interests or dignities of the United States, and as we pointed out recently, neither has it at any time involved the loss of a single American life. We do not think America could say the same about Germany's conduct of the war. Britain has her rights which she cannot forego, and which she cannot reasonably be asked to abandon. One of those rights is to take the fullest advantage of her naval supremacy; to shut her enemy in completely, and to attack and destroy her commerce wherever it may be found, and under whatever guise it may attempt to take refuge. In the exercise of this right, Britain can be relied upon to be alert to the danger of inflicting hardships or injuries on neutrals, and to conduct her war with the minimum amount of such injuries. Losses and damages may occur, but the nation responsible for them can do no more than offer redress, and conduct her negotiations with neutrals in good faith and a cordial spirit.

SCOTCH SUNDAY-SCHOOL PICNIC IN CHASCOMUS

(To the Editor).

Sir:—May I ask you for the favour of a small space in your valuable paper to express my thanks to Miss J. Bruce the Superintendent of the Sunday School, also to her assistants, Miss MacGaw, Miss Hatrick and Miss S. Bruce, through whose untiring efforts a most enjoyable picnic was held on the beautiful grounds of the Feria last Thursday.

Too much cannot be said of the excellent management of the proceedings throughout the day. The sports were in the able hands of several well-known gentlemen, who did their part thoroughly.

The prizes were more numerous than usual, so it was not surprising at the close of the day to see almost every child carrying home some little keepsake of the jolly day.

The roads being in a better condition, many families from the camp were present, and as nobody came empty-handed, there was an abundance of good things.

Hoping you will excuse me for taking up so much of your valuable space, and once more thanking the ladies and all who helped for the very pleasant afternoon spent.

Yours etc.,

"ONE OF MANY WHO HAD A GOOD TIME."

B.A. FINANCES

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF MUNICIPAL SALARIES.

The Municipal Intendente, Dr. Gramajo, has conceived a plan which is bringing upon his head much odium. He suggests that there should be a general reduction in the salaries of Municipal employees, and that there should be a general curtailment of expenses.

Municipal finance is in a sufficient sorry way to justify such a proceeding, but the point objected to is that the salaries of only the smaller and more insignificant of Municipal employees will be effected, and that those in high places, will not have to experience the new object of the Intendente. Dr. Gramajo appeals for Government support.

PURCHASE OF BOATS

LIFE-SAVERS FOR THE FLOOD DISTRICTS.

The Minister of Interior, Dr. Ortiz, has authorised the Director-General of Territories to purchase eight boats at $250 each from Señor Otto von Muhleport, for navigation on the rivers Neuquen, Limay and Negro. The flotilla is especially intended to be used in case of salvage necessities in the frequent floods which afflict those regions where the lack of boats has been repeatedly felt. It may be remembered that in the last Rio Negro floods frequent reference was made to the necessity of a supply of reliable small craft.

Public Opinion as expressed in the Argentine Press.

THE MORTGAGE MARKET

(La Prensa.—November 11).

The investigatory commission appointed by the Minister of Finance to report on the number and amount of mortgages in force in this Republic have just issued a species of appendix to their principal statement, laid before the Minister of Finance a month ago. Dealing with the section, Mortgages and Executions, it points out that the national mortgage companies have placed the sum of $449,292,768 paper, but to this sum must be added that representing private loans on mortgage, loans that in the majority of cases are made with national capital. A total of $1,285,551,626 is attributed to the private lender, and of this amount $89,980,000 is under execution. In order to get some means of comparison as to the amount of national and foreign capital lent out in mortgage which is now being reclaimed by judicial means, the Cédulas of the Hypothecary National Bank are left out of account. Thus one has, says La Prensa, $1,569,766,657 total national capital on mortgage; $836,399,914 foreign capital.

There are altogether under execution some $220,000,000, and taking this sum in connection with the foregoing totals one finds that $143,528,000 or 65.24 per cent corresponds to national capital, whilst $76,472,000 or 34.76 per cent corresponds to foreign capital. Furthermore, if the total of $143,528,000 be proportioned with $1,569,766,657, the percentage will be found to be 9.14; a percentage almost exactly similar to that shown for foreign capital, which, with $76,472,000 on $836,399,914 of a total, works out at 9.15 per cent. Thus showing that the proportion of foreign and national mortgage loans under execution is practically the same. In so far as interest is concerned, the average is higher for the private loans than for the advances made by the National Hypothecary Bank or by foreign mortgage companies. And although there are no means of getting at it exactly it may, says the Commission, be safely calculated at 9 per cent.

PAN-AMERICAN COMMERCIAL POLICY

(La Nación.—November 11).

The special committee appointed to represent Argentina in the financial conference to be held here next year, says La Nación, studying the matters that will then be brought forward. For the most part they deal with problems of inter-change, both as regards traffic and finance, and any conclusions arrived at ought to also take into account the relations of this Republic with countries whose trade is already established, thanks to the large capital sums that they have invested here. In other words international competition is what this country requires, and it ought to be borne in mind before any arbitrary decision is arrived at based on a desire to foment purely Pan-American relations. This is more or less what has been said by one of the members of the Argentine commission; in other words it is practically left to the interested parties to make their own way here.

Traffic facilities and banking capital are both needed, but banking capital is subject to fluctuations, and does not take root in a country to the same extent as does capital that is actually sunk in industry or trade. It is this last-named class of capital that this Republic needs, and, says La Nación, if the United States is to exert any solid influence here its commercial initiatives must synchronise with the proper exploitation of public services and other sources of wealth. Capital that will work and multiply is necessary if American trade is to obtain a dominant position here, declares La Nación, and the criticism is all the more just when it is borne in mind that between Argentina and the United States there can never be complete commercial reciprocity, since this country is a producer of the same things as are the States, with the difference that whereas the United States is also an industrial country, Argentina cannot boast of the same prospect. These are points that must be borne in mind when studying the policy of continental expansion now adopted by America, the more so since she will have to affront the competition of other nations whose roots are already sunk in Argentine soil.

DAME FASHION IN THE SCHOOLS

(La Prensa.—November 12).

Careful observation on the part of the leading educational authorities tends to show that the caprices of fashion unduly preoccupy the minds of our young teachers and their pupils. La Prensa, in opening the question, admits that the theme calls for delicate handling, but at the same time adds that all depends on the idea upon which the expression of opinion is based. It is indubitably important that the mistress should pay due regard to her social position, but La Prensa thinks that the studious woman is straying from her true mission when she devotes excessive attention to her toilette, the design of her gowns, and the other incidental sacrifices to her vanity.

Not that one would deny the fact of a woman needing some little attractive touches that mere man fails to realise and in many cases to understand, but in the case of the intellectual woman, and above all in the case of a teacher a certain discretion is demanded in matters of dress. For, continues La Prensa, the teacher's mission differs from that of the mere employe whose work is finished when she leaves the office or the shop. In common with the doctor who follows his noble profession wholeheartedly, the teacher must always have in her mind the example and precept whereby she hopes to inculcate right feeling in the tender minds committed to her charge, whilst for the same reason it is not advisable for her to indulge too freely in certain social pleasures perfectly licit to those who have not embraced her noble profession. The child copies from her teacher, instinctively in many cases, habits, customs, and even individual eccentricities, and La Prensa merely wishes to point out that its observations are not meant to wound but rather to draw attention to the danger that may so easily be avoided. It does not wish to see the Argentine teacher, educated at the cost of the nation in order that she may in future years bring up the new generations, a frivolous and inconstant woman of no moral foundation.

FOOTBALL AND POLITICS

(La Nación.—November 12).

Under the heading of "A Fresh Find" La Nación draws attention to the fact that political practices in this country afford novelties daily. Possibly because speeches promising everything and anything are not always as convincing as they might be, certain parties go one better by providing practical proof of their good intentions. Hence the many and various initiatives for improving the lot of the working man by cheap liv-

A JACK-IN-OFFICE

(La Prensa.—November 13).

Cases of interference by the police with the liberties of the Press are by no means as rare as they might be in Buenos Aires and La Prensa does well to draw attention to a recent infraction of the ordinary liberties of the subject arising out of the strike of cigarette packers in a local factory. According to La Prensa one of their reporters went down, duly furnished with his credentials, to interview a group of the girls who were gathered outside the factory. He was accompanied by a police official from the central police office, and went about his task of collecting information from the strikers in the customary manner. Whilst thus engaged, the sub-commissary of Section 28, a certain Perez, ordered the official accompanying the reporter to take the latter into custody at once, handcuffing him and searching him. Fortunately the sub-official had more sense than his superior and left the arrest to a couple of policemen who took the pressman by the arm for some distance on the way to the police station, until eventually the irate sub-commissary admitted his mistake and gave the order for his release.

As La Prensa points out this was not a case of insufficient credentials, since they were amply good. It was merely a fit of rage on the part of the officer who refused to listen to anything that was said and merely shouted his orders again and again until the luckless reporter was arrested. It is very regrettable that a superior police employe should show such a lack of temper and so marked a disability to control his passions, especially when circumstances force him to exercise his authority in public. Moreover in dealing with a matter such as a strike especial prudence and diplomacy is required of the police, since the more intelligent is its action in this respect, the less likelihood is there of more serious trouble. One cannot but agree with the conclusion arrived at by La Prensa, namely that the sub-commissary referred to is lacking in the qualities necessary for the fulfilment of the post to which he has been appointed.

ing and the sale of articles at a shade above cost price. But, says La Nación it does not do to be caught napping in the political arena. People are proverbially short-minded in the matter of favours. New means of keeping the favour of the public must be constantly devised, and in this direction the political mind is always on the alert. The football field is the latest find.

It is common report that in Avellaneda the favour of the Intendente is given to one club, and to that club alone, despite the fact of its being the richest club in the town and therefore the one that least needs official aid. It was also generally reported that political ends accounted for this benevolent protection. This was however but an isolated case. Now the idea appears to have spread, for the La Plata correspondent of La Nación advises that the Conservative party have decided to organise two championships, endowed with a couple of very handsome cups. Nor must it be overlooked that among the budget expenses for the coming year figures $100,000 for a football institution which must lack funds since it only receives 20 per cent of the gate money of the various clubs affiliated with itself. The idea, says La Nación will doubtless be carried farther. Politically speaking, football is a virgin field of immense possibilities. Whether it will be to the good of the sport is another matter. One can imagine, concludes La Nación what will happen when political interests have full control and a player appeals for a foul against an opponent of a different political creed to a referee whose opinions concur with his own!

THE CUSTOMS RETURNS

(La Nación.—November 13).

Coupled with the official report, the figures covering the customs returns for the past ten months enable one to make a fair calculation of the probable takings for the year. Working from this base La Nación believes that the 1915 totals will be some $10,000,000 below those for 1914, the year in which the steady decline that set in with 1913 took a sharp drop at the end of July owing to the events in Europe. Throughout the current year there has been regular diminution save for the months of September and October; in the first mentioned month receipts were 15 per cent better than those for the corresponding month of 1914, whilst October showed 28 per cent better. Hence there is no real reason to expect a speedy return to normal either this year or next, at any rate if the normal is taken to be the sum necessary to meet the irreducible expenditure of the Government.

Hence, concludes La Nación, those who augured a gradual return to increased imports, once communication was made certain, have been proved to be wrong. Most of the difficulties incidental to war have been removed by the powers who hold the command of the sea, whilst the entry of the United States into export business on a fuller scale has also been marked. Yet withal and in spite of all the Government is face to face with the fact that the customs revenue has declined, and that it can no longer be counted upon with certainty as the principal fount of revenue. Something must be found to supplement it, though up to the present the Government has preferred not to look facts in the face, electing to employ temporary financial measures that must some day come to an end. Credits granted so to say in current account must some day be met however much they may accumulate, or however long their settlement may be put off. It would be well to make ample preparations for that day in advance in order to avoid the danger of forced action postponed to the last moment.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAW

(La Prensa.—November 15).

Congress closed its session without endowing the country with the new bankruptcy law that is so urgently necessary. Not that sufficient stress has not been laid on the need, for again and again, says La Prensa, it has drawn attention to the subject, citing chapter and verse taken from cases that have occurred both in the provinces and in the Federal Capital. Indeed this country has now reached such a state that it may fairly be said that there are two classes of traders; firstly those who set out to conduct their affairs honestly, and secondly the large group of individuals who treat their commerce as a casual business, either through ignorance or design, gambling rather than trading in the strict sense of the word, and regarding a judicial settlement, and even bankruptcy itself, as one of the roads to fortune. Due in large measure to the cosmopolitan nature of the community, this latter section of the commercial community is much more to the fore than is the case in Europe, being aided by the indifference and even lenience shown towards those who make their fortune by indirect or irregular ends.

Hence, continues La Prensa, there is all the more need for looking to the law to buttress up commercial morality. Liberty in this particular ought not to be allowed to degenerate into licence. Defective inventories and balance sheets, excessive personal expenditure, the abuse of credit, the creation of false credits for the purpose of arranging a majority at a creditors' meeting, the concealment of property, and all the other manoeuvres that are far too frequent, and that, though fraudulent, escape punishment, ought, says La Prensa, to be brought under the penal code. A stop must be put to this irregular procedure, and the serious and honest trader be protected. The crisis has brought to light the extent of the evil, and it ought to leave behind it at the least a complete reform of the legal procedure relative to failures, seeing how intimately connected the subject is with the general economic welfare of the nation, and above all with the general working of the money market.

MUNICIPAL BUDGET ANOMALIES

(La Nación.—November 15).

The Intendente has followed his announced intention of economising in the 1916 Budget. In the scheme laid before the Commission a diminution of salaries to the tune of $1,878,000 was outlined, on the ground that revenue had decreased owing to causes which are too well known to call for explanation. Nor is it necessary to enlarge on the importance of these reductions in so far as the individual employee is concerned; an importance that remains even when it is borne in mind that the privation is for the general good of the community. What is causing general discontent is the arbitrary manner in which the reductions are being applied. Questions of competency, merit and position, have in many cases been entirely overlooked. A case in point is that of the parochial inspectors whose wages have been docked by $100, whilst the second chief of the department is reduced $200. Against this the street cleaning department salaries remain as they were, with an additional $29,000 allotted to the section to meet new salaries.

A further proof of partiality is evident in the treatment of the municipal secretaries who as a rule are seldom paid less than $2000. They suffer a reduction of $57, and retain many of their special prerogatives, some of them, such as that of head of the Registro Civil, being absolute anantries, since the post carries with it a salary of $1,200. In short, sums up La Nación, it would have been simpler and fairer to reduce wages by 10 per cent all round, making a reduction of $1,705,000, which could be still further increased by suppressing posts as they fell vacant. But instead of anything of the sort being done, in the last three months some two hundred new employees have been engaged whose salaries represent at the lowest estimate an additional outlay of $266,400 per annum. It is now the duty of the Municipal Commission to examine the scheme, and La Nación closes by hoping that this body will give the matter the attention it deserves.

THE RAILWAY PENSION LAW

(La Prensa.—November 16).

The railway law is now in force, and, says La Prensa doubts have already arisen as to the proper interpretation of one of its clauses. This is not surprising seeing that both the laws and ordinances of this country are frequently obscure, a defect that is especially important when the matter dealt with concerns the relations between government and the governed. In enumerating the funds that go to support the pension law it is stated that the capital will include "the retention of half the first month's salary." At first sight, says La Prensa, it looks as though this referred to the first month's salary earned by the employee in the service of the company, but this reading is complicated by the further statement that "the employees and workmen must pay up in twenty-four monthly instalments, the amount of half the first month's salary." Here is where the difficulty arises; which month's salary is meant? Is it what was paid when the employee first entered the service of the company, or does it refer to the salary ruling when the law became effective?

It is generally assumed, continues La Prensa, that new laws are not retro-active; an assumption that puts the idea of the original salary out of court. But if that be the case, why was not the present salary clearly indicated? Here is where the difficulty arises, and in the meantime the Western Railway has abstained from rebating the salaries of its employees until the point is cleared up. Other companies have taken the original salary, whilst some are working on the salary ruling when the law was put into force. Hence confusion, all the more inexcusable, says La Prensa, seeing that the matter treated of was not in any way difficult or obscure. Probably there is something in the discussions on the bill that may help to elucidate the point, but that does not alter the fact that the law itself ought to have been drawn up clearly and succinctly, and the government will do well to clear the difficulty up without delay.

OFFICIAL CONSIGNEES

(La Nación.—November 16).

According to official information, says La Nación, the operations realised by the public markets in the distribution and sale of produce consigned to the Intendencia show a marked increase. The consignments from the Provinces of Buenos Aires, Santa Fé, Mendoza, San Juan, Entre Rios and Corrientes are being considerably augmented, and it is hoped that this activity will extend to other and more distant provinces. Statistics for the last month show that appreciable quantities of officially consigned products, comprising game, fruit, vegetable, eggs, etc., were sold in the markets and fairs of the capital. The experiment has demonstrated that this system of official consignment is capable of considerable expansion, given a proper organisation capable of attending to the transactions which are every day growing more important and complicated. Having successfully passed the experimental stage, says La Nación, it is desirable that the Intendencia follow up their initiative and provide the means and resources necessary to the proper carrying on of the movement. But, asks La Nación, is the Intendencia in a position to assume this function and to definitely pledge itself to the furtherance of the innovation and cope with the operations which promise to become of great magnitude. That is the question. Up to now the ordinary personnel of the markets has been sufficient to attend to the distribution and sale of the products sent in from the provinces. It is evident however that at no distant date the number of employees will require to be considerably augmented in order to cope with the ever increasing volume of business, La Nación suggests that the markets be transformed into consignment houses which should receive and negotiate the merchandise from all the centres of production of the Republic, regulate the question of supply and demand, and thus assure that the produce finds its way from the producer direct to the consumer. To successfully co-operate with the producers, the question of official consignment must be confronted by the Intendencia on a proper commercial basis now that it has been proved that the initial experiment has been a decided success.

THE ITALO-ARGENTINE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

(La Prensa.—November 17).

Well worthy of mention are the efforts made in Genoa by the Italo-Argentine Chamber of Commerce, the city which is undoubtedly the chief commercial centre of Italy, besides being the port most intimately connected with this Republic. Without display, but with astonishing energy, remarks La Prensa, this institution carries out its functions, and a lengthy list could be made of the many important initiatives that it has set afoot, initiatives that have proved beneficial to the industrial and trading relations of both countries. There is also a fortnightly Bulletin published in Italian contributors to which are found among the leading economists and commercial authorities who are acquainted with the position and future prospects of this country. It is in short, says La Prensa, a complete reflection of the commercial and economic life of the Argentine Republic, and deals especially with the import and export trade, customs tariffs, and such similar matters as may be of interest to those engaged in Italo-Argentine commerce.

In No. 5 Year III the Bulletin reproduces the circular drawn up by Dr. Cappellini, Commercial Attaché of the Italian Legation here, and sent out in the month of August to all the merchants and manufacturers throughout the Peninsula, wherein attention is directed to the new perspectives afforded in this part of the world to Italian trade; a report that the afore-said Chamber of Commerce not only supports but promises to do all that lies in its power to help towards getting the trade. There also appears, under the suggestive title, "Good Meat and Good Friends," an essay by Professor Lorini dealing with the shipment of frozen meat and asking whether the moment has not come for putting this trade on a broader and firmer base than existed before the war. Critical studies of the state of our markets, absolutely impartial, go to make up a publication that is a credit to the Italo-Argentine Chamber of Commerce, besides being of general utility to this country as tending to expand still further the import and export movement between Argentina and Italy.

WINSTON CHURCHILL

(La Nación.—November 17).

Resigning the post of Chancellor to the Grand Duchy of Lancaster, Mr. Winston Churchill is preparing to rejoin his regiment now on active service in France. Undoubtedly, says La Nación, given Mr. Churchill's temperament, this has been what he wished to do for a long time past, for even if it be admitted that the functions of Chancellor to the Duchy are merely nominal, the same could not be said of his post as First Lord of the Admiralty. There he had both work and responsibility. Yet as a descendant of Marlborough he could not feel content to sit at home in safety drawing a large salary the while millions of his fellow countrymen fought and died in the trenches of Flanders, the Balkans, and the Dardanelles. Thus the great and almost unanimous ovation which greeted his last speech in the House was something more than a mere friendly tribute. Few ministers have been criticised as he has been. Conservatives were against him because he professed to be more of a Radical than even Lloyd George; the Labour party attacked him because again and again he asked for more money for the navy, and because they judged him a danger to the peace of the realm, that peace which in their simplicity they believed Germany to be so loath to break. Then Beresford and some others, removed from command as being adverse to good management, were never tired of pointing out that he was ruining the navy.

It is true that Winston Churchill

SEAMENS MISSION CONCERT

A SPLENDID PROGRAMME.

Wednesday, Nov. 17

It never seems to affect the Sailors' Home concerts whether or not there are a number or a scarcity of ships in port. They are always good, always entertaining. The concert last night was arranged by Mrs. Evans, matron of the British Hospital, and a fine programme it was, with Mrs. Heslop at the piano, both in solos and the whole of the burden of accompaniments. Miss Kathleen Knight, Mrs. Richards, Mr. Ellis Griffen, Sister Dowling, Nurse Boothby, Mr. Brady and Mrs. Evans herself. It was a regular treat, and eminently appreciated.

Mrs. Richards was in great form, and had to sing seven songs before her audience would allow her to rest. Mr. Ellis Griffen has never yet failed, and so long as he sings at concerts never will fail to entertain. He was just as good and just as generous as ever.

Miss Knight sang splendidly. Nurse Dowling was enthusiastically encored, and a new feature was presented by Sister Dowling with her club swinging. The whole evening was very enjoyable and thoroughly appreciated.

The programme was as follows:—

Pianoforte solo, Mrs. Heslop. Song "Maire my girl," Rev. Brady. Song, "A little bit of Heaven," encore "Until," Miss K. Knight. Song "Jane," encores, "Far, far away" and "Bad boy," Mr. Griffen. Recitation, "A news boy's debt," Nurse Boothby (encored). Club swinging, Sister Dowling (encored). Song, "The same sort of boy and the sort of girl," encore, "Till the boys come home," and "Sue, sue, sue," Mrs. Richards.

Piano solo, Mrs. Heslop. Song, "The Grip," encore "That's all," Mr. Griffen. Recitation, "Which of them," Nurse Boothby. Song, "Follow the sergeant," encores, "Tipperary" and "The Quaker Girl," Mrs. Richards. Song, "Little Green Home in the West," Mrs. Evans. Song, "My Little Irish Home," Mr. Brady. National anthem.

INTERNED GERMAN STEAMERS

TO BE USED BY ITALIAN GOVERNMENT.

"Il Seccolo" announces that the Italian Government is to fit out and make use of the German ships interned in Italian ports. Four of these which are lying at Genoa have a total displacement of 32,000 tons.

had run counter to accepted traditions, continues La Nación. Was he not a newspaper correspondent in the Hispano-American War? Everyone applauded his audacity in the South African War, but he was severely criticised for his attack on Kitchener when the latter profaned the Mahdi's tomb. Then there was the Sydney Street affair, when 3000 soldiers were called out, to say nothing of guns, to capture a gang of thieves who had robbed and murdered a jeweller. But Mr. Asquith knew his man and retained him in the Cabinet as long as he possibly could. The cabled extracts of his speech show that his defence of naval affairs whilst under his charge was on the whole good. All the world realises that to him in large measure is due the fact that the British fleet was ready to take from the outset the command of the sea. Thus Winston Churchill does not retire as a beaten man from the ministry that he has adorned. Great though was his love of peace he foresaw clearly the danger that lay in the increase of German naval power and counted no sacrifice too great to enable England to hold her premier position. These records cannot be affected by the immediate causes of his resignation. He now goes to the battle line and if the glory of dying for his country is not his, then it is safe to say that she may yet look to receive much help and guidance at his hands in the future.

AIRCRAFT IN THE WARAeroplane Offensive: The New Phase*WHERE THE BRITISH LEAD

(By an Aeronautical Correspondent).

London.

Sir John French on October 1 reported that in the previous seven days seventeen air combats occurred, in only one of which was the British machine worsted. This news ought to be particularly welcome to those who have had gloomy forebodings of an alleged recent great relative improvement in the fighting power of the German aeroplane. When in the spring Sir John French reported the occurrence of a large number of aerial duels in which the British had got the best of it, the gloomy prophets assured us that this referred to a state of affairs unhappily past and that the conditions then supervening showed the enemy to advantage. It was even suggested that the true facts of the case were being withheld, either for the purpose of soothing the soft-backed British public or of whitewashing those responsible for the efficiency of the Flying Services! However, Sir John French's statement is definite and explicit, and of course it carries more weight than the chance conversation of a wounded subaltern invalidated home and having had no opportunity of seeing more than a small corner of the fighting.

AIRCRAFT AND RAILWAYS.

The Allies' advance, when it came, was marked by an aircraft offensive on an unprecedented scale, the usual objective being the railway lines at the rear of the enemy's position. Great execution was done, many trains being wrecked, thus blocking the traffic by damaging the permanent way, and stations and warehouses were burnt.

The rapid growth of the power of aeroplane offensive should be very carefully noted, for it is of the most tremendous import to Great Britain. It is occurring together with steady increase in the range of flight of aeroplanes; while we are confronted with the certainty of an even more rapid increase in range of flight in the immediate future. The situation is this, the progress that has been made has been with single-engine aeroplanes; the multiple-engine machine, although a potential success, is not yet in the field in large numbers. But the day is at hand when it will be, and then aeroplane offensive will take on a new phase. It is no exaggeration to say that the advantages of the insular position of these islands will then largely be neutralised.

That is a situation that must be faced and remedied, and it can only be remedied in one way. Just as our island advantages have in the past depended upon the possession of an all-powerful fleet and adequate defences of important harbours, so in the future must we be defended against aerial attack and be prepared on our part to attack an enemy by air. The latter implies the possession of an all-powerful aerial fleet. The former means that every railway line and every point of strategical importance or military value must be supplied with anti-aircraft defences and aerial defending craft. Further, the necessary organisation and intelligence services to enable these defences to work efficiently must be

BRITAIN'S NEW PERIL.

The whole conception of national defence will have to be modified, and the nation must cast aside old ideas and approach the question with a fresh mind. For the first time in history we find ourselves in much the same position as Continental countries, inasmuch as the sea no longer affords a barrier, and our aerial frontier is bounded by that of the enemy. This inevitably means that national defence becomes an even more urgent question for every one of us, for the danger menaces the doors and roofs of every home, and we no longer dare scamp our duty with a begrudged contribution to the Navy and a blind faith—never yet misplaced—in that Navy. The hardship will not be without compensating advantage in the education in public spirit of quite a lot of people who had grown to feel aloof from and superior to the sentiment of nationality and who liked to ignore the fact that wars are just as common occurrences as ever they were.

PUBLIC HEALTH STATISTICSINCREASE IN MEASLES.

The weekly bulletin published by the Asistencia of the Capital shows that there is still a tendency for cases of a tuberculous nature to increase.

Another point deserving of immediate governmental regulation is the alarming increase in the cases of measles. The figures are as follows and are compared with those of the previous year. There are no cases of small-pox. Tuberculosis, 1914, 67; 1915, 70. Measles, 1914, 2; 1915, 15. Typhoid, 1914, 7; 1915, 2. Diphtheria, 1914, 3; 1915, 6. Croup, 1914, 6, and 1915, 6.

THE COST OF AUSTRALIAN TRANSPORTS

To convey the large number of men forming the Australian Imperial Expeditionary Forces from the Commonwealth to Egypt, and thence to the Dardanelles, made heavy demands on the available shipping accommodation in Australia at the time. The Prime Minister of the Commonwealth referred to this phase of the war's operations during a recent speech. He said that 70 ships had been taken up and fitted out as transports or hospital ships, and, in addition, six detained enemy vessels had been fitted up and were being utilised for transport purposes. These latter ships had been provided with crews, stores, etc., and are completely run by the Department of the Navy. The cost of transport services, viz., £6,500,000, was included in the vote for the Expeditionary Forces, and was made up as follows: Liability in respect of hire of transports and hospital ships, £5,500,000; fitting and recommissioning vessels, £195,000; coal and water, £700,000; extra wages (Commonwealth rates) £75,000; victualling troops on voyage, £426,000; Suez Canal dues, pilotage, horse gear, incidentals, £505,000; total, £7,300,000. Salaries, wages, stores, coal, and general maintenance of enemy vessels used as transports, £200,000; total, £7,500,000; deduct estimated receipts in respect of cargo carried on transports, such receipts being credited to the vote for the Expeditionary Forces, £1,000,000; total, £6,500,000. Of the net amount of £6,500,000 required, it was estimated that £1,000,000 would ultimately be recovered from the Admiralty, reducing the net charge to £5,500,000. Commonwealth transports were frequently taken over for long or short periods by the Admiralty, and the voyages of the transports were also subject to deviation. The additional expense on the Admiralty account involved to the Commonwealth was estimated for 1915-16 at £1,000,000. The total cost of running these transports was in the first place paid by the Commonwealth, and the claim for such portion was not a Commonwealth charge but was rendered against the Admiralty.

SHIPPING FINANCE

At a meeting of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, held in Montreal on Wednesday, Oct. 6, approval was expressed of the proposal to acquire the Allan Line. The Allans are now practically out of business as ship-owners, and become loading brokers and freight and passenger agents for their late ships.

The report of the Cuban Steamship Company states that the profits for the year ended May 31 were £39,412, and £7,693 was brought forward. Interim dividends of 2½ per cent. and 10 per cent. have already been paid, and a further distribution of 12½ per cent. is recommended, making 25 per cent. for the twelve months; £11,000 is written off for depreciation, carrying forward £12,481.

Smith's Dock Company, Limited, announce that, as all their works have been made controlled establishments as from Aug. 18, it has been decided to carry the financial year to that date, instead of terminating it on June 30, and to pay a further interim dividend at the rate of 7½ per cent., making 10 per cent. for the year. The question of a final distribution will be considered later.

The directors of the Commonwealth and Dominion Line, Limited, recommend a bonus of 2 per cent., free of income-tax, on the ordinary shares, making 8 per cent. for the year, placing £10,000 to a staff superannuation fund and carrying £48,918 forward.

The directors of the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company, Limited, have paid an interim dividend of 5½ per cent. (11s. per share), less income-tax, on the preference shares for the year ended June 30.

An interim dividend of 3 per cent. on the ordinary shares, less income-tax, is announced by the directors of the General Steam Navigation Company, Limited.

The directors of the Clan Line have declared an interim dividend of 25s. per £10 share, free of income-tax, on the ordinary shares for the half-year ended June.

An interim dividend of 4 per cent. for the six months ended June 30, 1915, free of income-tax, is being paid by the African Steamship Company, Limited.

TRIAL TRIP.

Messrs. Workman, Clark and Co., Limited, recently sent on her trials the fruit-carrying steamer "San Pablo," which they have built for the United Fruit Company, of Boston and New York. The new steamer, which is of 4,000 tons gross, has been specially designed for the owners' trade from the estuaries of the large rivers on the Pacific Coast of America, via the Panama Canal, and in addition to superior accommodation for about 120 first-class passengers, the internal economy of the vessel provides for large general fruit and refrigerated freight cargoes. The public and private rooms have all been arranged with a view to securing the maximum of pleasure and comfort for those who travel by these steamers. The eight compartments into which the cargo space is divided have been insulated and prepared for the carriage of fruit in bulk and the delivery of these cargoes in marketable conditions ensured by an efficient installation of refrigerating machinery. The vessel will be propelled by a set of improved triple-expansion engines constructed by the builders and designed to drive her at a speed of about 15 knots. The "San Pablo" is 380ft. in length, and has been built under special survey for the highest class in the British Corporation Registry of Shipping. After the trials, which were in all respects satisfactory, the steamer proceeded to Glasgow to load cargo for United States ports.

LORD ST. DAVIDS PUBLICLY REBUKED

"No Gentleman Would Have Said
What He Did."

STERN COMMENT BY EARL DERBY

Voluntary System on Final Trial

London, Nov. 24.

At the Stock Exchange Lord Derby addressed an intensely patriotic meeting on the subject of voluntary enlistment.

His Lordship referred with the greatest indignation to the recent speeches of Lord St. Davids and Lord Ribblesdale in the House of Lords bringing certain charges against the British General Staff. He said that on many occasions he had been at the headquarters of the Staff and he knew that there was not a word of truth in what Lord St. Davids has said.

Lord Derby then remarked: "I will sum up Lord St. Davids' speech in a very few words:—No gentleman would have said what he did, and no gentleman will believe it."

Lord Derby went on to say that he had not come to the Stock Exchange to recruit men for the ranks, but to request the cooperation of the members at the present moment. No man had the right to say that he could not be spared from his present employment. Apart from the numbers he expected to get, the moral effect upon both Allies and enemies must be taken into account, as demonstrating that the voluntary spirit of England is as strong as at the beginning of the war. It was the duty of every man to present himself to the local tribunal in order to determine whether or not he could be spared from the work upon which he may be engaged.

"We hope, with patience, to prove that we can do as well under the voluntary system as Germany had done with compulsion. We can count on large numbers of men enlisting, but they must do so in still larger numbers during the next three weeks if the position of the voluntary system is to be made absolutely unassailable.

"Whether we do this or not, we shall win this campaign; but it is of no use to make this assertion unless every man does his duty in this crisis."

German Trenches Taken

PROGRESS OF FRENCH TROOPS.

Paris, Nov. 24.

Official despatches from the front in France report that to the north of Arras the French succeeded in capturing several of the enemy's trenches after a brisk engagement. A violent artillery duel is now going on in the same region, the French batteries having the best of the argument.

The War Office announces that the French continue to advance in the region north of Arras. The enemy has ineffectually attempted several counter-attacks.

The French have been reinforced and are pressing forward with redoubled energy.

Germany's Food Supplies

PRESS ATTACK ON THE GOVERNMENT.

New York, Nov. 24.

According to a telegram from Berlin, the "Volks Zeitung" urges the Reichstag to call the German Government to account for its failure to deal with the problem of supplying food-stuffs. The paper says that the question of supply is one of the greatest military importance and must be carried through before winter. This doubtless will be recognised by the supreme commander of the army, whose orders in the matter will meet with no opposition. The paper recommends the appointment of an economic Dictator to deal with the question of military clothing.

THE COMMAND IN FRANCE

MR. ASQUITH'S STATEMENT

London, Nov. 24.

A cable message from Melbourne states that the Government of the Australian Commonwealth has decided to equip another contingent of 50,000 men and place them at the disposal of the British military authorities.

The Australians have so far contributed 300,000 men to the defence of the British Empire, and are ready to make still further sacrifices.

Prisoners in Germany

EFFECT OF AMERICAN AMBASSADOR'S KINDLY ACTION.

London, Nov. 24.

Belgian Ministers

LEAVING FOR THE UNITED STATES.

London, Nov. 24.

The Belgian commissioners Van de Vyvere and De Wiart have embarked for the United States by the liner Adriatic.

The Belgian Legation here has issued a statement announcing that the report that appeared in the "Belgische Dagblad" that the Belgian Ministers of Finance and Justice were going to America to contract a loan is incorrect. The object of the voyage is not to obtain a loan, but merely to inspect the performance of the contracts connected with supplies for the Belgian army.

Spain and the Allies

BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK'S VIEWS.

London, Nov. 24.

The Bishop of Southwark, writing to the "Times" on his recent visit to Spain, says: "We shall achieve more by practical friendship than by trying to convince those who, for the present, have not fully realised what Germany is actually doing. The number of pro-Germans is in reality very small, and they are found chiefly among the military, who admire German methods of training soldiers, or among the ultra-montane clergy. Let us not therefore irritate a nation having historic and noble traditions of which they are justly proud, nor should we expect them to look at everything in the same way that we do."

Sweep out the Germans!

GENERAL SMUTS' POLICY IN EAST AFRICA.

London, Nov. 24.

General Smuts, Minister for War of the South African Union, is journeying through the country on a grand recruiting campaign.

In one of his recent addresses the General declared that it is the duty of the Union to see that the ambition of Germany in regard to founding a great colonial empire in South Africa be brought to nought. To do this it is necessary to organise a large army against German East Africa and sweep the Germans out of the country.

ABANDONMENT OF DARDANELLES CAMPAIGN.

Result of Joffre's Representations to Britain

GENERAL MONRO TO COMMAND RETREAT

Great War to be Decided in the Balkans

GERMAN WESTERN FRONT UNBREAKABLE

Paris, Nov. 24.

Marshal Joffre's visit to London has resulted in a change in the plan of operations in the Near East.

The French Commander-in-Chief insisted on abandoning the effort to reach Constantinople by way of the Dardanelles, and Britain is to send the troops thence to Serbia, where they are to be reinforced by troops from England.

Consequently the recent offensive on Gallipoli peninsula was more a diversion to cover the embarkation of the troops, and most of the British are being rushed to the Balkans.

This is confirmed by the statement made by the French commander of the troops round Kourstorna before the visit of Marshal Joffre to England, that threequarters of the British at Gallipoli had been withdrawn by way of France, and that the remainder would hold the positions won with the protection of the fleet.

It had already been decided that owing to the state of the weather it was impossible for the fleet to aid any further effort to reach Constantinople; and General Monro was despatched to the Dardanelles not to make attacks, but merely to command the retreat and embarkation of the troops.

Marshal Joffre is said to have told the Council of War that the battle of Loos was impractical, and that its effect was incommensurate to the cost in lives and ammunition. The Western front was unbreakable; but the only hope of drawing the war to a climax was to make a great effort in the Balkans.

Finally Marshal Joffre won his point and was allowed a free hand, resulting in the retirement of the British from Gallipoli to Salonica being decided upon. They are now being landed there, in addition to some 8,000 troops sent out from England, together with every available man from France, with the object that the great war may be decided in the Balkans.

Military men believe that the Balkan campaign will not last so long as that in France and Russia, but it will be of a most sanguinary character.

Paris, Nov. 23.

The Cross of the Legion of Honour has been awarded to Lieutenant Charles Sweeney of San Francisco, for bravery in leading the Foreign Legion at the opening of the battle of Champagne, where he was wounded.

British Consul Arrested

BY THE PERSIAN AUTHORITIES

London, Nov. 24.

The Secretary of State for the Foreign Office has announced that Mr. O'Connor, the British consul at Shiraz, and the Manager of the Imperial Bank at that place, have been arrested by the Persian authorities there without the knowledge of the Government and conveyed to Borasjan.

It is understood that the gendarmes who effected the arrest acted at the instigation of the Germans. They stated that war had been declared and that they were acting under orders from Teheran.

Strict Neutrality

YUAN SHIH-KAI'S POLICY.

New York, Nov. 23.

Despatches from Peking state that the proposals made to China that she should join the Powers of the Entente have not met with a favourable reception from President Yuan Shih-Kai.

It is the desire of the President to maintain a strict neutrality, and he is averse to taking any step which would injuriously affect the good relations which exist between China and Germany.

"A MISUNDERSTANDING"

Constantine's View of Cause of Blockade

WHAT GREECE REALLY MEANS

London, Nov. 24.

Telegrams from Salonica report that the French Minister, M. Denys Cochin, who had gone thither with the intention of proceeding to the French lines on the Vardar, has returned to Athens in consequence of the complications between Greece and the Powers of the Entente.

King Constantine is reported to have assured Lord Kitchener that he had not the slightest intention of disarming or internment of the forces of the Allies in the event of their being compelled to take refuge in Greece, notwithstanding the fact that many Austrians, including a number of officers, had been interned in Greek territory.

The King considers that the announcement that the Allies had proclaimed the blockade of Greece was a misunderstanding arising out of the existing situation and easy of rectification.

Greece is prepared to guarantee to the Entente that she will only maintain in Macedonia on a war footing sufficient troops to defend her territory, in view of the possibility that the Allies may find themselves obliged to abandon the campaign in the Balkans, in which case Greek Macedonia would lie at the mercy of Bulgaria, victorious and with an army already in the field.

M. PICHON'S CONFIDENCE.

Paris, Nov. 24.

M. Pichon, the former French Minister, in an article to the Press, expresses the belief that the geographical situation of Greece excludes all danger of her joining forces with the Central Empires, and it is inconceivable that Rumania, with her profound hatred of Turkey, would ever fight against Russia. Neither of these States however will abandon their attitude of neutrality until the Allies have won a signal victory in the Balkans.

In any case, whatever steps the two Balkan States may take, their action cannot have any definite influence upon the final result, which will be decided on the French and Russian fronts.

ATTITUDE OF GREECE AND RUMANIA.

London, Nov. 24.

The announcement of the Foreign Office that there is no blockade of the Greek coast is generally considered to be a diplomatic way of informing the world that King Constantine is making his final attempt to resist, and that the tremendous naval power of the Entente is ready to come into action.

There is no doubt that great effect has been produced in Greece by the declaration of Lord Kitchener that the Allies are certain of victory, and that the 4,000,000 troops which Britain will soon have in the field, united to the 18,000,000 of Russia, France, and Italy, will induce King Constantine to accede to the demands of the Allies. This does not include the intervention of Greece in the war, a step however to which she will undoubtedly be driven.

Died To Save Others

HEROISM OF AUSTRALIAN SOLDIER.

Genoa, Nov. 23.

An act of heroism is recorded as having been performed by one of the Australian contingent, a man named Linton, who was on board the British transport Southland when she was torpedoed in the Aegean on September 2, by sacrificing his own life to save others.

The local newspapers of to-day relate that the boats found him swimming and went to his rescue; but he told them not to mind about him but to save others who were weaker, and continued swimming. When ultimately taken out of the water he died of exhaustion.

Restraining the Landlord

BRITISH GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO RESTRICT RENTS

Pirate's Boast

"NO MUNITIONS FACTORIES IN THE STATES WITHIN SIX MONTHS."

Bulgarian Grain

ARRIVES IN GERMANY.

Zurich, Nov. 23.

A telegram from Bucharest reports that the first consignment of grain from Bulgaria has arrived in Germany.

Another despatch from Sofia says that the Bulgarian Premier Radoslavoff is reported to have announced that express trains will be running between Sofia and Buda Pest as soon as the line is repaired.

Teutons in Retreat

ANOTHER FAILURE IN GALICIA

Petrograd, Nov. 24.

Despatches from the Russian line of battle in Galicia state that the enemy attempted to take the offensive in the sector of Trembowla. Although he had assembled a large force for the purpose he was compelled to retreat with losses of importance.

to take by the rapacity of the Bulgarians and Turks.

The latest despatches from Athens report that the Serbians have resumed the offensive on the plains of Kossovo; that the Bulgarians have been defeated by the French; that the Italians have landed in Albania, and that the Russians have 350,000 well equipped forces concentrated in Bessarabia.

When this last-named army is ready to take the field, Rumania, who has hitherto been restrained by the tyrannical methods of Germany, will join the forces of the Entente.

SERBIAN ARMY'S FIGHT FOR LIFE

Dash For Uskub and Veles

CONCENTRATION ON KOSSOVO PLAINS

Serbian Capital Removed To Scutari

Paris, Nov. 24.

From telegrams from Salonica it appears that the Serbian forces under General Bokovitch are now opposing a thin screen to the Austro-German advance while the main forces concentrate on the Kossovo plains.

General Bokovitch has an army of 90,000 men opposing 12,000 Bulgarians in the defiles of Katchabek and Kortchou.

The Serbians will make an attempt to dash into Uskub and then into Veles to join the French there.

In order that the battle shall end in anything but suicide, the operation must be carried out energetically and success achieved with promptness.

There is reason to believe that the Bulgarians will not occupy Monastir until Austro-German reinforcements arrive.

SERBIAN CAPITAL NOW SCUTARI.

Paris, Nov. 24.

The Serbian Minister in Paris announces that the capital of Serbia has been removed to Scutari with the consent of the Montenegrin Government.

BULGARIANS IN RETREAT.

Paris, Nov. 24.

The Bulgarians have been defeated everywhere in the extreme south of Serbia, and are retreating at all points.

It is reported that Istib and Veles are in imminent danger of being recaptured from the Bulgarians.

A telegram from Salonica published by the "Petit Journal" says that the British Prime Minister has telegraphed to Serbia to stand firm in the assurance that the Allies will carry through the expedition. The Minister said:—

"I can assure you that that France and England are preparing surprises in the Balkans, and that before long this will be corroborated."

APPALLING FLIGHT OF CIVILIAN POPULATION.

London, Nov. 24.

Probably half the population of Serbia has taken refuge in the Kossovo district, where they are in a state of destitution owing to the scarcity of food. They are without shelter and exposed to the weather, while cattle are dying in hundreds through lack of fodder. The retreat into Albania is closed through lack of the means of transport.

TO BE TAKEN "WITH A GRAIN OF SALT."

London Nov. 24.

The evening papers publish news of German origin received from Copenhagen which states that the German and Bulgarian troops near Pristria defeated the Serbians capturing some thousands of prisoners and a number of guns.

At the same time the papers warn the public that the news is to be accepted with reserve on account of its suspicious origin, and that the same mental attitude should be maintained in regard to messages transmitted to the United States by wireless.

SERBIANS REINFORCED.

Athens, Nov. 24.

The Serbian forces at Monastir have received reinforcements of troops from Govdvar, Krushevo, Dibra and Ochrida. They have also received a large number of guns and ammunition from Salonica.

The Serbians occupy all the positions southeast of Prilep.

ALBANIANS DEFEATED BY SERBIAN TROOPS.

New York, Nov. 24.

The Central News Agency announces having received information that the Serbians have defeated the Albanians who were attempting to oppose their retreat.

Italy and the Balkans

REPORTED DESPATCH OF TROOPS TO ALBANIA.

London, Nov. 24.

The Official Press Bureau publishes news received from the Mediterranean concerning the participation of Italy in the war in the Balkans.

According to this report, a convoy of eighteen transports has arrived at the port of San Giovanni di Medua on the Albanian coast a little to the south of the Montenegrin port of Antivari, and has commenced to land troops of infantry and artillery, motor lorries, ammunition and stores of all kinds.

The troops will go into camp at a spot already prepared for them, whence they will proceed to the Serbian frontier to join the Allied forces already in campaign.

It is believed that a Prince of the Royal House of Savoy is one of the commanders of the Italian contingent, which is the first of several which are momentarily expected to arrive.

LANDING ON THE ALBANIAN COAST.

Rome, Nov. 24.

The newspapers have published telegrams of foreign origin announcing that strong contingents of Italian troops were on Monday landed on the coast of Albania. The censor has allowed the despatches to pass, but the Governmental papers publish no news regarding the matter.

It is stated in official circles that there is no real foundation for the rumour.

TO STRIKE AT AUSTRIAN INVADERS

London, Nov. 24.

The Italian forces which are being landed on the Albanian coast will cross that territory in the direction of the Serbian frontier, the plan being to strike at the Austro-German forces engaged in the southern drive through Serbia. The Montenegrins are expected to cooperate in the march through Albania over fifty miles of very difficult mountainous country without roads.

Fear of Russian Advance

Amsterdam, Nov. 24.

AUSTRIAN GENERALS APPEAL TO GERMANY

Ever-Increasing Pressure by Italian Troops

New York, Nov. 24.

The "Evening Sun" publishes a despatch from its correspondent in Italy which states that the Italian offensive in the Isonzo region is formidable.

News from various sources state that the Austrian Generals have held a council of war at Laibach to consider the state of affairs, which it was agreed was critical. It was decided to inform Germany that it was not enough to supply artillery and material of war and to request her to send contingents of infantry to defend the Trentine Tyrol and the Isonzo lines.

The Austrian council of war confessed that the troops defending Gorizia are at the last extremity and that it would be impossible to prevent the enemy from breaking through the lines there.

Rome, Nov. 24.

The evening papers announce that Italian aviators who have been reconnoitring the enemy's lines on the lower Isonzo report great activity among the enemy's forces everywhere, reinforcements being brought up to points which have suffered most from the Italian attacks.

The fighting in this sector is of an extremely violent character.

Despatches from Verona state that notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, the Austrian and Italian patrols are constantly reconnoitring the country lying between the two armies north of Ledro Valley, and there is a good deal of skirmishing in consequence. LORD DERBY'S WARNING VOLUNTARY SYSTEM'S LAST CHANCE

PROBABILITY OF CONSCRIPTION

London, Nov. 20.

Lord Derby has delivered another address on the subject of voluntary service, which is regarded as the precursor of military service being enforced by Act of Parliament.

In a speech before a large and important assemblage, Lord Derby said:—

"This will be the last effort that will be made to retain the voluntary system.

"It is a call upon the people of this country to offer their services for their country. It is a call that I trust will not be made in vain.

"It is a call that gives every man the opportunity of serving his King and his country.

"He who still remains inert is the man who wishes to see his country overwhelmed by all the horrors in which Belgium has been plunged.

"He remains aloof because he is afraid to play the part of a man.

"And if, after all we have done, it is only this kind of man who still keeps out of it, you may be sure that the community will not offer much resistance to his being made to do what falls to his lot in the race of common danger."

JOHN REDMOND, M.P.

VISITS THE WESTERN FRONT.

London, Nov. 22.

The accounts of Mr. John Redmond's visit to the British firing lines in France and Flanders state that on that occasion he received his baptism of fire. Mr. Redmond visited the Irish contingents from both the north and the south of Ireland, and in each case he was greeted with acclamations.

In the course of his speech, Mr. Redmond said:—

"I speak as a man who has had experience of those of my race who have left the seal of their valour upon France, in Flanders and in Gallipoli, the men who to-day are fighting and to-morrow may die. I am returning to Ireland to tell them there that you are worthy of your country.

"I can promise you that when Ireland hears the tale that I have to tell of your glorious deeds, she will send two men to take the place of every Irishman who falls defending the liberty of the world."

THE WAR AND THE WORKSHOPS

HOW BRITAIN'S LABOUR RESPONDED TO THE CALL

London, Nov. 20.

The correspondent of the "New York Herald" reports an interview by "Lloyd's Weekly News" with Lord Murray of Elibank Director of Recruiting for the Munitions Department.

Lord Murray said that more than a million men and women are labouring with continuous vigour and turning out an ever increasing supply of munitions for the prosecution of the Land War.

The Trade Unions fired with determination to win this war for Freedom, have patriotically surrendered rights won after centuries of fighting, rights which must be restored to them after the Allies have marched, as Monsieur Briand said, through victory to peace.

These men are working from sixty to one hundred hours a week and every quarter shows an astonishing increase in their efficiency due to their zeal.

Many thousands of women are engaged in making shells. The marvellous result of this great department is the result of the superhuman efforts made by Mr. Lloyd George to organise it for war, the splendid staff of business men supporting him and the men and women working and doing often much more than their bit, now that the men at the front.

They are all thoroughly awake to the fact that this is an Engineers' war, and they know that it is "the last ounce of weight and the last lap that tells," as the King said, "which will win."

"We are turning out the greatest amount and the best work, too, in the world in ships, guns, armour, shells, rifles and bullets; all are pouring from the factories, in an unending stream, destined to increase steadily every month until Germany finds that she is overwhelmed with her own special weapons and the glory of Krupp's and its forty years of organisation will go down in ruin before the efforts of this, so-called amateur and unbusinesslike nation.

"Just as America in the great Civil War improvised huge armies, discovered fighting generals of great ability, and astonished the world by the valour, persistence and efficiency manifested on both sides, so I believe will the labourer, employer and the Government here all working together in harmony, astonish the world, even that German world which lives on and in the belief that its machinery is always omnipotent. We shall win and produce a victorious and lasting peace."

DISTURBANCES IN INDIA

QUELLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

London, Nov. 19.

Replying to a question in the House of Commons regarding the condition of British India, the Secretary for India, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, said that disturbances had been promoted there by an anti-British association which had its headquarters in the United States, whose objects were to promote disorder, corrupt the troops and overthrow authority in India.

However the people had shown their loyalty to the British Raj by resisting these attempts to lead them astray and had voluntarily offered their assistance in restoring order. The civil authorities had reported that the general situation was satisfactory.

The difficulties that had arisen had been due to movements outside India, or to a small group of fanatics, and did not reflect the sentiments of the great mass of the nation. Many of these fanatics were refugees from justice.

The Government of India is completely master of the situation.

The announcement of the Secretary of India's statement has served to tranquillise the public. The papers announce that the native Princes have given fresh proofs of their loyalty to Britain, many having offered to contribute important sums of money if necessary.

DID SOMEONE BLUNDER?

BRITISH BREAKDOWN AT LOOS

LORD ST. DAVID'S SENSATIONAL CHARGES

London, Nov. 18.

In the House of Lords yesterday, Lord Crewe stated that an enquiry would be made into the causes which prevented the British troops from continuing their victorious advance at Loos.

It seemed evident that the reserves were not brought up in time.

Lord St. Davids severely criticised the operations in France, accusing the British General Staff at the front of actual incompetence. Gross carelessness and want of organisation had been evident. He added that men who ought to be doing duty in the trenches have been put on the staff—"for reasons which were not military." Lord St. Davids added that he was informed that the British Staff in France is six times more numerous than that of Marshal Joffre, and that women visited headquarters at night and played cards there.

"This had happened," added Baron St. Davids, "at times when there were opportunities for breaking through the German lines, but owing to the deficient Staff work, the attack arrangements failed. Many good lives had been lost by the stupidity of those in high commands."

Lord Haldane, for the Government, denied the allegations, declaring that the British Staff had carried out an excellent plan of operations during the campaign, and had demonstrated the highest capabilities.

[Note: Lord St. Davids is a director of the B.A.P. Railway, and is brother of Sir Owen Philipps, Bart., of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.]

"FIGHT THE ENEMY WITH THEIR OWN WEAPONS."

Paris, Nov. 18.

M. Clemenceau, President of the Committee of War in the Senate, who is wholeheartedly in favour of the measure, bases his reasoning on the fact that the Germans in spite of the protests of the civilized world, still continue to use poison gas with great harm to the Allied troops, and that the only course is to fight the enemy with their own weapons.

It is known that M. Clemenceau has determined to adopt the most energetic measures to force the Germans out of France. This change in the attitude of M. Clemenceau receives much favourable comment, who only a few days ago was censuring the action of the military authorities and especially General Joffre.

DEATH BY POISON

GERM-INFECTED BOMBS DROPPED FROM ZEPPELINS.

London, Nov. 19.

The physicians who have been attending to the persons wounded by bombs dropped from the Zeppelins in the last raid upon London and the environs have drawn the attention of the authorities to the highly inflammatory and dangerous character of these wounds, and have asked that the subject be made a special study in the laboratories.

The doctors report that in the majority of cases of wounds produced by these bombs, serious complications have set in, almost invariably accompanied by gangrene, and generally ending in death.

The symptoms point, in the opinion of some at least of these doctors, to the bombs having been purposely infected with germs. The matter is considered to demand strict investigation, and the Italian doctors who are attending to those who were wounded under similar circumstances at Verona with apparently similar results, have been requested to send details to aid in the investigation.

DISTRESS IN GERMANY

DEPRESSION CAUSED BY THE WAR.

London, Nov. 20.

Advices from Holland show that the increase in the prices of articles of prime necessity continues in Germany, in consequence of which the struggle for existence among the poorer classes is becoming daily more arduous.

The situation affects all persons of whatever social standing who are dependent upon their wages or salaries; while the approach of winter makes the outlook still more gloomy. An outcry for higher wages has commenced among those in the cities who do not receive their supplies of food from the public offices established for the purpose.

The heaviest burden falls upon the miners and the men employed in the foundries and metal factories. The miners of the Ruhr district, who already had their wages increased some time since, are again asking for a further rise of 20 per cent. on the ground that the pay they receive is entirely inadequate to enable them to purchase food. The men have held a secret meeting which was largely attended, when petitions were drafted addressed to the owners of mines and industrial establishments as well as to the public officers, placing their case before them.

Military experts consider that the war will reach its acutest phase about next June, when Germany will begin to lose ground, and that by October Berlin will be compelled to sue for peace.

TREACHEROUS BALKAN MONARCHS

INDICTMENT BY DR. DILLON.

Rome, Nov. 18.

Dr. Dillon, the eminent publicist and authority on international politics, describes in scathing terms the venal and sordid league of treacherous monarchs in the Balkans—each anxious to sell his country's liberties—pre-arranged by the Kaiser in principle before the war broke out, and only failing in complete realisation because of the veto of their influential subjects. The policy pursued by the Entente Governments towards these men, of chivalry, trust, kindness and tact, was wholly misplaced. Effect constraint and even sternness are now the only methods to be employed in Greece's real interests and our own.

CLIMBS ROCKS BAREFOOT AND CAPTURES AUSTRIAN POSITION.

Rome, Nov. 18.

In the Alpine regiments are many members of the Alpini Club, one of whom, Lieut. Marco Elter, has just performed a feat of amazing and romantic bravery. He captured an important Austrian fortified post on an inaccessible (as was supposed) height, climbing barefoot with three soldier guides up a scarp perpendicular precipice which actually bulges over a hideous abyss. Having reached a point of vantage he let down a rope and pulled up his soldiers one by one. The Austrians were surprised and surrendered, not believing it possible that any creature without wings could have ascended that frightful wall of bare and splintered rock.

HOSTAGES AT SEA

ITALY'S PLAN TO PREVENT SUBMARINE ATTACKS.

Milan, Nov. 20.

The plan that has been devised of putting on board the steamers a number of Germans in order to prevent the vessels from being sunk by submarines is yielding good results.

The steamer Milano from Alexandria with Germans on board was stopped in the middle of the Mediterranean by a German submarine which was about to sink her; but when the commander of the submarine was aware that thirty Germans were on board he allowed the ship to continue her voyage.

In view of this it is proposed to ship a certain number of German or Austrian prisoners on each vessel.

INTERESTING NEGOTIATIONS IN THE NEAR EAST.

Washington, Nov. 19.

It is announced that Britain, France and Russia are uniting in an attempt to persuade China to join the Entente with a view to preventing possible coolness in the future and to keeping the peace in the Far East.

The news is considered to be of much importance as it is held that the attitude of China will have a marked effect upon Eastern politics.

Japan's opinion on the subject is not known; but it is considered unlikely that she will oppose the efforts of the Allies, especially as the step would safeguard her own interests.

The Government of the United States is fully aware of what is transpiring in China, but it is stated to be certain that that country will take no part in the negotiations.

CHINESE PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR?

Washington, Nov. 19.

One of the main objects of the efforts of the Triple Entente to win over China to their cause is to prevent future friction between that republic and Japan, while preserving peace in the Far East. If China agrees, it is expected that her military participation in the war will ensue.

So far the negotiations are only in the conversational stage and there is no indication as to the attitude of China.

GERMANS IN CHINA

BUSILY ENGAGED IN TRADE.

London, Nov. 20.

The "Times" publishes a communication from Pekin which declares that Germany's trade in China, far from being extinguished, is considerable. Exports of commodities owned by German financial firms are being shipped to the United States, the business being kept on with a view to a resumption of trade immediately the war terminates.

The German agents in China have plenty of money, the proceeds of the indemnity paid by the Chinese Government in consequence of the Boxer riots, and of various Anglo-German loans the interest upon which is paid by the Government to the Deutsche Asiatische Bank.

HUN PROPAGANDA IN PERSIA

SUPPRESSED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

London, Nov. 22.

The joint action of Russia and Britain in Persia has resulted in the Government of that nation taking rapid and energetic measures to stop the activity of the German and Turkish agents in causing disaffection among the people against the Allies. All persons suspected of being agitators and agents of the enemy have either been arrested or ordered to leave Persia at once.

HANGED FOR MURDER

DJEMAL PASHA'S SHORT AWAY WITH KURDS.

New York, Nov. 22.

An Oversea Agency telegram from Damascus states that Djemal Pasha, commander of the Turkish forces in Syria, has ordered two Kurdish chiefs of irregular bands to be hanged for their massacres and ill-treatment of Armenians.

(It will be recollected that Djemal Pasha was recently reputed to have made common cause with the Druses of Mount Libanus against the Turkish Government.)

YE "MAYFLOWER" SOCIAL

AT THE AMERICAN CHURCH.

A most successful social evening, both from the point of view of enjoyment and of numbers, was celebrated last evening at the American Church Hall, Calle Corrientes. The occasion was to celebrate the anniversary of the arrival of the Pilgrim Fathers at New Boston in the reign of James I.

The Church Hall had been most tastefully decorated, and a great model of the "Mayflower," the work of Mr. John Wright, stood at the top of the hall on the platform and effectively finished off the decorations. Puritan maidens presently tripped around, and in the interval dispensed refreshments.

Wild young Indians assisted in the sale of sweets and "candies," and the whole effect was original and pleasing. A musical programme had been arranged which passed away all too quickly.

Miss Meir and Miss Kenworthy after a duet were followed by Mr. Gibson Taylor in an excellent ventriloquial sketch.

Miss Dorothy Stuart Small, accompanying herself at the piano, delighted with a delicately satirical song, "When the parson comes to tea."

Mr. Lynn Hazleton sang "Barbara Fritelle." The words being those of the celebrated American poet Whitier.

Some very clever sketches were drawn by Mr. Philip Marsev, illustrating "all sorts and conditions of men, animals and things." Mr. Marsev has excellent technique, and a touch here and there greatly amused.

"Coolan Dhu," by Miss Muriel Marr, was delightfully sung and enthusiastically appreciated by the audience. Miss Millar was the accompanist.

The close of the programme was brought about by Mr. Adderley reciting "Buck Fenshaw's Funeral."

The Ladies Aid Society and the Orphanage Aid Society are to be congratulated on their arrangements and upon a very pleasant evening which most suitably celebrated an important event in history.

SAILORS' HOME CONCERT

ENJOYABLE EVENING

Miss Muriel Marr is one of the most popular and welcome artists at the Victoria Sailor's Home, and whenever she sings she is certain of a fine reception. On Nov. 20 the entertainment was of her own arranging, and the applause she received was not only long and loud, but even uproarious.

Although but a few ships are at present in port, there was a crowded Hall when Miss Millar opened the proceedings with a piano solo, which was encored. The whole way through the evening encore followed encore, and the concert was one of the most enjoyable given in a home of good concerts. Miss Marr is always good and her singing is exceptionally pleasing. On each appearance she was recalled twice over, and her singing was most enthusiastically received. Mrs. Sanderson, unfortunately through illness, was unable to sing, and her place was taken by Mr. Chiswell, who filled the gap very well. Mr. David Neild was in first class voice and form, and he was another artist that the audience refused to leave in peace.

Mr. Futeda very seldom heard at concerts, was the violinist. He played with his usual fire and with excellent expression, and was thoroughly appreciated. Mr. W. H. Thompson is a really good singer of comic songs, which he renders, well, humorously and without exaggeration.

Few as the items were, the concert owing to the number of encores, lasted until a late hour. Mrs. Millar was the accompanist, and much of the success of the evening was due to her.

The following is the programme:

Part I.
Piano solo, Humoresque, encore "Elf's Dance," (Grieg), Miss M. Millar.
Song, "I like your apron and your bonnet," and "Two eyes of Grey," Mr. Chiswell.

Violin Solo, Hungarian Rhapsodie, and Hungarian Dance, Mr. F. Uteda.
Song, "Nervana," and "Annie Laurie," Mr. D. T. Neill.

Song, "She is far from the land," "I am on my way to Dublin Bay," and "The Lady in Red," Miss Muriel Marr.
Humorous Songs, "The Ghost of the Violin," "The midnight Chu-Chu," and "The Rag-time Goblin Man," Mr. W. H. Thompson.

Part II.
Piano, Moto perpetum, encored, Miss Millar.

Song, "Mandalay," Mr. Chiswell.
Violin, Polacca, encored, Mr. Uteda.

Songs, "Wandering Minstrel," and "Roumanian Tent Song," Mr. Neill.

Songs, "The song that reached my heart," "Where my caravan has rested," and "Venetian Song," Miss Marr.
Humorous Songs, "Johrua," "Hello who's your lady friend," "Pucker up your lips, Miss Lindy," Mr. W. H. Thompson.

National Anthem.

LLOYD GEORGE'S "LEADERSHIP"

A leading article in the Observer (edited by Mr. J. L. Garvin) declares that "Mr. Lloyd George, before all other men, has given the country the leadership for which it longed," and goes on:—

"If what we have called the miniature mob of Mr. Asquith's present colleagues is indeed to be the deciding body, and if it decides at the present crisis against full effort under National Service, it will take upon itself a heavy and even terrible responsibility."

"Mr. Lloyd George and his colleagues, who will have endeavoured to move the Government to adopt a stronger course, should be allowed to disassociate themselves publicly from all responsibility for the rejection of their counsels at such an hour as this."

STEEL-CLAD SOLDIERS

INCREASING USE OF ARMOUR BY THE FRENCH.

The use of armour for protecting the most vital parts of the soldier is constantly increasing in France now that the conditions of warfare do not call for long marches or dashes of more than a limited distance over the open.

A French deputy, member of one of the Commissions of the Chamber which receives special information from the War Minister, states that since the adoption for troops in the first line of the small, close-fitting chrome steel helmet, the casualties due to wounds in the head have been reduced by 75 per cent. Even bullets striking with direct impact are sometimes turned by the helmet.

Besides the large and absolutely bullet-proof breastplates which the French also use for their dashes from trench to trench, plates of specially toughened steel are sometimes sewn into tunics over the heart.

ENGLAND IN WARTIME

Impressions of a Neutral

VIEWS OF COUNT DE BESA

During his eighteen months' journey through Europe and England, as a neutral, Count de Besa had many opportunities for studying a hundred and one interesting details and observing a number of sights which in their retelling lose but little. It was very interesting to hear what the Count de Besa's impressions of England were.

"England in war-time, and from the point of view of a neutral person, is something new," said the Count to a representative of THE HERALD yesterday.

Count de Besa visited England with his wife and at a time when there was much to be seen and to be observed. In his own words he gives his impressions.

Germans in England.

"We were in London when the British Government decided, at the general request of the Press, to put all Germans, Austrians and Turks into concentration or detention camps. No consideration was taken of the fact that many were naturalised British subjects. It was a case of and a definite feeling of the people that 'once a German, always a German.' The result was a general sweeping out of German, Austrian and Turkish employes from all kinds of places. Hotel directors, owners of private houses alike decided that only British servants could be employed. The Ritz, Carlton, Cecil, and the Piccadilly Hotel formerly had German managers. These have all gone now. Some preferred to leave for the United States to go back to Germany. One German manager was married to an Englishwoman, and in other instances they had sons in the British Army.

"Many of the hotels and restaurants display prominent notices and placards stating that no Germans, Austrians or Turks are employed upon the premises.

"At one of the newest and the largest of London hotels, the porters and carpenters are the only menfolk employed. All the other work is done by women, which shews that not only men, but women, can manage a big business successfully. This hotel contains more than 1000 bedrooms and is always full.

Attacks on German Property.

"Throughout London, in fact throughout England, anti-German feeling ran high. Many shops owned by them were attacked and in some instances set on fire. The crowds were immense, and on occasions the police were powerless to protect the owners of property or to interfere in its destruction.

"The only exception that I know is that of Appenrodt, the best known of all German restaurants. Appenrodt was severely criticised and called a German (which he really is), but he was not molested. Within the last three months he has opened a restaurant in Paris. A number of people there tried to make trouble and to smash his windows. He assured the people that, although born a German, he came to England when very young and his sympathies were on the side of the Allies.

Commander of the "Emden" and the British.

"We were in England at the time that the "Emden" was destroyed, and naturally there was much enthusiasm. I believe the British public admired Captain von Muller, its captain, who acted like a gentleman and who certainly did put up a great fight when he was cornered. How just like big-hearted England to allow the captain and officers to keep their swords after they were captured! A characteristic of the English is to admire the brave. Although an enemy, Captain von Muller was saluted in the Press as a courageous and chivalrous foe. Some of the newspapers even went so far as to express the hope that he would come to London, where they assured him a generous welcome would await him.

Recruiting.

"Recruiting is in progress all over London. It is truly wonderful to mark how the recruiting officers will talk of the war and state the facts of the great struggle now going on. Men, whom I am sure, have never spoken a word in public in their lives, seem to throw off all restraint and timidity and the flow of language makes one rub one's eyes and sometimes almost to believe that it is some well known orator who is speaking.

"I stood one day in Trafalgar Square right under the monument of the great Nelson. A Canadian was recruiting there and to my amazement, within half an hour he had convinced a dozen men of their duty and got them to join the colours. In his endeavours to obtain men to serve his King he availed himself of every opportunity and device and amongst other things, he told the following story: "One day" he said, "near me a very pretty young girl was learning on the arm of a soldierly looking young fellow. They were both attentive listeners. Suddenly I turned to them and said 'I say young man, you look pretty fit, why don't you join the ranks?' The man, thus addressed turned towards his sweetheart and then answered 'she won't let me.' I turned to the girl then and demanded, 'Now then young lady don't you know you should be helping your country, why don't you let your sweetheart do his duty and send him to fight?'

The girl answered blushing 'I have already sent five!!!'

"This story put the crowd around into a rare good humour and from then onwards recruiting became easy for the diplomatic young colour sergeant. Once he turned to a robust looking fellow and asked him why he did not join. 'I am an American' replied the man. 'Yes, an American born in Toronto' snapped the sergeant, 'you come forward and join.' The man promptly did so!

Voluntary Enlistment.

"I was amazed—astonished to see so many men voluntarily coming forward, voluntarily leaving their homes to take up arms and do their duty to their country. Many of the sons of the best families have gone to the front, some never to return. Husbands and fathers in great numbers too have left to defend their country. The sacred ties of love, the selfish greed for money making, these things did not count when duty called. Nothing was permitted to detain them. Standing there amongst that enthusiastic crowd I felt that many more volunteers would have come forward, if only the Government would let the people know the whole truth and would take the public into their confidence. Men in every walk of life, from all callings, old, young, rich and poor, married or single, even with a conviction that death might be staring them in the face came forward to join the colours and to defend the honour of England.

"In Folkestone and in Havre we met many of these men and although no bands were playing they were one and all happy and singing "Tipperary." Many of them asked us to mail them post cards they had written to their loved ones at home and this we gladly did.

"London as Usual."

"During these trying times London has not changed much. The streets and shops are crowded. Motor-buses are everywhere as usual. The activity is the same. To cross the streets at Piccadilly corner one must still be an athlete. Theatres, hotels, and restaurants do not appear to be in the least affected.

"The difference one finds is soldiers, soldiers everywhere dressed in

LEGATION DESPATCHES

Two Teuton Fabrications

DENIED BY THE FOREIGN OFFICE

The following telegrams have been received by His Britannic Majesty's Minister at Buenos Aires from the Foreign Office, London:—

Nov. 23 (5.50 p.m.)

German reports circulated in the United States announce that great conspiracy has been discovered at Cairo headed by persons in entourage of new Sultan. Conspirators are alleged to have plotted to remove Ruler and Ministers and to liberate Egypt from the British yoke. 40 persons said to have been arrested and 25 already executed. Foreign Office issue official contradiction of this rumour in which there is no word of truth.

ANOTHER TEUTON FABRICATION

Nov. 23 (9.5 p.m.)

Secretary of State for India communicates following:—

"Enemy Press recently stated that British monitor had been sunk in Tigris. Enquiries have been made and statement is found devoid of all foundation."

BILLS OF LADING

NOTICE BY BRITISH CONSULATE-GENERAL.

A Government announcement respecting the forms of consignment of merchandise, which His Majesty's Government recommend as tending to minimise the risk of delay to vessels and cargoes, has been received by the Consul-General and may be seen on application at the Consulate-General and other British Consular Offices in the Republic.

khaki and at night, with the streets dimly lighted, it is strange to see how well the people get about. Poverty practically does not exist in London. No more can be seen the old women and men seated at the street corners on boxes and asking for pennies.

Changes in the Newspaper World.

"But war has brought changes in the newspapers. Great examples are the Daily Mail and The Times belonging to Lord Northcliffe. They have daily pleaded with the Government believing that the nobleness of the English, their past and in fact all their traditions that the truth alone would bring forward men in such vast numbers that they would be the admiration of all nations.

"At the beginning this newspaper campaign was not recognised for what it was—pure patriotism. Even to these papers losses and business inconvenience occurred as the result of this. Before I left England a vast number of Englishmen had come to the conclusion the Lord Northcliffe's papers were telling the truth and that their policy represented that which was most dear and precious to all of them and was assisting the ultimate attainment of victory.

"Loyalty to the King is to-day expressed by frantic enthusiasm. To my mind the King of England is the living symbol of British unity.

"The British soldier is paid better than the soldier of any other country. Meetings to encourage them are being held everywhere. Lady French, the wife of Britain's leader at a meeting championing the cause of thrift related a humorous story:

"She asked her laundry woman who was Irish, how she was when her husband was away at the front. In an Irish tongue came the reply, 'Very well indeed,' the Government gives me a pound a week and with no mail to keep, why it's Paradise!"

NOVELIST'S SUICIDE

DRAMATIC END OF ANNESLEY KENEALY

London, Nov. 19.

A tragic occurrence took place to-day at the conclusion of a case which had been some days before the Court, wherein the novelist, Miss Annesley Kenealy, claimed damages against a wholesale book-distributing firm for alleged false and malicious statements defamatory to a book which claimant had published.

The distributors refused to circulate the book, alleging that it contained a libel upon a fashionable West End dressmaker, whose premises are described as a gambling den.

The verdict of the Court was given against Miss Kenealy, who thereupon took poison, and exclaiming, "I told you that you were trying a woman for her life! I have taken enough poison to kill five people," and threw the bottle on the ground, immediately collapsing. She was removed to a hospital, but there are no hopes of saving her life.

SANGUINARY AFFAIR AT THE BOCA

A FIGHT AMONGST THIEVES.

A most exceptional and lively occurrence happened last evening in Calle Del Crucero amongst some of the real ruffians of the Boca.

Two well-known characters, Vicente Ardimone Lincheta and Santiago Fioravante, determined to break into a neighbouring almacén. This they succeeded in doing, together with three comrades. On entering they commenced to regale themselves with wine. Suddenly an argument arose, and so violent did this become that glasses, chairs, bottles and all kinds of other things were requisitioned, and a fierce fight ensued. Ultimately this ended in a more personal and violent quarrel between Fioravante and Lincheta. Knives were drawn, and a most ferocious duel fought. The latter fell dangerously wounded. Fioravante was arrested, but denies the crime. The injured man was taken to the Argerich Hospital. He is an Argentine 24 years of age.

SUPPRESSING SUNDAY

HEROIC LEGISLATION IN URUGUAY.

The first French Republic suppressed God. According to recent news from Down River, the Uruguayan Republic is also about to try its pretence hand at something of the kind, if not on quite so ambitious a scale. It is difficult to believe that such a proposition can be seriously contemplated but the report is given for what it is.

All Church Feasts are to be suppressed and Sabbath days also. The working man shall rest, says the projected law, once in six days and not once in seven.

Reform is all very well but there are quite a few things waiting for rectification before this particular grievance is tackled. A spirit of violent anti-clericalism is said to be the prime cause of the proposal but probably anarchical and anti-Christian would be a better description. It is just possible that Uruguay by adopting a different week to that of the rest of the world may cause herself very great inconveniences and less also. The indications distinctly point that way.

FINAL CLOSING OF THE COSMOS CLUB.

A concert and lantern lecture were held last night in the Anglican Church Hall to mark the closing of the Cosmos Club. There were 148 people present, and a most enjoyable evening was passed. The programme was somewhat varied, and commenced with the orchestra (consisting of Mrs. Cumming, Misses Ivancich and Vallejos, and Messrs. Cumming, MacDougall and Torres) playing an Andante from "Surprise Symphonie." This was exceptionally well played and received a well deserved encore from the audience. The second item was the first part of the lecture on the War and Red Cross work by Mr. Chevallier Boutell. The lecturer ran briefly over the outbreak of the war and its causes, followed by the terrible German barbarities to the inhabitants of Belgium, and then spoke of the origin of the Red Cross. The first part of a series of interesting lantern slides on the war and work done by the Red Cross was shown. The pictures were very clear and interesting. The last four were loudly applauded, these being pictures of Lord Roberts, Lord Kitchener, the Prince of Wales and the King. After this, the books of the Cosmos Club were put up for auction and some good prices were fetched, considering the times, although the books, which were nicely bound and in excellent condition, must have originally cost more than three times the sum they were sold for. The auctioneer was Mr. Langlands, who carried out his work in a very efficient manner. His services were again called on at the end of the evening to sell by auction a cake which had been raffled during the entertainment at 50 cents per ticket. The cake was won by Mr. MacDougall with number 185, and then given back and put up for auction. It was first knocked down to Mrs. Hilton at $13.50, and, after being given back a second time, was again bought by the same lady for $12. In all, this cake fetched the sum of $122.50. The whole of the proceeds, as well as those obtained by the sale of the books, were to be devoted entirely to the Red Cross Fund. After the sale of the books, the orchestra played again. This was followed by the recitation of "Gunga Din" by the late President of the Cosmos Club, Mr. Cassels, who is shortly leaving this district for good. A piano solo by Srta. Iris Romaro was next given, and received long applause. A pretty encore was then played by this same lady, and after the second part of the lecture and views had been given the evening was brought to a close by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" and "God save the King." Cheers were given for the lecturer, Mr. Cassels, and the now defunct Cosmos Club.

A Love Tragedy.

On Thursday last, just after the Buenos Aires train left at 6.40 p.m., information was given to the police on the station of the death of two people in Villa Mitre. On arriving on the scene, a large crowd of men, women and children, especially the latter, were gathered around a house not far from the railway line. In the doorway of the building lay a young girl, whilst outside, about five yards away, lay the body of a man with his face buried in the dust. It was stated that the girl was still alive, but no one was allowed to go near either of them, although there were four policemen and three police officials on the spot. The man, who appeared to have been a smart youth and was a respectable-looking and well-spoken Argentine of 26 years of age, had been paying attention to the girl for some time past, but as she would not listen to him he had already threatened to kill her. On this particular evening, about half-past six, he called at the house, and on the girl coming to the door he shot her through the head with a revolver, and, after firing a second shot, walked about five yards away and shot himself through the brain. The girl was also an Argentine and only 16 years old. The man formerly had been a warder at the local prison here, and just recently applied to the railway for work, but refused it as it was offered at an outside station, stating that he had to stay in town on account of his parents.

A German-Italian Lawsuit.

This case, which resulted in a win for the Italians, first started some two years ago, and was caused by the former, a company which was building and is still building the new dry dock at Port Militar. As all the material has not yet been sent out from Germany, and there are still several parts uncompleted, the company contracted with the Italian company of Dodero Bros. for the supply of so many thousand tons of gravel which were to have been brought from San Blas and discharged at Port Militar, but before this had all been delivered the German company, finding that they had as much gravel as was required for their work refused to take delivery of any more. Besides the sum asked for by the Italian company, there were three old hulks left full of gravel. These after lying some time at Port Militar were brought down to Ingeniero White and put alongside the mole there. Yesterday they were again towed back to Port Militar, after a stay of over eighteen months, so that the account to be presented for the towage and wharfage of these hulks will help to swell the sum total a little more. The actual totals are not yet settled, but it is hoped to have these for publication very shortly.

Reception in honour of Mr. Chevallier Boutell.

A reception was given by the Masonic Lodges here in the South American Hotel. Tea was served in the large dining room and the hotel orchestra played various pieces from the English musical plays, as well as some dances in which several couples took part. The upper part of the room was cleared for the latter purpose. After tea, ices and other refreshments were served, a very pleasant two hours was brought to a close by the singing of "Tipperary." Amongst those present besides the guest were Mr. and Mrs. Murray, Mr. and Mrs. Hilton, Mr. and Mrs. Pot-

Dance given by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Davis.

An enjoyable dancing party was given on Wednesday night by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Davis at their residence at San Martin. The large billiard hall was converted into a ball room with the orchestra mounted on a platform at one end of the room draped with the Argentine and British flags. The supper table was delightfully arranged with handsome flowers and countless delicacies. The card room contained three tables for those who desired to play bridge. The host inaugurated an original scheme for the dance programme viz. dancing to time-table. The dance programme was printed on large card board and distributed in the several rooms containing the guests, the first dance read: 1, waltz, 9 p.m.; 2, two step, 9.15 p.m., and so on, by consulting one's watch it was possible to ascertain the next dance. Among those who attended were the following:—Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Dunbar, Mr. and Mrs. Wyatt Smith, Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Cochrane, Mr. and Mrs. L. G. Cordoba Athletic Club Tennis Tournament.

Mr. Percy P. Schultz (minus 15) won the valuable silver cigar box presented by the Honorary President of the Cordoba Athletic Club, Mr. Robert Stuart for the winner of the men's singles (handicap) in the Spring Tennis Tournament of the Club, on Sunday last, by defeating the winner of the event last year Mr. M. L. Zimmer (minus 40). While Mr. Schultz played a very strong game of tennis and deserved his fine win yet he was fortunate in catching his opponent on an "off day." The deadly stroke of Mr. Zimmer did not come off with its customary speed and consequently Mr. Schultz was able to return the majority of his adversary's fast ones which generally reach the back stop before being intercepted. The win was a very popular one on account of Mr. Schultz leaving very soon for England where he will enlist and this was his last chance for winning a prize before going. The score was 6-2, 6-1, 6-1. Marks and Babb after a plucky uphill fight won their match in the men's doubles against Schultz and Parker. Schultz and Parker (minus 1/2 30) won the first set 6-1, with the score 5-3 against them in the second set Marks and Babb (minus 40) pulled the game out of the fire 8-6 and also won the third and deciding set 6-2. The winners will meet Messrs. Dunbar and Ferguson in the semi-finals on Sunday, the winner to play Morton and Zimmer in the finals.

The tennis team of Cañada Gomez have asked for a match against the Cordoba Athletic Club to take place on the courts of the latter in the near future. It is the intention to bring four teams of two men each.

It is also expected that a "mixed" tennis team composed of four ladies and four gentlemen from Rosario will make us a visit in the near future.

Globe Trotters.

More "Globe Trotters" have arrived in Cordoba on their way to the United States. The party is composed of Bernardo Landmeister, Natalio Selzer, Mauricio Joladenco, Naun Grimberg and David Ungar. The "trotters" whose nationalities are Russian and French left Rosario on November 3. Should they arrive in the United States in one year and eight months (the entire journey to be undertaken on foot) a prize of $20,000 awaits them upon their arrival.

Cordoba Elections.

The anticipated trouble between the Democrats and Radicals on election day did not "come off," this year's voting day being one of the quietest for years. It is impossible to form an idea of the result on account of the incomplete returns which have been received and it will be several days before the name of the next Governor and Vice-Governor will be known.

Beauty Contest.

The interest in the "Beauty Contest" which is being conducted by the local sheet Voz del Interior is increasing. Carmen Diez now leads with 2096 votes, with Linda Palacios second with 1,585 and Lidia Ortiz third with 1,442 votes.

BRITISH RED CROSS FUNDSA CORRECTION AND FURTHER LIST OF DONATIONS.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—Kindly allow me to correct a wrong impression likely to be formed by some subscribers to the Funds of the Society I represent in Argentina. Would you, therefore, kindly publish the following to save all doubt on the point, and I take advantage of the opportunity to express my warmest thanks to Mr. Neilson and appreciation of his untiring efforts on behalf of the Red Cross.

Yours, etc.,

CORSO DE LAS FLORAS

The "Corso de las Flores" finished on Sunday night in a blaze of success, the attendance was much more numerous than on previous evenings and the "fiesta" generally more lively. Weather more ideal could scarcely have been imagined and the floral combats continued until a late hour with the utmost animation. The first prize was awarded to the carlage bearing the name Diamela which was magnificently decorated in clove Carnations. A very large concourse of well known Society people were present in the stands.

TOBACCO FOR THE TROOPSBRITISH SEAMEN'S FUND

Nov. 19th's meeting of the Seafarers Tobacco Fund was notable on several counts. One was the large attendance; the meeting was enthusiastic, but that is not a novelty, but there was a special proposal taken up and carried to a successful issue.

Mr. A. G. Pruden, the President, was in the chair, and there were also present the Rev. H. Westby Brady, Hon. Treasurer; Mr. F. E. Beatty, Secretary; Captain J. N. Jones s.s. Hostilius, Captain A. Way s.s. Hyperia, Captain D. Calder s.s. Hyanthos, Captain Ralph Humphries of Lamport and Holt's, Captain J. F. Lewin of the Houston Line, Mr. W. Lythgoe s.s. Hostilius, Mr. A. F. Macaulay s.s. Crofton Hall, Mr. A. Scott s.s. Hyanthos, Mr. J. Myles s.s. Hyanthos, Mr. R. Willis s.s. Hyperia, Mr. F. R. Barnett s.s. Asiatic Prince, Mr. W. Neilson, and Mr. J. Gall.

The following sums were notified as received: Mr. Willis, of the Hyperia, handed in $34.70 sent by the s.s. Skipton Castle from New York, and Mr. and Mrs. J. W. contributed $10. No large amounts are mentioned this week as several lists have not yet been received, but the Chairman expressed his confidence and that of the Committee that a very handsome total will be reported next week when these outlying collections come in. Mr. Pruden also voiced the great pleasure of the Shore Committee at seeing so many gentlemen of the sea present.

Captain Lewin mentioned that lists have been left at the Consulate for distribution to shipmasters, and the best hopes are entertained.

The Chairman thanked Mr. F. E. Beatty in the name of the committee and meeting for his continuous and excellent work as Secretary, which had contributed much to the Fund's success, and recorded the thanks of the committee also to the British Press of the Capital for the publicity given.

Mr. McAuley, also on behalf of the seafaring members, tendered hearty thanks to the Shore Committee for their good work.

Captain Lewin stated that there were numerous callers on the ships for various charitable causes, and repeated the warning given by the Prefect of the Port that none of these are genuine unless their lists bear the seal of the Prefectura. All others are impostors, and there are quite a few of them.

On a proposal to extend the benefits to mine sweepers, it was pointed out that as they frequently call at ports and get tobacco out of bond, this was rather superfluous.

A proposal to make a special effort for Christmas, each gift to contain a Christmas card, was enthusiastically received, and will be acted upon. It is earnestly hoped that the results will justify a large addition to the £50 already sent to Gallipoli, where tobacco, cigars and cigarettes are scarce and unattainable. At Salonica also it is expected there will be a considerable demand. The Rev. Mr. Brady mentioned that his brother, Colonel Brady, R.F.A., had informed him in a letter that it was expected 120,000 British troops would proceed from France to the Balkan front.

The Fund has already been a huge success and has surpassed all the expectations of its founders. It is hoped that it will achieve even greater success, and especially that the Christmas proposal may be carried out on a scale that will be a legitimate source of pride to the Seafarers' Tobacco Fund.

VETERAN OF 76WORKS NIGHT AND DAY IN THE TRENCHES.

Paris, Nov. 22.

The ex-Mayor of Auxerre, 76 years of age, a veteran of the war of 1870, has been decorated with the War Medal and mentioned in an Order of the Day for the excellent work performed by him as Lieutenant of Sappers, working night and day in the trenches under fire without displaying any symptoms of exhaustion.

HOMELESS RUSSIANS

VICTIMS OF THE WAR

AN APPEAL TO ALL BRITONS

When the average Briton reads of brilliant Russian successes, or endeavours to calculate the probable part to be played by the Russian army in the Great War, does he ever stop to think what that war really means to Britain's ally? The probability is that he does not; nor does he realise that portions of the Tsar's empire have been turned into a cockpit for the conflict between rival armies and that thousands of non-combatant men, women, and children are homeless and starving. The war is vividly brought home to the inhabitants of western Russia, whereas residents in Britain are—except for occasional raids—untouched. It is, then, almost obligatory on every Briton to do what he can to alleviate the sufferings of the people of the allied nations on the Continent. Such relief can be given easily—at very small cost to the individual donor—and that by means of a scheme which has just been drafted by the Allies' Committee in Buenos Aires. Their announcement on the point appears below:—

A RELIEF FUND RAFFLE.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Allies in Buenos Aires, the Russian Delegate, Mr. Alexandre Pavlosky, solicited the assistance of the Allies in the Argentine Republic for the Russian victims of the war.

Mr. Pavlosky described the terrible cruelties to which those people have been subjected and the manner in which they have been driven from their homes. He stated that large numbers are to-day absolutely dependent on charity.

The members of the Allies Committee immediately agreed that each nation in this country should do their best to alleviate this distress.

The Allies' Committee resolved to organise a raffle or lottery and decided that each delegate should appeal to his community for donation of articles for the lottery. It is requested that such articles be sent to Mr. Theodore Ptaschnik, Consul General of Russia, Calle Cevallos 592, Buenos Aires, together with the donor's card.

It is proposed that the lottery should take place about the middle of December, and the Allies' Committee ask the British Community to give any articles they can dispose of, for this very deserving fund, and to forward them as soon as possible.

Reginald Tower, Hon. President Allies' Committee; H. G. Mackie, Hon. Vice-President Allies' Committee; Arthur Geo. Pruden, Allies' Committee; David C. Anderson, Allies' Committee.

HELP FOR RUSSIAN VICTIMS

A NOTABLE DONATION TO PATRIOTIC RAFFLE.

Captain J. N. Jones, of the s.s. Hostilius, who was quickly on the spot after the naval battle between the British s.s. Carmania and the German s.s. Cap Trafalgar, picked up some Cap Trafalgar life belts on the high seas in Latitude 22.17S., Longitude 39.44 West, and has kindly given one of these life belts for the raffle which is to take place for the benefit of the Russian victims of the war.

Remembering the great sacrifices made, and good work done by the Russian Army for the Allies' cause, it is earnestly hoped that the British community in Argentina will do all they possibly can for this meritorious fund.

The Commission of Russian ladies are dedicating all their activity to this matter, and hope next week to start selling tickets for the lottery. Therefore British residents are requested to give whatever objects they can dispose of, with as little delay as possible, sending them, with the donor's card, to the Russian Consul General, 592 Calle Cevallos, Buenos Aires.

ROSARIO GAOL

ANOTHER REPOTRED MUTINY

BAD AND SCARCE FOOD

When a public official, a Deputy or a Minister feels aggrieved and that things are not going as he would desire, he generally presents his renuncia indeclinable. To the occupants of gaols, penitentiaries, calabozos, clinks and lock-ups, this resource is not open or, being a class who have frequent grievances they would all resign in a body. They therefore do their best by mutinying and Rosario gaol, says an evening contemporary, has just been the scene of yet another protest of this description in addition to an outbreak comparatively recent.

It appears that the immediate cause of the present rising was the bad quality and small quantity of food supplied and it is alleged that the regulation requiring a certain amount of food of a specified quality to be served daily to each detenu, is habitually disregarded by the gaol authorities who "have other uses" for the supplies thus created. To set a bad example by stealing his food, certainly seems a doubtful method of reforming a thief.

On Tuesday the dinner served to the guests of the State consisted only of bean soup and even that thick and dirty. The prisoners left their cells with loud cries and the Director, Sr. José Noguera, who was just leaving the prison (for dinner perhaps) telephoned for a platoon of bomberos with loaded rifles "to calm" the demonstrators. Captain Castello, it is stated, flatly refused as did the Governor of the Gaol to take any part in the matter, evidently considering that the captives had some reason to complain. A better dinner had to be served and this quieted the prisoners as effectually as the Mausers of the bomberos could have done.

On Friday, Sr. Noguera, dismissed all the officials who had declined to use force to the prisoners. They number 13, an unlucky number for somebody as they have demanded an investigation which it is said Dr. Menchaca, Governor of the Province, will grant and, after the repeated scandals in connection with the prison it is thought that there may be "wigs on the green."

DARING ARGENTINE AVIATORS

MAGNIFICENT FLIGHT AT PALOMAR.

Further brilliant aviation achievements have been scored to the credit of Argentine flyers. Lieut. Pedro E. Zanni at Palomar rose to the prodigious height of 6,500 metres, using a Morane Soulnier monoplane formerly the property of Ingeniero Newbery.

Lieutenant Mario Godoy has also broken the South-American height record for biplanes, reaching a height of 3,000 metres.

Lieutenant Zanni's flight is regarded as an astonishing feat. He started yesterday about 7.20. About 9, a telephone message reached the Aviation School, stating that he had descended safely at Talar de Pacheco after reaching the height indicated, practically 20,000 feet. His descent was somewhat perilous, but happily unattended by any accident.

Lieutenant Godoy came down in 3 minutes, a rate of 1000 metres per minute, and his feat, while skilful and courageous, seems to have been distinctly risky.

IMPORTANT FINANCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

New York, Nov. 23.

A group of capitalists headed by Messrs. Morgan and Rockefeller and the National City Bank have formed a syndicate for financial operations in Central and South America.

Part of the syndicate's work will be to buy up shares in various industrial undertakings which at present are quoted at very low prices.

The syndicate will be entitled The American International Company and will commence business with a capital of 50 million dollars which will be progressively increased.

Operations will be chiefly in the Argentine Republic where the funds will be invested in railways, mines, etc. which the European holders are offering at ridiculously low prices.

DEATH OF MR. H.R. ELDRIDGE

OF NATIONAL CITY BANK AT LA PAZ.

The death of Mr. Herbert R. Eldridge, a Vice-president of the National City Bank of New York, is reported from La Paz, Bolivia.

Mr. Eldridge was but a young man being only 45 years of age, but had already achieved a solid and commanding success in the Banking World. His loss will be very generally lamented especially among the American business community with whom he was justly popular and widely esteemed. The cause of death is not stated.

NEW FRENCH LOAN

SUBSCRIPTIONS FROM THE ARGENTINE.

The French Bank of the River Plate has charge of the issue of subscriptions for the new French loan authorised by that Republic. Only a limited number of subscriptions will be issued in the Argentine. The new loan will open in Paris on November 25 and will close on December 15.

Interest at the rate of 5 per cent. will be paid every three months. The loan will be issued at 87.25 francs and the first coupon cancelled on Feb. 15, 1916.

The manager of the French Bank has issued a circular calling the attention of the French people in the Argentine to the loan and pointing out its patriotic purposes. All further particulars may be had at the French Bank.

ACCIDENT ON THE F.C.C.G.

DYING MAN DISCOVERED NEAR ALBERDI.

A fatal accident has occurred to an Argentine, Alberto Federico, on the Central Cordoba Railway, near Alberdi station.

It is not known how the fatality happened, but Federico was discovered lying in the station, by the side of the rails with severe injuries to his head.

He died while receiving first aid. It is believed that he was the victim of a passenger train which had shortly before passed through the station. The police, in pursuing their enquiries, however, have failed to find any evidence to clear up the case.

OIL VESSEL SEIZED

By British Warships

WHILE ON VOYAGE FROM U.S.A. TO MONTEVIDEO

New York, Nov. 22.

It is reported that the steamer Genesee which sailed from New York for Montevideo has been seized by British warships and taken to the island of Santa Lucia as a prize.

The Genesee is a vessel of 2830 tons register, and belongs to the American Transatlantic Company.

(Note.—Lloyd's Register shows the Genesee as belonging to the Anglo-American Oil Company, and registered at London).

THE ARGENTINE POSITION

SIR REGINALD TOWER'S REPORT.

Reporting under date of August 31, the British Minister at Buenos Aires says that the Argentine National Government is faced with a heavy deficit on the present year's Budget owing to a large decrease in its principal source of revenue, the Customs duties, as compared with former years. The deposits in the banks are heavier than usual, yet credit is restricted. The Conversion Office holds enormous sums of gold, but it is hard to obtain coin without paying a premium. Nevertheless, luxury is evidenced in the capital in the well turned out carriages and motor-cars, and the opera season has been the best on record. Indigency is apparently non-existent. The new Minister of Finance during a recent interview stated that the present crisis was due to want of confidence and was purely fictitious. The value of the products of the Republic had risen and the demand for them had increased owing to the war in Europe. The fiduciary circulation, the bank deposits and the available capital, he said, all testified to this. H.M. Minister adds, however, that the fact remains that business is bad, stocks are reduced and imports are comparatively small.

POLITICAL UNREST IN ROSARIO

CONFLICT WITH THE POLICE

On Monday evening in the Plaza San Martin Rosario a political meeting of the Radicals was broken up by the police and from reports received the affair was a lively one.

Apparently it had been arranged that the meeting should break up at 10.30 at night and that the bugler, accompanying commandant Brigardello, who was in charge of the mounted troops, should give the signal for the break of the meeting.

The bugle sounded, when one excitable individual drew a revolver and discharged it in the air. In an instant there was an uproar and a free fight commenced.

The police were ordered to clear the Plaza and the mounted troops joined in. Knives were drawn, revolvers fired off, fists and sticks freely used and for some moments pandemonium reigned.

Ultimately the Plaza was cleared, but not before some officials were wounded. Chief of Comisaria No. 4, Sr. Albizuri, was stabbed in the shoulder. Muñoz, another official, was likewise wounded. Some arrests were made, but the full details of these and of a considerable amount of bodily damage suffered have not been reported.

CHEAPER LIVING IN BUENOS AIRES

THE KEY TO THE PROBLEM

(Exclusive to THE HERALD.)

Whilst in many directions the increased cost of living has been very severely felt, the stringency of the times as regards the family budget has not been entirely without its advantageous lessons. More than one political party in Buenos Aires has realised that the key to the sympathies of the electorate is in its stomach, and the cheap bread and meat of the Radical party, however it may be regarded as a political move, certainly has roused the public in general to a knowledge of the fact that they pay far too much to the middleman, or, if you like, to the antiquated system of distribution that rules to-day in Buenos Aires and the other cities of Argentina.

The Municipality and the Markets.

Elsewhere in this issue there will be found a paraphrase of an article taken from an Argentine contemporary dealing with the interesting experiment under which producers of fruit and garden produce may consign their goods direct to the Superintendent of Markets to be sold for their account, less the usual charges. The results so far are highly satisfactory, but the scale of operations is as yet too small to enable one to give an opinion as to its ultimate effect on prices. Later in the course of this article it will be necessary to refer to this matter again, but for the present what one wishes to draw attention to is the steady growth of the market system of supply, as opposed to the itinerant vendor, the oldest and the costliest method of distribution possible in a large modern city. Not so many years ago marketing in Buenos Aires was comparatively unusual. To-day, with additional facilities, it is, also comparatively, fairly general. We have not as yet reached the high pitch of the French methods, but already in Buenos Aires both mistresses and servants are accustomed to going and selecting their own foodstuffs and bringing them home straight away. In this change the Free Fairs have played an important part. Originally designed for the use of the poorest classes, the fact that everyone, whether well-to-do or not, must have the main staples of food every day, has gradually led to an appreciation of their advantages by many people whom one would never have expected to see buying their meat, their vegetables, and sundry other foodstuffs at a public fair. Despite strenuous attempts to throw discredit on the quality of the goods supplied, the knowledge that prices are fixed within certain limits, that weight can be checked at will, and that the old rule of caveat emptor, let the purchaser look out for himself, works both ways for the clever manager, has made the bi-weekly fair a popular institution. Buyers come from relatively long distances to stock their larder, and a new class of trader has sprung up, in many cases women, who, protected by the municipal officials so long as they keep within the rules of the fair, are able to sell their own produce, or the produce grown by relatives, at a reasonable profit. Indeed, a large number of the itinerant vendors give up their rounds on the days when the fairs are in operation to take their stand and let their clients come to them.

Eliminating the Middleman.

This return to mediocrity—for the fair is the quintessence of mediaeval trading methods—does not entirely eliminate the middleman, but it certainly does check his possibilities for harm in so far as the cheaper and more general class of foodstuffs is concerned. As a matter of fact, one does not want to eliminate him altogether, even if such a thing were possible, which it is not. What Buenos Aires needs is to educate the middleman, to show him that he must move with the times; make him realise that in a city of one and a half million inhabitants it pays to sell cheaply to the many rather than dearly to the few, and that the way to do this is not to restrict supplies, but to do everything possible to get quick despatch for the wares he handles.

It will not be an easy task, seeing that the majority of the middlemen in Buenos Aires to-day are ignorant, illiterate Neapolitans who, by industry, thrift, and systematic extortion, have attained fortunes that to them appear the height of affluence. In fact, they may best be left to carry out their trade on their old lines, the while every incentive is given to the newer school of trader to handle produce. In the fish trade, for instance, there is vast scope for improved method, and if the Municipality would secure new traders from the thousand petty checks and annoyances, culminating in constant losses, that are adopted by the small but influential trust operating on the old lines, great benefit would be assured alike to the traders and to the public. The gremio can buy their boxes of fish at anything from $4 to $7 a box, and these are outside prices. Distributed retail, a box of sea fish brings in from $20 to $25, reckoning on the average prices paid from door to door, say 25 to 40 cents for corbina or pescadilla, and a shade more for merluza, leaving the higher class of fish, such as besugo or anchoa out of the question for the moment.

These prices are, however, such as to make fish a luxury on the tables of the middle classes, and an impossibility on the tables of the poor, who moreover suffer yet again by the fact that stockfish, imported from Europe, has also increased considerably in price. Hence it follows that to-day the sale of fish is less than it was two years ago, and that despite the fact that a trawler can go out of the Plate and return in a week with her holds full, some 1200 to 1500 boxes, the fish thus caught cannot be sold, and is very frequently taken out to sea and thrown away to the tune of 30 to 50 per cent. of the catch. This is a scandal and a shame, but until the Municipality can take steps to make the sale of cheap fish possible, it is bound to continue. There is no reason why fish should not be as general a dish here as it is in Great Britain in so far as the city of Buenos Aires is concerned, but at present retail prices this cannot be hoped for.

What has been said of fish is true to a lesser extent of fruit and vegetables, though there the action of the Municipality has already been productive of some good, small though such action has been. Its chief utility lies in the proof it affords that much of the dearness of foodstuffs in Buenos Aires is artificial, and may be reduced to a very considerable extent by freedom of trade and sensible facilities for the handling of perishable merchandise.

Q. E. D.

CONDEMNED TO DEATH

ANOTHER EXCEPTIONAL JUDGMENT

Whether or not the increasing number of murders in the capital have aroused the authorities to the seriousness of the problem that they have to face cannot be said, but it is nevertheless a fact that three death sentences have been passed in the last two days. The severest penalty of the law is a comparatively uncommon one in this Republic.

On Nov. 19 the condemned man was one named Leonardó del Cazale, who in July 14, 1914, murdered his wife, under revolting conditions. An appeal has been lodged before the President of the Republic to commute the sentence.

THROTTLING TRADE

BLUNDERS BY THE PREFECTURE

OFFICIAL INTERFERENCE WITH FREIGHTS

There is no worse enemy to the Argentine trader than his own government, and whether the damage done to him is intentional or accidental, the results are the same. This broad statement must be taken for granted, the concrete example that obtrudes at the present moment being that of the official attitude to the local shipping trade. Ever since the war began, the luckless Argentine shipowner has been harried, no other word fits the position, by rules and regulations that have taken all the gilt off the gingerbread. The latest case of unwarranted official interference has been registered in the coasting trade with the southern ports. Briefly the Prefecture of the Ports have taken on themselves to object to increased rates of freight as charged by the steamers working that service, and orders have been given to the effect that boats taking freights on the new tariff scale shall not be allowed to leave port with their proper clearance papers. The s.s. Avellaneda, loading at Comodoro Rivadavia for various ports, was refused such clearance, and notwithstanding that fact, left as usual for Camarones. If she is detained there by the authorities, then her captain has no recourse save to make the customary legal protest.

Now leaving aside the logical right of the companies to increase their charges, a right that the increase in coal freights alone is more than sufficient to justify, can anything be more suicidal for the Argentine Mercantile Marine than this perpetual policy of annoyance and expense to which the local shipping has been subjected of late? The primary evil lies in the appointment of elderly naval men, who have never been in touch with trade or with the merchant marine in their lives, to posts of administrative importance in direct contact with the overseas commerce of the republic. Rear-admiral Rojas Torres, Prefect of Ports, has the reputation of being a stern disciplinarian and a most exemplary naval officer, but he has not, and perforce cannot have, any practical knowledge of the many complicated interests arising from the carriage of goods by sea. Again and again rules and ordinances have been published that have in execution proved ridiculous. The prohibition against the sounding of syrens nearly led to several accidents, and has tacitly been allowed to drop. The extraordinary regulations dealing with the number of crew to be carried on the boats engaged in the island trade may be said to have been still-born. The rules relative to the use of the Argentine flag and the flying of foreign flags by pleasure craft have stultified the republic. The enforced employment of Argentine merchant skippers has proved a calamity for more than one owner.

What deep designs may lie beneath these continued thrusts at the Argentine Mercantile Marine no one can say. In all probability there is no design at all, and the whole thing merely springs from crass ignorance. Be that as it may ships are leaving the Argentine flag. Sailing vessels owned and worked from Buenos Aires fly Uruguayan colours in order to be free from perpetual official interference, and the general trend of the trade is downwards. In many respects this policy is foolish. Argentina needs a fuller development of the southern territories, and that development must come by sea. Then her fleet needs men, and the best seamen are those that are most frequently afloat, though the Argentine supply of practical seamen becomes less year by year. In short

NEW PORT WORKS

CONTRACTORS' REQUEST REFUSED

THE PRESIDENTIAL DECREE

On November 19 the Presidential Decree on the subject of the New Port Works was signed. The text of the document runs as follows:

Representations of the firm of C. H. Walker and Co. Ltd., Constructional Contractors of the New Port Works of the Capital have been made as follows:

(a) That owing to the European War the Bonds which by contract agreement they receive in payment of the works, cannot be negotiated.

(b) That the last loan raised by the Government at 6 per cent. interest has tended to worsen the situation to which they refer, producing as they allege, a drop of 20 per cent. in the quotations on the Port of the Capital, which should bear 5 per cent. interest.

(c) That the Constructors were unable to foresee that the Government of the Nation when they engaged to pay with bonds bearing the highest rate of interest when the contract was signed, would find itself obliged to depreciate the value of these bonds by another issue bearing higher interest than that on the Port Works of the Capital.

(d) That likewise owing to the European war, further considerable losses have been sustained by reason of the increase in price of imported materials such as Portland cement, steel for armoured cement, coal, etc., for which freights have, as is well known, greatly risen.

(e) That considering that this is a typical case of force majeure as foreseen in the contract with the Government, they are permitted to suspend the construction of the works from the present month, should the Government be unable to pay in actual cash, limiting the work done to what resources will permit.

(f) That on the supposition that the Government cannot pay the certified monthly quotas in actual cash as proposed, the time has come for the temporary suspension of the works, until the Scrip market recovers normal conditions.

In reply the Government points out that it has complied up to the present with the contract signed with the Constructing Company, giving every facility for its fulfilment, as was shown by the decree in February, 1915, permitting prorogation of the terms of the work on account of the European war. The contentions of the Company are traversed, and the reference to the case as one of "force majeure" is denied.

It is also pointed out as to the proposal to suspend the works, the terms of the contract will be strictly applied, providing a fine in case of delay in finishing, and that all expense in preserving the work done intact, shall fall on the Constructors.

All this is without prejudice to responsibilities of the Company under the General Act of Public Works.

The President of the Argentine Nation decrees that:

The request made by C. H. Walker and Co. Ltd., Constructors of the New Port Works of the Capital, is not granted.

things are in a parlous state, and it is high time that the government took official cognisance of the matter. The Argentine marine does not need protection in the ordinary sense in which that word is applied to government aid here. Its profits are quite good enough for it to protect itself, were it only assured of freedom from the everlasting interference which makes it impossible to obtain any fixed data whereon to base profits and losses from one voyage to another.

Mary Roberts Rinchart tells in "Everybody's" "How the American saw Queen Mary."

When at last I was permitted to see the Queen of England I understood a part of what she was suffering. I had been to the front. I had been quite close to the very trenches where the boyish Prince of Wales was facing the enemies of his country, and doing it with high courage. And I had heard the rumble of the great German guns as Queen Mary must hear them in her sleep.

Even with no son in the field the Queen of England would be working for the soldiers. But a good mother is a mother to all the world. When Queen Mary is supervising the great work of the Needlework Guild one feels sure that into each word of direction has gone a little additional tenderness because of this boy of hers at the front.

It was characteristic of her Majesty that she put an American woman—a very nervous American woman—at ease at once. . . . As she advanced towards us I had an opportunity to see this royal woman who has suffered so grossly from the camera. It will be a surprise to many Americans to learn that the Queen of England is very lovely to look at. So much emphasis has always been placed on her virtues and so little has been written about her charm that this tribute is only fair to her Majesty. She is tall, perhaps five feet eight inches with deep blue eyes and beautiful colouring. She has a rather wide, humorous mouth. There is not a trace of austerity in her face or in any single feature. The whole impression was of sincerity and kindness, with more than a trace of humour. I could quite believe the delightful story that I had heard from a member of her own circle, that now and then, when during some Court solemnity an absurdity occurred, it was positively dangerous to catch the Queen's eye!

Queen Mary came up the long room. As she paused and held out her hand, each lady took it and curtsied at the same time. The Queen talked, smiling, as she spoke. There was no formality. Near at hand the lady-in-waiting in attendance stood, sometimes listening, sometimes joining in the conversation. The talk was all of supplies. Certain things had come in certain things were going out. For the Queen of England today is at the head of a great business, one that in a few months has already collected and distributed over a million garments, all new, all practical, all of excellent quality.

The Queen came toward me and paused. There was an agonised moment while the lady-in-waiting presented me. Her Majesty held out her hand. I took it and bowed. The next instant she was speaking. She spoke at once of America, and of Canada. "Canada has been wonderful," she said. "They are doing everything."

The ready response of Canada to the demand for both troops and supplies appeared to have touched her Majesty. She spoke at length about the troops, the distance they had come, the fine appearance the men made, and their popularity with the crowds when they paraded in the streets of London. I had already noticed this. A Canadian regiment was sure to elicit cheers at any time although London, generally speaking, has ceased any but silent demonstration over the soldiers.

Already, by her tact and her simplicity of manner, she had put me at my ease. The greatest people, I have found, have this quality of simplicity. We talked freely of the hospitals in France, and I was able to tell her about them from personal knowledge. Then the lady-in-waiting asked me to tell the Queen about my meeting with King Albert.

So I told about it. It had been unconventional, and the recital amused her Majesty. It was then that I realised how humorous her mouth was, how very blue and alert her eyes. I told it all to her, the things that insisted on slipping off my lap, and the King's picking them up; the old envelope he gave me to make notes of the interview on; how I had asked him whether he would let me know when the interview was over, or whether I ought to get up and go! And, finally, when we were standing talking before my departure, how I had suddenly remembered that I was not to stand nearer to his Majesty than six feet, and had hastily backed away and explained, to his great amusement.

Queen Mary laughed. Then her face clouded.

"It is all so very tragic," she said. "Have you seen the Queen?"

I replied that the Queen of the Belgians had received me a few days after my conversation with the King.

"She is very sad," said her Majesty. "It is a terrible thing for her, especially as she is a Bavarian by birth."

I stepped back as her Majesty prepared to continue her visit around the long room. But she indicated that I was to accompany her. It was then that one realised that the Queen of England is the intensely practical daughter of a practical mother. Nothing that is done in this Guild, the successor of a similar guild founded by the late Duchess of Teck, her Majesty's mother, escapes her notice. No detail is too small if it makes for efficiency.

My audience was over. As her Majesty passed me she held out her hand. I took it and curtsied.

"Were you not frightened the night you were in the Belgian trenches?" she inquired.

"Not half so frightened as I was this afternoon, your Majesty," I replied.

She passed away smiling.

And now, when enough time has elapsed to give perspective to my first impression of Queen Mary of England, I find that it loses nothing by this supreme test. I find that I remember her, not as a great Queen, but as a gracious and kindly woman, greatly beloved by those of her immediate circle, totally without arrogance, and of a simplicity of speech and manner that must put to shame at times those lesser lights that group themselves about a throne.

I find another impression also: that the Queen of England is intensely and alertly mental—alive to her finger-tips, we should say in America. She has always been active. Her days are crowded. A different type of Royal woman would be content to be the honoured head of the Queen's Guild. But she is in close touch with it at all times. It is she who dictates its policy, and so competently that the ladies who are associated with the work that is being done speak of her with admiration not unmixed with awe.

What the heroic women of the North and the South did during our Civil War, the women of Great Britain are doing to-day. They are showing the same high and courageous spirit, the same subordination of their personal griefs to the national cause, the same cheerful relinquishment of luxuries. It is a United Britain that confronts the enemy in France. It is a united womanhood, united in spirit, in labour, in faith, and high moral courage. A united womanhood, with, at its head, a steadfast and courageous Queen and mother, Mary of England.

A CITIZEN OF THE WORLD

"I believe she is an American!" A young lady member of a tea party in Buenos Aires was responsible for the turn of conversation.

"No, I know she is not, in spite of her vocabulary," said an older lady, "she has lived in the United States though, which accounts for it." "I think she is a foreigner," remarked a prim English lady whose nationality could by no possible manner whatever be mistaken. "She speaks French I know, and I heard her say something in German just now to Señora Jay, who was so embarrassed when we talked about the awful Germans. She is German, you know, married to an Argentine. Rather queer of her to come here I think, don't you? And she speaks Spanish like a native. Yes, I think she must be a foreigner."

"She certainly is a foreigner here," said a pretty Portenian pertly; but so are you, and yet you can't speak anything but English, I believe."

"I a foreigner," said the English lady snappishly, "what do you mean?"

"Well, replied Miss Pert, "even English people can be foreigners, you know, when they take up their residence in other people's countries."

The English lady didn't vouchsafe a reply. A "foreigner" to her mind was a person many degrees inferior to a Britisher, and her point of view did not change, even though her residence did, when the latter reduced her to the status of the inferior foreigner.

The lady responsible for the above exchange of amenities approached the trio with a remark about the excellence of the concert given by Adela Verne the previous day.

"I have not heard the lady," the English lady who refused to be a foreigner vouchsafed; "things are so expensive in this country, I just cannot spare the money for luxuries."

"Oh, but," Miss Pert interjected, "Adela Verne plays nothing but classical music, so you probably would not enjoy it if you did go to hear her."

The English lady took up the glove thus rudely thrown in her face, with the retort "You evidently judge others by yourself. I believe it was you who upset the gravity of your neighbours at a classical concert by exclaiming in the semi-silence of a sustained note, 'oh, for 'Home Sweet Home' on the concertina,' am I not right?"

"Certainly," was Miss Pert's answer, "on that occasion I paid the penalty of my natural honesty, by acquiring a notoriety for inartistic taste, that I hardly deserve."

The new-comer looked rather startled, and felt rather uncomfortable when she realised that her attempt to keep the ball of conversation rolling among the guests of their mutual friend had resulted in augmenting an antagonistic feeling between two of them; and she was about to leave the danger zone, when the young lady called Miss Pert told her that she had been the subject of their discussion, and ended in asking if she were an American. "No," was the quick response to the query, "I am a cosmopolitan."

A startled silence greeted her bold announcement which the English lady broke by saying, "I was right then, I told them you were a foreigner." Strange how the lady seemed to be possessed by the word! The self-claimed citizeness of the world said gently, "I still live in this world, Madame; but I am a foreigner here in the same way that you are. I was born in Cape Colony."

Miss Pert, the irrepressible, exclaimed, "Then you are a Colonial?"

"I suppose I am," the cosmopolite replied, with quite unruffled manner, although she knew the depreciation which the word conveyed. "However," continued Miss Pert, "you seem to have got over it."

"Do you think being a Colonial is a sort of disease, then," mildly enquired the citizeness of the world? "I am always anxious to learn."

"I suppose she does," the English lady said quickly, "that is her point of view, you know, she is a nurse." "I did not know," came the answer, "but I can quite understand." Miss

SOME WOMEN AND MANY THINGS

Mdme. Pashich, the wife of the Serbian Prime Minister, together with the leading women in Serbia, is organising orphanages for war orphans in Serbia.

Lady Maitland is one of the most charming English miniature painters. She tells the tale of her rapid progress in this art to the readers of the "Woman at Home" in its June number. She now is a great traveller, painting as she goes, in America and on the Continent.

It is not every woman who knows the origin of lace, says the "Woman at Home." The earliest lace was a form of fringe used by the ladies of Nineveh some seventeen hundred years before Christ. This was the real forerunner of the Italian macrame work.

The death is announced of Adele Hugo in her country house at Surresnes, near Paris, at the age of eighty-five. She was the fourth and youngest daughter of Victor Hugo. Her death recalls a tragedy in the lives of herself and her famous father.

During the patriot's exile in the Channel Islands, Adele Hugo met an English naval officer whose ship was in port for a few days. An idyll sprang up between the two. The denouement came with tragic force.

One day at lunch the daughter revealed her secret. "I wish to marry," she said. "I am of age, and I do not wish to become an old maid." A silence fell, and all eyes looked towards the poet. He turned furiously on the unhappy Adele. "You have," he said, "resolved to dispose of yourself without consulting me, and you aggravate your arrogant attitude by invoking the fact that you are of age. You are a bad daughter."

Pert did not relish the turn of conversation this time, and she ventured to explain: "I did not mean . . . I meant . . . you are so fair, so many Colonials I have met are so dark, I would not have known if you had not said so."

"Ah, then the Colonials are supposed to carry the brand of their disease on their faces, like those who have had small-pox," laughed the Cosmopolitan; "how little they know of Colonials who only England know," she mis-quoted. And then she gratified the circle of friends by telling them that her father had been the Governor of Cape Colony when she was born, that shortly afterwards her family had returned to England, that since she had put her hair up and her skirts down she had lived in almost every part of the civilised world, and travelled over parts which were not yet civilised. She told them that she had been mentioned in the will and testament of Holy Writ; for it stated that blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth; therefore she was an heiress, although, strange to say, when she asserted her claim, everybody seemed inclined to take from her that quality which entitled her to it. To justify her claim, she had become a linguist in the true sense of the word, for she spoke most languages fluently, and understood something of all.

"Now you understand why I claim to be a citizen of the world," she said, "and really because I am a Colonial. The Colonials are the heirs to all the traditions as well as to all the achievements of the Ages past. They have none of the disabilities of nationality, but all the advantages of every nationality. Whatever the Colonials become rests with themselves. I have every confidence in my fellow citizens the Colonists of Great Britain."

Land of Lilliput.

Conducted by Egeria

My dear Lilliputians,

I wonder if you remember that I told you some time ago about a boy violinist who was studying in Munich last year under one of the famous masters, having been sent there from Australia, on account of his talent as a musician; and that he was imprisoned on the outbreak of war with a man who had consumption? The latest news has come through that he arrived in London last August, friends having subscribed £200 for the expenses of nursing him back to health, and paying his passage home. He arrived a physical wreck, and died shortly afterwards in a Kentish sanatorium, consumption having done its work in the German prison. He was only eighteen years of age too and his name was Joseph Viall. I wonder if any of you had ever heard of him? Anyway it's a sad story, and a pathetic ending to what promised to be a brilliant career.

Have any of you heard of the tribe of "Go-Hawks"? Of course you have all read Indian stories, and this tribe was founded by a young lady called Emilie Stapp, the idea coming to her all of a sudden, because a crippled boy in whom she was interested, wistfully expressed the wish, after watching a group of children playing Indians, that he might belong to some tribe. So less than two years ago Miss Stapp replied to the little cripple; "I tell you what Jimmy, you and I will form a tribe, and it shall grow until it becomes the largest tribe in all the world." And she became the big sister of the happy tribe of Go-Hawks which now is said to number close on to 15,000 members, and to be increasing at the rate of 1000 a month. And right there, seated beside the little cripple boy's chair, Miss Stapp mapped out the Go-Hawks, the membership of which is composed of children who pledge themselves to shoot at least one good arrow deed every day. Among the good arrow deeds shot by these little people was a large number of shoes sent to the homeless and fatherless children of Belgium not long ago. Last Christmas, for fear the babies of Belgium would have no Santa Claus, the Go-Hawks of the United States, in co-operation with the English branch, supplied a quantity of toys and useful presents.

Another worth while work of this band is the "saving" of seven babies. This work was thought of by a little boy who, having amassed four cents, wanted them used to "save" a baby. On being told that it required ten cents to supply a baby with food each day, he went out and three days later returned with ten pennies clutched in his fingers. He had earned them all by running errands. Other Go-Hawks came to the assistance of the young philanthropist and the baby became the accepted charge of the tribe. Since then six other babies have been "saved" by being supplied with plenty of healthful food and comfortable clothes.

When choosing the Big Chief for their tribe, the children are said to have considered several men and women well known to childhood. After due deliberation James Whitcomb Riley was elected to fill this important office. When a branch was formed in England the office of Big Chief of the Happy Tribe of Go-Hawks was offered Mr. Kipling, and he promptly accepted it. I should not be surprised if the big sister tried to form a branch of the tribe in Buenos Aires some day: Whom would you choose for your Big Chief then?

It is wonderful what Lilliputians are doing all over the world, and especially now when so many other Lilliputians are helpless and wanting comfort and assistance! I read recently that among the wounded soldiers who have returned from the war to England, was a youth who now that he has come back injured in his country's service admits that he is a Lilliputian, and should not have gone, being under 16 years of age! If all the men of England felt like that Lilliputian there would be no talk of conscription. In England and in North America there is no compulsory military service; and those countries' armies are formed by men who willingly fight for their countries and so they are called volunteers. It would be a pity if by showing they were not volunteers the men would compel the government to go back to the compulsory system again don't you think so? Because anything that is done voluntarily, even if not better done, brings more pleasure than that which is done by force.

Now that Christmas is drawing near, the toy question is being discussed; and people are wondering if Santa Claus will find his task a difficult one this year, as he may find it impossible to get all he wants for the same money as before. I was told the other day that British toy-makers will reap a great benefit this year for the orders from the shopkeepers are already so great that there is little chance of the supplies being sufficient, although manufacturers are working to the limit of their hampered resources. Last Christmas plenty of German-made toys were in stock; they have now long since been bought—and broken.

Most of the novelties that are in course of preparation are of a military nature. Metal soldiers in regimental uniforms are still being produced, but the biggest request is for the man in khaki. He can be bought kneeling and firing, lying down and firing, marching, or with bayonet fixed. He is a penny each, or in boxed platoons up to half a guinea.

There is one little tragedy—the penny box of tin soldiers has gone under owing to increased expenses.

Helmets of the shape worn by Colonials and by men going to the Dardanelles are in great demand. These helmets are to be sold at 6 1/2d. each.

Another little story is about a real school-boys' hero, a man of the sea, sunbrunt, jolly and breezy, who after winning the Victoria Cross at the Dardanelles, visited his old playground in order to hoist a Union Jack on the new flagstaff there. His name is Lieutenant-Commander Norman Douglas Holbrook, V.C., and he hoisted the Union Jack, and hammered a peg in the Dardanelles portion of a large map of Europe which some years ago was marked out in red cement in the playground by boys at the school. By the way I must tell you that the peg marked the spot where the Turkish battleship was sunk by the submarine, which was commanded by Lt.-Com. Holbrook and which dived under five rows of mines to torpedo the battleship. Well after the work was done the hero talked to the boys and said that he hoped they would do their duty like men when they grew up and not be shirkers. Be first to enlist, he told them, if called upon to do something for your country. He would say nothing about how he won the V.C., and when the headmaster asked: "Why did the King give you that medal?" he made them all laugh in saying "I suppose he had some to give away and someone had to have one!" What do you think of this man as a modest hero? Now here is a pretty story of a Territorial experience near the firing line told by Private Charles Riley, of the Duke of Wellington's West Riding Regiment, in a letter sent to a friend at Haworth, and published by the "Westminster Gazette." Riley, it should be stated, hails from the Bronte country, and is a keen lover of Nature.

"The place in which we are now residing," he says "is a garden almost everywhere. Whilst out for a walk the other day, I pulled up at a garden gate. I could smell roses, but could not see them, and as I was craning my neck to peep, a pleasant-looking Frenchman popped round an outbuilding. 'You like flowers,' he said in fairly good English. 'Come, I will show you.' Words fail me to describe the scene. Roses, roses, everywhere, and such roses! Big and little, white, red, yellow, cream—thousands of them. The Frenchman noted my appreciation. 'You love the roses,' he said, and I answered, 'Yes.'"

"He began to cut some for me, and he got me such a bunch. Well, you couldn't call it a bunch—it was a heap. I tried to stop him, but it was always, 'You love the lovely roses.' On he went from tree to tree until I was absolutely loaded. He led me into his house and I drank wine with him. We toasted the rose—both English and French. I shall never forget that night.

"Going back to my sleeping-place, a great change came over the scene. One minute Nature dwarfed everything, and the next the awakening. Boom went the cannon, and louder and louder still grew the boom. As I looked at the armful of roses I carried my feelings changed from joy and gladness to deep sadness.

"Zip, zip! went the rifle fire, and the roar of the cannon became deafening. I toddled wearily along, and met an ambulance in which three wounded Tommies were sitting and two were lying down. In went the roses. God bless 'em—roses and Tommies! We are all happy one moment and sad the next, but all here are of one mind as to the result of all this pother. We've got to win, then for home and loved ones—not to mention English roses!" We strangers in a strange land know what a flower from the homeland can do in the way of stirring our emotions, just think how the English rose would affect a soldier, far from the safety of his home and far from all he loved; and what is more surrounded by all the horrors and hardships of war! You have heard a great deal about the guardians of the battle-fields, now a story called "The Guardians of the Clover Fields" will be quite a change. It was written for a New Zealand paper by Lucy Murray:—

THE GUARDIANS OF THE CLOVER FIELDS

It seems odd that a rich clover harvest should be obtained by means of an advertisement totally unconnected with agriculture; but in the little village of Butterfield this was the case.

Such beautiful fields there were, stretching away and away, in huge, feathery reaches towards the kissing point of earth and sky; mile on mile of red and purple loveliness, swaying like waves under the wind's caress!

Now the queens have their court physicians, and the clover blossoms had theirs also, an army of clever brothers, each one of whom bore the title of "Dr. Bumble Bee."

These gentlemen visited the fields of clover daily, collecting pollen and nectar, and spreading them widely, so that younger plants might be born. But to the early flowers in their sunny morning of life came a terrible sorrow.

Each of the doctors was married, and had a large family of be-grubs, who would one day become physicians too; at least, such was their ambition, but a dark day broke for the wee creatures wherein a monster of wickedness came on them suddenly, and—ate them up.

This cannibal was not at all what we should call a giantess; she was just a wee field mouse, but beside the bees she was of gigantic size, of course.

She and her many sisters, brothers and cousins took calm possession of the place, and bee grub after bee-grub fell under their entiring efforts, till weary and spent, with heartache as much as with age, the bereaved physicians died, one by one, leaving no cheery heirs to fill their empty places.

The clover blossoms realised their plight then, and sighed hopelessly. Their nectar would no longer be useful to the humble bees, to be skillfully wrought into honey; their pollen must remain with them, unborne by brown gentlemen to fertilise other plants, aiding them to bring forth their seeds.

For some time despair reigned over the sunny fields, and though the skies spread blue above, the sunrays fell gaily, the cloud shadows chased over them refreshingly the cool dews descended and sunset banners stretched in crimson challenges to them, the flowers still sighed on.

What could be done? That was the question, surely an unanswerable one to the clover.

Widow Gills sat in her little parlour alone one evening. Her cottage was quite a large and pretty one, standing in fair sized grounds, but the widow was poor, because the place was heavily mortgaged, and as she sat, deep in thought, she had been making up her mind to something.

Presently she went to her desk and wrote in a clear, little hand, "Wanted, by respectable widow, several elderly lady boarders. Apply Mrs. Gills, Jessamine, Cottage, Fleet Lane, Butterfield."

"I never could endure boys, or men," she sighed, "and girls would have worried me nearly as much! But old ladies!—well, I might bear them about! My dream last night was a happy one!"

Last night, be it understood, Mrs. Gills had in dreams been visited by a little red butterfly, who had seemed to breathe into her mind this fortunate idea.

The advertisement appeared in due course, and one fine morning an elderly lady came to Jessamine Cottage, accompanied by several articles of baggage.

Setting one box down in the little hall, she removed the lid, and out popped a fine grey tomat.

"You can't keep that creature here!" cried Widow Gills at the sight. "He'll have to go at once! At once!"

"If he goes, I go, too," spoke Mrs. Morpeth, decidedly. "I'm not going to part with him. Come, Thomas!"

What could a poor widow do?

Thomas quickly became domesticated at the cottage, and was perfectly at home there, when a week later, came Miss Rant, armed with a square-shaped parcel.

"My luggage will follow me this evening," she announced, loftily. "This is only Susie. I simply couldn't have left her for a stranger to bring and she so bashful."

"Susie" was a pretty black kitten.

A few days more, and two brown cats and their owners had joined the little party and the Widow Gills was becoming reconciled to her lot. Perhaps the "red gold" aided the good woman to this comfortable frame of mind; but that only she can perhaps know for certain.

And didn't those cats have fine times. Stay in the garden? Not they! They went far beyond it, on to the clover fields, and finding in the course of their travels the little field mice, such delightful dinners as they made off them.

"Why," cried the clover, in surprise, one evening, "all those terrible monsters are gone I do believe! Now, if any more bumble bees come to us, they'll be able to settle down quite safely, with no damage to their children in so doing, after all."

And that is just what presently took place.

With love from

GARDEN PARTY AT BELGRANO

THE SOCIAL EVENT OF THE YEAR

It is no exaggeration to say that the Garden Party held on Nov. 18 at the residence of the U.S. Ambassador, in Sucre, Belgrano, by the kindness of the Hon. Frederic and Mrs. Stimson, was the social event of the year in that district, and everything points likewise to the pleasant conclusion that its financial results will be fully equal to the success achieved as a function. The British and American Benevolent Fund does admirable and most needful charitable work, and the whole-hearted manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Stimson did all they could to assist the energetic Ladies Committee running the Fête is deserving of very grateful acknowledgment from all who take an interest in the Fund's success.

Having made up their minds that the "Fiesta" should take place on Nov. 18, the slightly threatening demonstration made by the weather was not allowed to affect the project. The Committee, in effect, said: "Let floods o'erswell and fiends for food howl on," we don't care. The floods thought better of it, seeing the bold front opposed to them, and the fiends did not appear. On the contrary, if 1915 fashions prevailed in celestial quarters, one might have supposed by appearances that a large number of angels were present; ministering angels, of course.

From 3 p.m. when the proceedings began, the large and beautiful garden and lawn were thronged, and everybody appeared to have previously resolved to have a good time, and that, immediately. People kept arriving and arriving, yet the spacious premises managed to contain them all.

Among those present in the afternoon were Sir Reginald Tower, H.B. M. Minister; Mr. H. G. MacGie, British Consul-General; Mr. Drake, of the British Legation, and Signor Castalani, Chancellor of the Italian Legation.

The lawn was provided with innumerable comfortable seats from which to behold the stirring dramas enacted in the peripatetic miniature theatre of El Gran Guignol. They were very stirring indeed, and if Mr. Punch did not appear he was most efficiently substituted by other characters.

On the verandah, an excellent string orchestra discoursed choice music of the kind which insensibly mixes itself with what is going forward without being importune, and in the interior of the house many matters of interest were proceeding. There was a strong flavour of the Occult Sciences, for an Indian Seer, or Mahama, or Sage, or Fakir, or something that justifies the wearing of an impressive turban and gorgeous apparel, was seated in a corner, unrolling the scroll of the Future to the eyes of such as would pay (a trifling sum) for such perilous knowledge. Fortune-telling by Hawaiian cards (which hath a flavour of Demonology), sales of packages auctioned with great briskness and going like the proverbial hot cakes, and the Drama, not puppets this time, but the real thing, all were in evidence.

Mrs. J. J. Rugeroni and Mr. G. Ellis Griffin gave their celebrated comedy, "Collaborators," in the Drawing-Room before a House so crowded that it might be said truly, "House full, hundreds turned away." There were raffles also; there generally are, but these were for prizes of great price. At 6 o'clock, the interior of the house might be quite correctly described as a fashionable "crush." There were tea of the most unimpeachable, punch of a nectar-like quality, and divers other refreshments. When the "Fiesta" was drawing to a close about 8 o'clock it was not yet possible to estimate the results, but they are very satisfactory, and the raffles and auction alone had brought in over $800. The Ladies Committee had worked very hard and deserved the success they achieved. Its members were: — Mesdames Brooks, Huntington, Denton, Finney, Storer, De Rees, Renwick, Meeks, Pratt,

HELP THE STARVING!

A CLERGYMAN'S APPEAL.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—There are here in this "barrio de la Boca" hundreds of women and children suffering from hunger. The poverty is appalling. The Mission needs help for its relief work. There are good honest women, and crowds of little children right here in this city, that to-day at noon will dine off a piece of dry bread, and wash it down with water, not having even the traditional "mate": and to-night, those same women and children will go to bed supperless. This, Sir, is the truth, and nothing but the truth. Anything sent to my address will be thankfully received and accounted for.

Yours, etc.,

RETURN OF ARGENTINE CRUISER

The cruiser 9 de Julio, which has recently been assisting at the National Fiestas in Brazil, left Rio de Janeiro yesterday to return to Argentina. The Brazilian Press speaks in the warmest terms of the visit, which has made a very pleasant impression, and by order of the Ministry of Marine the destroyers Para and Amazonas have been detailed to escort the cruiser to the limits of territorial waters as a final fraternal compliment.

Shanfield, Mr. and Mrs. W. Bond, Miss Mildred Champagne, Mr. J. Mitchell, Mrs. Jessie Pampin, and others who were literally legion.

Mr. and Mrs. Stimson mentioned that great kindness had been shown by many prominent Argentine, American and British firms in sending articles for sale to the amount of probably $2,000.

With so much good-will it is not surprising that the Garden Party was what appears to have been a record success on which the organisers may be warmly congratulated, and not least the kind host and hostess who placed their residence at the disposal of the Committee for the occasion and contributed so much to the happy result.

MISS ADELA VERNE

FAREWELL RECITAL

AT SALON TEATRO

Miss Adela Verne's farewell concert matinee at the Salon Teatro on Nov. 20 was a triumph for the artiste whose friends had turned up in such numbers that there was scarcely room to receive them. The body of the Hall was crowded, seats being placed up the sides and even some of the audience being accommodated on the stage. The galleries also were occupied to their limit and the enthusiasm of the audience was equal to its numbers. Every item on the programme evoked plaudits loud and long and the number of floral tributes must have required several vehicles to remove them to say nothing of the shower of flowers thrown on the stage.

The programme was selected from a number of pieces which Miss Verne has played at previous recitals and in all of which she excels. Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Caprichoso," Scarlatti's "Caprice" and Weber's delightful "Invitation to the Valse." The public like music with a good motif and all these pieces have it and might be described as sound painting by the hand of a master. Schumann's "Papillons" also evoked the greatest delight and Miss Verne must have felt fatigued even with the amount of bowing she had to perform in response to constant recalls.

Chopin monopolised the second part which consisted of Sonata Op 35, the Movimiento Doppio Grave, Scherzo, and the Funeral March which never fails to send a hushing breath through the audience as its first chords sound, with its deep undulant fateful, melancholy and stern.

In Debussy's Reflets d'Eau Miss Verne as usual displayed that lightness of touch which has made it one of the most favourite numbers. It was followed by the Romance of the Evening Star from Tannhauser, played with exquisite taste and feeling and then—lo! gross darkness; the lights went out. So wonderful grotesque and weird is the Dance Macabre as rendered by Miss Verne that even in broad light the blood would chill and the hair prickle on the head. A harsh dissonant iron bell sullenly sounds the hour of midnight the wind moans and rushes through the sepulchral yews of the place of tombs and a faint clicking sound gathers, the rattle of bones as the sepulchres yawn and their fearful occupants emerge. "Trooping from their mouldy dens, the chopfallen circle spreads." A spectral dance to a truly fearful air follows. It is unhuman music, untuneful, awful, mirthless, appalling. One can almost see the grisly groups jiggling on the rank grass while the wind howls in the trees. Faster and wilder grows the phantom revel, when—following the soundest tradition—a distant cock crows and the dread dancers stop. The faint click is heard of retreating bones the ponderous crash of the closing tomb and the bell strikes two. It is like Holbein or Retzsch in music, the frightful and fantastic imaginings in which old Europe took a shuddering pleasure.

After the conclusion of this scaring number Miss Verne by request played two extras, one "The Musical Box" and concluded her last recital in an avalanche of flowers.

STATE RAILWAYS

OFFICIAL WEEKLY RETURN.

The official figures have been published of the returns of the State Railway for the week ending November 14. The figures show a return of $267,165.63, which is an increase of $30,694.36 over the corresponding week of last year.

The figures are made up as from the Central Northern Railway, $192,729.13 Northern Argentine Rly. $74,436.50

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

The first of our illustrations this week is a technical drawing of the manner in which aeroplanes fight, either in attack or defence, the success of the fight depending on the skill with which the pilot manoeuvres his craft, and the gunner brings his weapon to bear on the enemy aeroplane. In the Balkans the plucky Serbians have made a determined resistance against the Teutonic forces, but have been driven back by pressure of numbers. In the use of their heavy artillery, placed in commanding positions the Serbians have done splendid work. Our illustration depicts a heavy gun position behind Semendria. A companion picture deals with the British occupation of positions close to the Turkish frontier, the sentries keeping guard over a small town on the shores of the Aegean Sea. When we see the marvellous manner in which the French have fortified their line, shown in the next picture, we can easily feel confident that no German effort to force the line is likely to be successful, and that such an attempt, as is now threatened, must result in frightful losses to the enemy. If the Allies cannot advance, the Germans certainly cannot. The following photographs show the method by which military balloons are filled from cylinders containing gas. In their dug-outs at Gaba Tepe, the Australian forces appear to have made themselves quite at home, and there is a suggestion of permanency about their occupation of the Anzac zone. In the last picture we again get a fair idea of the tremendous difficulties which confront the Italian troops, fighting as they are in wild mountainous country.

MR. P. G. MC CLENAHAN

FAREWELL DINNER AT THE CABIN.

On the occasion of his departure for Europe, Mr. G. P. McClenahan, a valued and popular member of the Irish Society, was entertained to a dinner on Nov. 18, given in his honour by his numerous friends at the Headquarters of the Irish Society in the Cabin Restaurant.

An excellent dinner, purveyed in the Cabin's best manner, having gone to its appointed place, the serious business of the evening was approached. Mr. E. J. Sullivan was in the chair, and as President, made a brief opening address, calling next upon Mr. Joseph Hurley, whose eloquent remarks were followed by a humorous speech by Mr. Ballantine. Mr. J. B. Sheridan then spoke, and like his predecessors said many agreeable and well-deserved things about Mr. McClenahan, who is now leaving them. Mr. McClenahan replied suitably, and expressed his thanks for the kind words used concerning him.

The remainder of the evening was dedicated to an informal smoking concert in which Mr. W. S. Scannell and other gentlemen distinguished themselves. After another brief valedictory address by Mr. E. J. Sullivan, and the rendering of musical honours to the guest of the evening, an exceedingly pleasant function terminated about 10.30.

Those present including members of the Irish Society and friends were: Mr. E. J. Sullivan, Mr. E. McCarthy, Mr. G. McClenahan, Mr. J. Allen, Mr. J. B. Sheridan, Mr. J. Lynch, Mr. J. F. Hurley, Mr. T. J. Reynolds, Mr. P. Kelly, Mr. J. Mahon, Mr. A. C. A. Euxton, Mr. H. Gribben, Mr. J. McGough, Mr. J. Williams, Mr. C. M. Young, Mr. A. MacIntosh, Mr. F. B. Ballantine, Mr. J. Hamilton Talbot, Mr. E. EUROPE IN WAR TIME

A NEUTRAL'S VIEW

EXPERIENCES OF THE COUNT OF BESA

Just after the fall of President Madero, Count de Besa left Mexico for Europe, and upon the outbreak of the war determined — accompanied by his wife—to make a prolonged journey through afflicted Europe.

During the eighteen months spent there the Count de Besa has seen and experienced much of interest, and in an interview with a representative of THE HERALD yesterday of "The Herald" on Nov. 12, related many of the things he saw.

The Count is a Mexican gentleman, and his object in taking the journey was not only to gain first hand knowledge of matters, not only a commercial object, but the object of a neutral person to "come, to see, and to conquer" by absolutely neutral methods, in the cause of civilisation.

His views of neutrality is a high view, an ideal view, in which no criticism of one country exists at the expense of another.

The difficulty of journeying through the eleven countries at war, of presenting the facts observed in each country without offending the susceptibilities of the other, has been considerable. It is Count de Besa's desire to write a book on what he has seen, to present the series of remarkable pictures obtained by him in such a neutral way that he believes will be the greatest assistance to humanity. He believes he can do more this way than by taking sides.

"Each country can fight its own battles and advertise its own point of view, each has its own followers who only see this point of view, and my desire is to put forward all points of view. I do not wish to consider any country in the right or the wrong, nor do I wish to see a peace concluded that is a peace not entirely for the benefit of civilisation, and I do not believe that the Supreme Being would have permitted this war without this object, and will permit anything but a peace (whoever is victorious), except for the betterment of the world at large."

It was with these sentiments firmly fixed that the Count and his wife undertook their interesting journey. To France, England, back to the Continent through Switzerland, Italy, Serbia, Russia, Belgium, Germany, Austria, and in fact each country in its turn.

No difficulty was found in travelling from one country to another. At the various frontiers, the strictest watch was kept, and a keen scrutiny of passports undertaken.

In Switzerland the great hotels were practically empty, and were charging prices fully 50 per cent. lower than their custom. Other countries were much the same.

CONDITIONS IN GERMANY.

In Germany there was no outward appearance of hardships much less starvation. The cafés, theatres, restaurants were full. The streets animated, and the Count declared it a mistake to consider that Germany was starving. It must be remembered that for years they had been preparing, and that their organisation was so perfect, that all these points had been foreseen and prepared for.

The faith of the German people in Von Hindenburg was extreme, and he was even a more popular character than the Kaiser.

One day the Count interviewed some Russian prisoners, and the following was told him. A Russian was in conversation with a German officer, and said that it made not the slightest difference that the Russians were taken prisoners, there were millions more to take their places. The German replied that the Russians might have millions of soldiers but they had no Von Hindenburg.

During the Count's visit to Venice a Taube aeroplane passed over the city dropping bombs and leaflets, on the latter were printed "These bombs are of French invention, but 'made in Germany.'"

It was the Count's privilege to obtain interviews with King Albert of Belgium and General von Hindenburg, and in all countries throughout which he travelled he was met with much courtesy.

BELGIUM NOT BROKEN.

Speaking of Belgium he said that it was a mistaken idea to imagine the people as broken and weeping, crushed beneath a mailed fist. The people were resigned, and he likened them to parents who had suffered a dreadful loss, and who had reached the stage of realising the loss, and had become resigned to it, but the Belgium people were waiting—waiting and waiting in the full belief that the day would come, when the tide would roll back again.

The damage in Belgium was localised. It was not the whole country that had been laid bare, and devastated. This was only to be seen in particular places and was rapidly disappearing. The Germans are repairing the damage at a great pace. They have certainly Germanised the whole country. Yet the Belgians are patient, resigned and are still waiting.

UNITED RUSSIA.

The Count spoke of the immense patriotism of the Russians, which had even caused them to sink their grievances against the Government, to dismiss thoughts of anarchy, and to unite in one vast whole for a single purpose.

Considerable as was the territory captured by Germany, it was in reality a comparatively small part of the vast Empire, and actually meant no inconvenience to Russia. There was no question as to the Russian belief that ultimate victory was theirs.

In speaking of England and the English, Count de Besa had no criticism to offer and continued on the strictly neutral lines he had predetermined. He had a great admiration for the British people and their characteristics.

On leaving England, where he journeyed at the conclusion of his European experiences, he sailed for Brazil in the Demerara at the time she was attacked by a German submarine. This voyage had the greatest interest for the Count and was at the beginning a time of great excitement. Few people were able to obtain their sleep until after Lisbon was well passed. The Captain had given orders that all passengers should sleep in their clothes, with life belts beside them. One night they were actually ordered to sleep with the belts on. Each night alarms were given to accustom the passengers to instant action. The periscope of a submarine was sighted and all was excitement on board, but the Captain was prepared and the Demerara's guns trained on the enemy and on firing, the submarine disappeared. She was sunk.

Concerning this point there seems to be no doubt because the Demerara claimed and obtained the reward of the British Government for the action. Later, the passengers had further experience of gun fire, this time at a floating mine.

It was during one of the night alarms in which passengers were instructed to go to their respective boats that an incident befel which was one of considerable humour, and although the count relates the story, he cannot vouch for the truth of it. An American on board, at the alarm, seized his overcoat and another which he carried over his arm. On arrival in the boat, he found an Englishman sitting there shivering. He offered the spare coat, only to receive a cold stare and the remark: "I don't think we have been introduced!"

SELF-INTERNEED ALIENS

ORDER AND POVERTY IN NO. 1 DOCK

LIFE ABOARD THE "WOHNSCHIFF" GRANADA

(Exclusive to THE HERALD).

When the first notes of the war bugle rang out from the Central Empires there was a great concentration of German and Austrian elementos as our Argentine friends term it, in Buenos Aires. Penalties for non-compliance with military obligations are strict, besides which many men were time-expired soldiers who had passed to the first reserve, including officers not a few who had exchanged their martial garb and paradeschritt for the insidious warfare of commerce.

Britain moves slowly as a rule—she is still debating about the advisability of naturalised Germans forming part and parcel of her innermost councils—but the exceptions at times make ample amends for her defect. First the concentration of the fleet, and secondly the strict supervision of would-be-fighters-for-the-Fatherland, came like a bolt from the blue—and all over the world the Teuton had perforce to obey the mistress of the seas, and mark time wherever he happened to be at the moment. He is still marking time, in this country at any rate, and Britain, whilst holding up reinforcements for Germany and Austria—to say nothing of Turkey—that are calculated at anything from a half to two million men, if one takes all enemy subjects living abroad, has also scored indirectly by throwing on the local German communities an additional strain at a time when their trade is seriously interfered with.

How severe this strain is in Buenos Aires only those who are in direct touch with the German community know; and they are not likely to tell. It is nevertheless highly probable that a fair proportion of the money collected locally is being spent on local relief. The habilitation of the s.s. Granada, one of the earliest vessels to accept the situation and become interned, as a home for homeless Teutons is a proof to the point. Lying at the head of Dock 1, stern on to the quay, with a very be-draggled ensign of the German equivalent to our naval reserve flying at the jack-staff, her quarter rails are screened off by canvas, whilst a very un-nautical looking erection in the shape of a fence of wooden palings with a locked gate therein crosses the poop a few yards forward of the ladder giving access to the quay. Some wooden huts further alter the character of the poop, whilst in the waist there are more erections evidently designed for housing the homeless.

The most interesting thing of all is however the printed schedule of rules and regulations governing the privilege of using the vessel. Bond Ordnung für das Wohnschiff Granada as the title runs. And let no rabid patriotic Britisher blame us when we say that they strike one as admirable and a proof, if proof were needed, that for all their faults, Germans do understand clear clean-cut organisation and the handling of casual groups of humanity. Roughly translated the rules are as follows:—

Those seeking a night's lodging and morning coffee must apply for a card between 8.30 to 11 a.m. or between 1.30 to 4 p.m.

Each newcomer must have his clothes and himself disinfected by the materials in use aboard the ship immediately on arrival.

A card will be issued entitling bearer to the use of a bed.

The bedrooms will be open between 7 and 9 p.m.

At 7 a.m. the bedroom must be left and the blankets handed over.

Morning coffee at 7.30 a.m. The ship to be left at 8 a.m.

BILLIARDS AFLOAT

AN ARGENTINE INVENTION

The new Argentine invention, disc billiards, a game originated and patented in the Republic by an Italian gentleman, is becoming increasingly popular.

The fascinating game, something of a combination of billiards and deck quoits, is to be adapted to transatlantic vessels and the first vessel to have the game on board is the s.s. Vestris, shortly sailing for New York.

As a supplement to, if not as a leader of, games and pastimes on board ship, the idea is a most welcome one and judging by the way in which this game has gradually become popular in this city it bids especially fair to be the means of whiling away weary hours at sea.

The invention is to be introduced into the United States, where a future should be assured for it, but par excellence it is the game for the ocean and as being one of the very first of its kind will attract much attention.

$ 10 NOTES

FORGED IN MENDOZA.

In Mendoza the police have discovered a very considerable issue of false notes. These are all for the value of $10 and are almost perfect in their imitation and only by the most minute examination is it possible to remark a difference with the genuine issues. The differences to be noted are that the paper of the false notes is a shade more transparent, than the real ones; the official seal of the Public Credit Office is rather more sharply defined and the numbering of the false notes is not perfectly symmetrical nor print in such black ink.

The notes are known to be forged in Mendoza and the police have two clues to the perpetrators. No arrests have as yet been made.

All orders by the ship's officers, crew, or servants, to be promptly obeyed.

Strict personal cleanliness to be observed by those who use the ship.

Smoking in sleeping rooms strictly forbidden.

Sick men to communicate with First Officer, to whom all requests to be allowed to work must also be addressed.

The ship assumes no responsibility for anyone falling overboard, or for any other accident that may arise.

It is difficult to judge by appearances when a man is "down and out," as most of the patrons of the Granada appear to be. Yet in justice it must be said that although furtive in manner and skulking aboard as if ashamed, the majority of the men one noticed looked outwardly clean, whilst the inveterate loafer type was manifestly absent. Only the most rampant mind could conceive of these men as anything but unfortunate pawns in the great game of war. Doubtless when returned to the Prussian feldwebel and brigaded with many regiments of their fellows they would be capable of anything. But certainly their aspect to-day moves to compassion tinged with contempt rather than to anger. If there are still those who ask what our navy is doing, a visit to the Granada as the dusk falls and her hapless boarders come to roost may be recommended. And if the visitor will remember that in New York, in San Francisco, and in many another neutral port throughout the Seven Seas a similar sight is to be witnessed he may, if he has any imagination whatsoever, realise one of the many phases of the great victory that has been achieved by the silent vigil of the Grand Fleet off the lowlying coasts and treacherous shoals that fringe the northern sea whither these sad-eyed and sullen victims of their birth would fain return.

Sports and Pastimes

THE TURF

PALERMO

In referring to the results of Sunday's racing at Palermo it can be said at the outset that, in general, these were not surprising. It was recognised beforehand that such a programme was an exceptionally tricky one, and it was without question a case of "Pity the lot of the poor selector." This being recognised, many peculiar results were expected, but in spite of this there were still one or two events of the programme, the results of which were nothing short of astounding.

Perhaps, not only as the most important event, but also on account of the finish the Premio Comparacion took the biscuit.

Picacero won in a hack canter from Wotan, with Ocurrencia a length and a half behind the second and 4 lengths behind the winner!!

There is little to be said concerning this result, but that little is sufficiently serious. There is no racing man at Palermo, who for one second accepts this result as a reasonable one. The crack filly has beaten Picacero on every occasion they have ever met and beaten him out of sight.

Wotan was some 5½ lengths away from her when fourth in the Carlos Pellegrini. There was no change in the weights, and according to the majority of the experts, the distance suited Ocurrencia. We, therefore, wind up a sad story by stating, which was palpable, that the filly was not well. She was both ill and overworked. But here comes a more serious matter. Why under these conditions was she allowed to go to the starting post? It is an absurdity to say that these points were not recognised. They were remarked by a dozen spectators before the race who are not experts, nor trainers and if it is claimed that "they" (those responsible for Ocurrencia going to the post), did not know that she was both sick and overworked, then all that can be said, they had better go back to school and learn their business properly. From a public point of view it was a scandal and thousands of dollars were lost. From a point of view of racing sportsmanship—well. To be accurate there could be no viewpoint of this description. Sportsmanship never entered into the question at all, and to sum up the whole affair was unfair on the public and unfair on the filly.

Picacero is a fine colt and won in a beautiful manner, and absolutely dominated the field, when called upon. He was a perfect picture to look at, so far as his condition went, and he thoroughly deserved his sensational victory. It was sensational, and the dead and stricken hush, which fell upon the crowd at the finish of the event testified to this. Mingo received a mixed reception when parading in the next event, but this it may be said was in very bad taste. He had nothing to do with it, and no doubt felt as equally sick, if not more so, than the public. These things do happen, but so far as Sunday was concerned, they should and could have been avoided, and the very least that could now be done, would be a full publication of how such a blunder occurred and to let the public know who was the truly responsible person for such a distasteful occurrence.

There were other events which shocked and surprised but these come under the heading of "the uncertainties of the Turf" from an ordinary and not an extraordinary point of view.

In the first race there was not over much to surprise in seeing Posadas (considering the distance) beaten by Santa Damiana, but that Tata Dios should share the honours is hardly reasonable, considering the way he has run, (or rather so now it proves) been run, of late. We thought Tata

Dios had gone off, apparently he hasn't.

Incidental to this race it may be mentioned that Periwinkle was suspended from racing, for a period not stated, for misbehaviour at the post. Pedro Costa, his jockey, was held blameless.

Vanity was on the book for the second race, but hardly expected as a winner. Our speciality Piridina, after all came within half a head of doing the trick. Augusta for inexplicable reasons utterly failed. One somewhat remarkable point was that both Piridina and Yerba Mota, two fillies without any running form, should have been backed so heavily. The tip evidently went round with the result that they each had well over 7000 tickets apiece on them. Previously Yerba Mota had 600 odd all told and Piridina 700 odd the first run and 2000 the second.

It was a race with a very well ridden finish, and the favourite Vanity only just got home.

El Payo put it across the public in the third race, and one of the reasons for this is that the public have a very short memory, otherwise he would never have been allowed to pay $58.80. Of course the race looked a good thing for Saint Moritz, and he was backed as though he was already a winner, before going to the post. El Payo used to run race after race into places some little time ago, and was unquestionably entitled to more consideration than a 1000 odd winning tickets. When all is said and done the real surprise of the race was the second place occupied by Giver Or who on Nov. 7 ran nowhere with 1500 tickets on him and on Sunday was second favourite with 8600 tickets! Well, well, these little things can't be helped.

The cert of the day (save Ocurrencia) namely Pregon got home in a walk by 1¾ lengths from Uriburu, and paid well considering, but this was the last of it for the public. Outsider after outsider rolled home during the remainder of the programme, but just for once the last event of the day was not won by the real outsider of the party.

It was Pasco's win in the sixth event that appealed to us as the most surprising of all the day's results. El Payo, if one remembers had a reasonable chance and sufficient form to go on. Pasco was different. As for Cochita and Perjura, there was nothing whatever unreasonable in their positions. Lovelace was the failure of the race, and we incline to think a rest would be most beneficial to him.

San Paulo beat Siete y Medio a head in the seventh race, which provided a really splendid finish. Bolin was clean out of the hunt, and that sink of money, Aguerriro once again cost the public a tidy sum.

It was somewhat surprising to see Radiant at 55 kilos, so completely beaten, and especially when the time 1.38 2/5 is considered. Siete y Medio put up a very fine race, but could not withstand the tremendous rush of San Paulo at the finish, he came on like a whirlpool, and just collared the youngster on the post.

On his last performance the public plumped on Gringuito to win the last race of the day. We remarked upon the unsatisfactory nature of the selection of Gringuito, who so far has been exceedingly untrustworthy, and as it turned out we were right in that and wrong in selecting him.

Folleto, the only horse in the race with anything like consistent form, won with ease, and quite outran the struggling pair Gringuito and Palo Errao, who finished up in this order with a short head between them.

Folleto's win is all the more creditable on account of the number of light weighted horses in the race, as the odds were that he would be run off his legs at the start, and fail to produce his real finishing powers at the end. Chambery tried his best to do this, but all to no purpose. After making the running by many lengths, he completely faded away and came in dead last, rolling from side to side, dead beat. This is worth remembering for future occasions.

The average winning ticket of the day produced $20.25.

LA PLATA

There was not an especially large attendance at the races at La Plata on Sunday, nor were there quite such a number of upsets of form, as was the case on Friday last. Still one or two nasty shocks were dealt out to the public. The biggest dividend paid was $24.80 by Gualicho, and considering that the horse has done absolutely nothing, even this dividend was a remarkably small one.

On the whole the public had a good day, but favourite prices ruled exceedingly low, especially for La Plata.

A remark may be made that a match has been arranged for $2000 between Perlino and Diorita. The latter won an important event at La Plata on Nov. 19, when Perlino did not run. The match, a sporting one, will be run at the close of next Sunday's programme at La Plata over a mile, at level weights. It should be interesting.

THE JOCKEY CARDOSO

After his fall with Prologo at La Plata on November 19, and some nasty knocks received from Hidrato, in the running of the race, the jockey Cardoso was taken to hospital. From information received yesterday evening it is possible to report his condition as satisfactory.

All danger of complications has disappeared, and the Don Gonzalo trainer will be up and about in the saddle again in the course of a few days.

BASEBALL

ARMOURS V. B.A.B.C.

The greatest defeat in local baseball history can be placed at the door of the Buenos Aires Baseball team.

This terrible failure after so many failures, occurred on Sunday, at La Plata, and the victory went with the practically invincible team, Armour's.

The score of 32 to 15, an unprecedented number of runs, shows a battery brigade that surely must have strength behind it.

The locals have no outfield work at all. Not one ball was caught in that particular vicinity, and the only innings where the B. A. team pulled off some game was the initial noe, where Cronan, the 3rd base man, made a most sensational stop, which aroused the admiration of the rival team as well as the spectators.

One does not know whom to blame for this ignominious failure on the part of the B. A. team, to make good.

Tuero, their pitcher, is certainly not to blame; their basemen are fairly strong, and their batting qualities may be even styled sterling—the fault apparantly lies in the team work, and more especially in the outfield.

It is safe to say that the Buenos Aires team possess the weakest outfielders of any contesting team this season, and that is evidenced by the fact that in the last three games which they played, only one ball has been caught in the outfield. Something should be done to amend these conditions. Their ever-changing feats is also one of their weak points. This constant alteration of players tends to make the men nervous and insecure as to the qualities of the new players, and thus the whole group go up in the air.

FRIGORIFICO ARGENTINO V. LA PLATA

At Talleres, the La Plata team received a huge surprise in the person of Phillips, the new twirler of the Argentinos, who pitched the winning game, 17 to 14.

La Plata, encouraged by former victories, entered the contest overflowing with hope, but they were fated to return home lower in spirits.

Hayes started on the mound for the Argentino Central, but was relieved by Phillips, in the second inning.

This new pitcher is a prodigy, and shows proofs of going a long way in deciding this season's winner.

On Sunday, he made his debut this year, and never for a moment was he forced to extend himself. He fanned the redoubtable Schick three times, which previous records prove to have been an almost impossible accomplishment. Phillips, it can be truthfully said, pitched a sparkling game, but was not strongly supported.

The Argentino Central boys went after Schick from the very start, and pounded him unmercifully all over the field.

The game was pretty evenly contested until the seventh inning, the score then being a tie 10—10. The Argentino Central boys came to bat in their half of the inning with "a do or die spirit" and right there Mr. Schick did not exhibit his usual coolness in such an emergency. Kemp led off with a single and was advanced to second by Hitlin, who reached first safely. Rehmer and Herrod singled scoring Kemp and Hitlin. Tuthill reached first on an error by Schick, Rehmer scoring. Herrod crossed the plate on an attempt to get him out at third. Mihara advanced Tuthill to second and reached first base. Hayes sent a high fly to Winchcabbish, who muffed the ball, Tuthill and Mihara scoring and Hayes anchored on third base. On an error by Vaitses, McEnnelley reached first, Hayes crossing the pan with the seventh run and none out. Phillips singled; and then Schick wiped his brow, laced his shoes, righted his cap and tightened his belt another notch and fanned Kemp, who had batted around. Hitlin sent up an easy fly to Sturgeon

CRICKET

LOMAS v. BUENOS AIRES.

A friendly game was played on Sunday between Lomas and their visitors, Buenos Aires. Winning the toss, Lomas batted first, and Mawson with Campbell faced Brown and Brandon bowling.

Harry Mawson played beautiful cricket, and in his usually attractive style knocked up 59 runs, all round the wicket before being caught by Hearne. Cowes in his innings of 63, while being larger than Mawson's, did not compare with it in either style or all-round play. But Cowes with Cockcroft put up a most valuable partnership. Lomas's innings closed for 231 runs. G. G. Brown, considering the wicket, had a good bowling average of 5 for 94, and throughout the innings had but little rest.

Buenos Aires commenced their innings disastrously, and had it not been for G. G. Brown and Brandon, the last two men in, their score would have been a painful one. As it was, only 100 were scored. Lawrie captured four B. A. wickets for 37. The game, although so one-sided, was a thoroughly enjoyable one, and played in perfect weather. The scores were:

and Rehmer ended the rally by grounding out to Schick.

The acquisition of Phillips by the Argentino Central has boosted their stock 100 per cent., and a great game should be witnessed at La Plata next Sunday when Phillips faces Lopez, the Armour wonder.

The Argentino Central boys were rooting hard for the B. A. boys to trim Armour as this would have made the race more even, but the impossible did not happen and Buenos Aires returned to Constitucion full of confidence, yet angrier than ever.

The game at Talleres was well attended, and shows how popular the American national pastime is becoming in the Argentine. The ladies were quite in evidence, and their rooting could be heard far above the warbles let out by the so-called "stronger sex."

SAN ISIDRO v. BUENOS AIRES C.C.

This friendly game was played at Talleres on Sunday, when the visitors managed to win by 17 runs. An enjoyable afternoon's play was indulged in, but with the exception of a good innings by Shoyer for San Isidro, all other players except Luck for B.A.G.S. failed to reach double figures. Considering the wicket, this speaks well enough for the bowling. Goodfellow was deadly, and secured six wickets for 27. Shoyer 4 for 22, and Scorey 6 for 42. Bennett in the five overs bowled by him, came out with the extraordinary figures of 5 overs 3 maidens, 4 runs, and 4 wickets.

The game was finished early, and San Isidro gave a second innings to the homesters, who rattled up by lively cricket 106 for 2 before stumps were drawn.

The day was voted a most enjoyable one. Scores:—

B.A.C.C. 2nd v. BELGRANO 2nd.

Played at Palermo on Sunday, this friendly game resulted in a win for Belgrano by 47 runs. The best innings of the day was an attractive one of 77, by R. H. Thomson, obtained through thoroughly good and careful cricket. The weather, no doubt, was against energetic fielding. Some chances were missed, but the main fault lay in an inability to save runs. It was, however, an all-round, good game, and the details of the score were:

ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL

RACING (4) v. PORTENO (0).

This match, which produced some highly attractive forward play on the part of Racing, was played on Sunday and Porteno went down to the tune of four goals to nil, before the prowess of the Racing team.

One of the features of the game was the splendid play of Rithner in goal, before the superlative combination he had to face.

The first half was in the nature of a bombardment of the Porteno goal, and it speaks highly for Rithner's play when only one shot (from Ohaco) beat him in the first half.

In the second half Porteno played up, but were always outclassed, and on the afternoon's play Racing were at least 10 goals the better team. Porteno has no one to thank but the goalkeeper for suffering the comparatively light defeat they did.

The goal-scorers in the second half were Ohaco, Canaveri, and Betular. For Porteno Izaguirre was the best and most prominent player. The composition of the teams was as follows:—

Racing.—Arduino, S. Ochoa, A. Reyes, A. Betular, F. Olazar, R. Pepe, Z. Canaveri, A. Ohaco, J. J. Hospital, A. Comaschi, and J. N. Perinetti.

Porteno.—J. J. Rithner, R. Gonzalez, Escarra, O. N. Beltrame, J. Ayala, A. Uslenghi, V. Abalia, A. Galup Lanus, C. Izaguirre, A. Piaggio, N. Olariaga, M. Garat.

CLUB CHAMPIONSHIPS.

The Spring and Club Championship Tournament of the Buenos Aires Lawn Tennis Club was brought to a termination on Sunday in ideal weather.

Miss Mackenzie captured the Ladies' Championship from Miss Lanusse, and Mr. L. H. Knight again secured the title in the men's section by defeating Mr. Jenkins.

The Mixed Doubles handicap provided an attractive and hard-fought match between Mrs. Mackenzie and Colville Jones—2/6 and Miss Mackenzie and A. J. Villegas—40. This was the semi-final game, and was won by the former pair, who had much less difficulty in disposing of Miss Dumas and Mr. Cerboni in the finals.

Mrs. H. H. Woodgate, the wife of the Club President, gave away the prizes at the conclusion of the play. This lady was thanked for doing so in the usual manner, and Mr. H. Waite, the popular Club Secretary, was also the recipient of three cheers, for the splendid services he rendered the Club. The final results were as follows:—

Gents' Club Championship.—Final: L. H. Knight beat Jenkins, 2-6, 6-0, 6-4, 8-6.

GASCON LAWN TENNIS CLUB.

Favoured with beautiful weather over the week-end the Open Spring Tournament was brought to a conclusion on Sunday afternoon. A fair number of members and friends were present at the finals, and were rewarded by some interesting tennis, though several of the matches did not produce the close finishes anticipated.

In the Mixed Doubles Miss Rogers and Hoare somewhat unexpectedly beat Miss Recknell and Croker, who had shown excellent form in the earlier stages.

In the Men's Singles Pentreath, relying to a great extent upon lobbing, had a fairly easy win in the first set over G. C. Crispin. In the second set, from an almost hopeless position the latter player put up a splendid fight, and the match promised an exciting finish. However, the odds, —30.2, proved rather too much, and Pentreath took the set and match at 6-4.

In the Ladies' Singles Miss Kelly, after being down by 5-6 in the first set, took the other two with, to judge by the score, ease, though the game was not so one-sided as the score-book indicated.

The Ladies' Doubles proved an easy win for the home pair, Miss M. Yorston and Miss C. Purves, the visitors from Lomas, not displaying anything like their true form. The Men's Doubles went to Pellens and Fairclough. After losing, the opponent won the second and third sets very easily.

The following is the result of the matches played during the week-end:

Saturday:

Miss Rogers and Hoare, —15.3, beat Miss Griggs and Yorston, —1/6, 6-1, 6-5.

Miss M. Yorston and Chalk, scr., beat Miss Donaldson and Herald, —1/6, 2-6, 6-4, 6-0.

At the close of play the prizes were handed to the winners by Mrs. Edw. den Hoed, after a few introductory remarks by the Secretary.

During the afternoon a welcome and enjoyable tea was dispensed by the lady members of the Club.

ABUSES OF CHARITY

POLICE REGULATIONS.

Owing to the numerous cases in which fraudulent appeals for charity have been made to the public both by persons in the streets and by the visitation of private residences and offices, the police have decided to take steps to abate the nuisance. In some cases these persons wear the garb of Sisters of Charity or rather a close imitation of it and others carry collecting boxes or lists, more or less fictitious. Such impostors are naturally very injurious to the operation of really charitable enterprise and the Chief of Police has issued the following regulations:—

No one shall be permitted to ask charity or assistance in the public streets or highways even if the object alleged be for charitable institutions except those possessing permission from competent authority.

House to house visitations of a similar description are likewise forbidden.

This is an excellent regulation if it be possible to carry it out but so "slim" are the beggars and so numerous that the eyes of Argus and the hands of Briareus would be requisite to watch and apprehend them all. Also the wealthy charitable will continue to fall an easy prey and will forget to demand to see the permit of "competent authority" still a few convictions and small punishments may do much to keep down these "Palmer Worms of the Commonwealth."

FUNES TENNIS CLUB, F.C.C.A.

On Sunday next the annual match between Funes and the Argentino Tennis Club will take place at Funes, where the courts are in splendid order and the local players, such as are left now the war has made such inroads on the tennis talent of the place, have greatly improved. It is hoped that a good show will be put up against the visitors.

Mrs. Butt, wife of Mr. Albert Butt, this year's President, is attending to the social side of the function, and is holding herself responsible for the tea.

Argentine Bankruptcy Laws

IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

On many occasions THE HERALD has supported the ever-spreading agitation in favour of a complete revision of the local bankruptcy laws, dealing with the subject in many cases from the basis of practical experience, experience that it shares with most concerns engaged in business in this Republic. It admits that in theory the arrangement whereby the creditors are left to settle their own affairs with the debtor is excellent. What it objects to is that in actual practices the said settlement passes into the hands of professional liquidators who for many reasons find that the assets of the firm in difficulties fade away before the heavy law costs, depreciated prices obtained in auction, and the general confusion that attends on the passing of a firm through the bankruptcy courts.

Concrete examples are not hard to find, but it would be difficult to equal the case of a firm in Cordoba province recently declared bankrupt and liquidated by order of the courts. The figures are compiled by a commercial man interested in the failure, and though striking, are by no means exceptional. Briefly the facts appear to be as follows:—On going before the courts their statement showed creditors whose claims totalled $225,835.19 c/l. Assets consisted of some real estate, carrying a mortgage, a large sum in book debts, and the stock of a big camp store. The property on which the mortgage was placed, a mortgage of $20,000 c/l. only brought in $13,200 at judicial auction, so that nothing was forthcoming from that quarter. Indeed the liquidators had to pay some $196.50 to clear off taxes ere the auction could be held. The stock of merchandise, furniture, horses, carts, and some shares realised $12,400 c/l. Book debts brought $50. In all the liquidators had $12,506.08 wherewith to pay claims of $225,823.19 c/l.

That is the first chapter. Lacking more detailed information as to the assets it is impossible to say whether they were disposed of to the best advantage or not. Experience has shown that as a rule these judicial auctions are looked on as a golden opportunity for picking up something for next to nothing. Time and place are advertised in a most unostentatious manner, and generally the purchasers are found to be intimate friends of either the liquidator or the auctioneer. Whether that was so in the present case cannot be said with certainty. What is certain is that the distribution of the small sum realised lends itself to very caustic comment. It stands thus:—

Solicitor to the bankrupts,
his charges	$3,000.00
Accountant, and his assistant	3,759.00
Cost of Inventory of stock, etc.	300.00
Auctioneer and his charges	564.55
Remuneration of Liquidator and his assistant	2,196.50
Expenses of Liquidator and his assistant	1,360.25
Taxes paid	196.50
Employees of bankrupt firm, 47 o/o of their privilege claim (salaries)	625.78
Dividend to creditors on $225,823.17 at 25 per claims	Nil

$12,506.08
As the correspondent from whom these figures are obtained remarks "this gives some idea of the conditions of the bankruptcy laws of this Republic.... No wonder that traders curtail credits!"

This case, put thus, reads as if it were exceptional. It is not. To-day the common trade creditors get no-

F.C. CENTRAL CORDOBA

The Year's Operations

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

The 29th ordinary general meeting of the Cordoba Central Railway Company was held in London on October 28, when the Directors' report and the balance-sheet for the year ended June 30, 1915, were presented.

In common with all other South American railways, the year's operations were materially affected by the depression, by unfavourable weather conditions, and finally by the dislocation of business consequent on the war. The gross receipts for the year were £1,691,714, as against £1,969,020 in 1914, and the working expenses were £1,202,462, compared with £1,347,998, the reduction of the latter item evidently being due to an early appreciation on the part of the management of the necessity for economy. The net profit for the year was £489,251, as against £621,021 the previous year, a decrease of £131,770. Sundry additions such as interest brought the balance up to £492,194. The Company paid £320,000 as interest at 4 per cent. on the first debenture stock; £225,000 on the 4½ per cent. second debentures, and £7,937 as interest at 6 per cent. on the three-year notes. The total thus absorbed was £552,937, leaving a debit balance of £60,742. The Directors state that the amalgamation of the three railways now constituting the Cordoba Central system enabled them to practice efficient and economical management. The traffic receipts, they pointed out, were adversely affected by the loss to the sugar crop of Tucuman owing to frosts, but they observed a general improvement in Argentine trade, and the Company was now well able to take care of a considerable expansion of traffic through the purchase of additional rolling stock.

The report continues:—

"The latest cable advices received from the Argentine are to the effect that there are still considerable quantities of grain and sugar awaiting transport over the Company's lines, and that in the greater part of the cereal district the coming harvests promise good yields. To meet the new conditions which have arisen, the greater part of the Company's rates have been raised by 10 per cent. as from the 1st October. A similar increase in tariffs has been made by other Argentine railways.

"The proposals submitted at the last general meeting for the cancellation of the working agreement with the Argentine Railway Company having been approved by the proprietors, the Company resumed the management of its property in the Argentine as from the 2nd December, 1914, and Mr. H. G. Cabrett, the General Manager, has since visited London, thus giving the Directors the opportunity of personally discussing with him many matters of importance affecting the Company's interests. In order to meet liabilities of capital accounts as they have fallen due, six per cent. three-year notes of the Company, repayable December 15, 1917, have been issued to the extent of £248,600, in pursuance of the authority given to the Directors at the last general meeting. The Directors desire to record their special appreciation of the services rendered by the Company's representatives and staff in the Argentine during a year of exceptional difficulty."

thing; the mortgage creditors, if they buy in, may at some future time recoup themselves; the privilege creditors get half their claim. But; and this is what one wishes to emphasise; the hangers-on of the commercial courts—for the best members of the legal fraternity do not care for commercial liquidations—get their pound of flesh every time, who ever else may suffer. Further comment is surely superfluous.

F. C. OESTE

Annual General Meeting

THE CHAIRMAN'S SPEECH

On Oct. 26 the 26th Annual General Meeting of the Buenos Aires Great Western Railway was held at River Plate House, Finsbury Circus, London.

The Chairman of the Company, Sir Henry Bell, presided, and said that untoward results were due entirely to the enormous rainfall of last year. Actual seas were formed, which, when wind rose, formed breakers, washing away the embankments. The trains were kept running by the heroic and energetic action of the engineering staff, but at an extra cost of £122,825. There had been no such climatic conditions in the preceding 25 years. He proceeded:

I think, therefore, we may fairly look on this amount of £122,825 as an extraordinary expenditure, but, when we resume our usual dividend, and our good friends and critics in Argentina are talking and writing about the profits they say the English railways are making, they must deduct this sum, for it is a charge which must be met out of revenue and not out of capital. (Hear, hear.) The sum has therefore been charged direct to working expenses. The Board were deeply disappointed at the results of the year's working, knowing what excellent prospects had been spoiled by the deluge, for as late as December 24 Mr. Lertora wrote that "Optimism reigned supreme in grain circles," but in January came heavy rains and severe floods, and later frosts and hail, some of the hailstones weighing 10½ ozs.

Gross receipts for the year amounted to £2,522,682, which, deducting working expenses, £1,505,284, leaves a net sum of £1,017,398.

After adding rentals, interest, etc., and the balance brought forward from 1913-1914, and deducting the fixed charges and other payments, there is a balance of £260,515 10s. 1d., to which we propose to add £160,000 from the General Reserve Fund, giving us in all £420,515 10s. 1d., and out of this amount we recommend a balance dividend of 3 per cent., less tax, on the Ordinary Stock, leaving £53,911 4s. 9d. to be carried forward. It was to enable us to pay 5 per cent. for the year that we have transferred £160,000 to Net Revenue from the General Reserve Fund.

Working expenses are naturally higher on account of smaller traffic, the percentage being 59.67 as compared to 58.82 last year. Every possible wise economy has been made. Locomotive Stock Maintenance shows an increase of £9,700, and £3000 under Waggon Stock Maintenance are due to repairs in anticipation of heavy traffic.

After all, the outcry about "dear coal," fuel actually cost less by £10,000 than in the previous year, owing to beginning the year with an ample stock of cheap coal. Probably owing to present high freights, the next fuel bill will show a different result, as 31s. per ton has been paid in Buenos Aires, and in the open market the rate has touched 45s. The working expenses of War Insurance, paid for the first time, were also referred to. Passenger receipts have fallen off by $79,914, chiefly in long distance through bookings, owing to abnormal conditions prevailing, and also to electric tramway competition. It is hoped with the electrification of the suburban lines to recover this loss by rapid and frequent service. Gross receipts per train mile show an increase of 6d., with a decrease of actual train mileage of 191,269 miles. There are 1867 miles of track open as compared with the previous 1792. Many trains are scheduled trains which the Government will not allow to be suppressed, and it is necessary to be careful in anxiety to reduce train mileage that there be no undue delays causing forfeit of freight, and rendering the Company liable to fines. This in no way infers criticism of the Government Department, which has accorded every consideration.

During the year under review the Argentine Chambers passed a law conferring pensions on all permanent railway employes, one of its provisions, among many, being that railway companies were ordered to increase their rates. This increase, which has by a Regimentary Decree been fixed at 1 per cent, is to be considered the State's contribution to the fund.

The Company's lawyers in Buenos Aires consider this law unconstitutional because it does not tax everyone in the same business equally. For example, most of the railways running north and south have river competition, and these competitors are not ordered to increase their rates. This example is taken because it does not apply to the Western, and it is therefore an unselfish one. Secondly, they hold that to order us to increase rates is as much an intervention as would be an order to decrease them, and is therefore directly at variance with Clause 9 of the Mitre Law under which companies work, and which clearly states the conditions which must arise before railway tariffs can be intervened in by the Government, and these conditions have not yet arisen. Congress has been asked to pass an Explanatory Act as to the actual meaning of the Mitre Law.

The Chairman sympathetically referred to the retirement of Mr. Santiago Brian as legal representative in Argentina, who is succeeded by Mr. A. F. Lertora, who has been 35 years with the Company as Traffic and General Manager, in which latter post Mr. Frank Foster, for 17 years Chief Engineer, succeeds him. An Engineer as General Manager is a practical check on expense. Mr. Lowe Brown, who has been in charge of the tunnel work, becomes Chief Engineer.

Finally, said the Chairman, I may add that our traffics for last week show an increase of £13,000, and are now £124,000 in excess of the comparing period of last year. (Applause.)

On the motion of Sir J. White Todd, the Directors' Report and Statement of Accounts was received and adopted.

In the course of some observations Mr. T. C. Gibson said, referring to certain often repeated assertions: There is one more remark I should like to make, and that is with regard to the public and popular assertion in Argentina that the railways make fat profits—an assertion which seems to have grown haphazard from a general statement and become a creed. I think it is an assertion that it would be well to have arrested. No one in Argentina can put his finger upon any fat profits of railway companies. Amid all the accumulated wealth of that rich country, and with all the vast sums lying idle there to-day in private hands, are any investments being made in the railways? The investor in Argentina accustomed to large returns out of the bounty of his own rich country turns from the railways as an investment. For him they pay too little. When the investor in Argentina invests in the railways, he will prove that the profits are good. Till then, he proves nothing.

It was also resolved that a balance dividend of 3 per cent., making with the interim dividend paid in April last 5 per cent. (less Income Tax) for the whole year, be and the same is hereby declared on the Ordinary Stock of the Company.

General approval was expressed at the provision made for the family of the late Mr. F. E. Faithfull, Secretary of the Company, a sum of £2500, in addition to any benefit, being granted for the benefit of his widow and children.

Mr. David Simson and Mr. A. E. Bowen were unanimously re-elected Directors. Messrs. Deloitte, Plender, Griffiths and Co., and Messrs. Cash, Stone and Co., were reappointed Auditors for the ensuing year, and after a further expression of confidence by shareholders in the Chairman and Board of Directors, the meeting terminated.

Agricultural & Pastoral

CAMP NOTES

(By Our Agricultural Editor.)

The heavy rainfall at the beginning of the week will improve harvest prospects very much in the drier districts, where there are large areas of wheat that it will very materially benefit. Some districts, in the Queen Province, are already crying out that they have had too much rain, with the accompanying report about bridges being carried away, and their communications to the station severed. There is always some detrimental factor, and the locusts may cause considerable damage this season. Grass is now abundant everywhere, and cattle are doing well, though prices in the camp for good quality beef have been somewhat easier, and would show a slight decline from the values ruling a few weeks ago.

The sales of Lincoln rams have this season been very good, but the last sale from La Primera Estancia, the property of Srs. Martin R. Puchuri, constitutes a record for the high quality of the sheep on offer, and the values realised. Sr. José M. Imaz paid $5000 for a splendid ram, and $2500 was paid by the same buyer for another good specimen. Two others realised $2000, and were also purchased by Sr. Imaz. The high average of $2120 was obtained for ten rams sold.

The foregoing lot of Lincoln rams were said to have an admixture of New Zealand Lincoln blood which would account for their being so well woolled, while their stronger frames would be retained by their origin—the English Lincoln. This is a very advantageous cross, and would account for the firm demand experienced on Wednesday for the sixteen imported Lincolns from the New Zealand and Australian Land Co., and sold here by Messrs. Gibson Bros. This lot experienced a very firm demand, and the high average of $2043 was secured for the sixteen sheep sold. These sheep had many points to recommend them, but their size was not one, as they were mostly six-tooth, at which age a sheep is as big as ever he will be.

The New Zealand Trading Company also participated in the firm demand ruling for New Zealand Lincolns, and sold some very nicely woolled sheep on Thursday, Nov. 18 to good advantage. These sheep, though somewhat lacking in size, were nicely covered with very dense fleeces of extra fine quality wool, and will no doubt have a beneficial effect on the flocks for which they have been acquired for service.

That handsome lot of imported Aberdeen Angus bulls principally bred by Mr. J. J. Cridlan and sold by Señor Ricardo Hogg were possibly the best five bulls of their breed that have ever been seen together in this Republic, and were a splendid advertisement for the great beef producing qualities of the breed. The high average of $5240 for five bulls sold is said to constitute a world's record price for the breed, while the $12,500 paid for "Idart of Maismore" is the record price in this Republic for an Aberdeen-Angus bull, the previous record being $2000, paid for a bull belonging to Sr. Benito Villanueva, and acquired by Col. Alfredo A. P. de Urquiza. "Idart of Maismore" was keenly competed for, the Samuel B. Hale Co., being plucky bidders, as they required a good quality bull, while the Messrs. Enrique Brown and Hermanas, fresh from their many successes with the breed at the recent fat stock show, were determined to secure this noteworthy sire for their herd. This bull was one of the best I have ever seen. He was splendid on his back, with a perfectly set in tail, and carried a great wealth of flesh on the leg while he was also a deep fleshed animal and near the ground, though he was lighter on a part of his neck than he might have been. This bull had a splendid show record, having won many leading honours at important home shows. Mr. Hogg said it had afforded him the greatest satisfaction to see the interest leading Shorthorn breeders had evinced in this consignment of noteworthy specimens, and it augurs well for the increasing popularity of the breed in this Republic.

Several agents for the purchase of heavy draught horses are reported to be again inquiring after lots of the right stamp. The spring farm work in Britain is likely to firm the demand and make it possible again to ship the right class of animals from here, which are by no means as plentiful as some of the native papers appear to believe. According to them there are plenty of horses. Yes, and so there are, of a kind that are not worth their freight to Britain, for all they would be likely to realise there when submitted for auction. Yet many estancieros cannot understand why buyers of horses for export are so careful and will only accept sound animals of quality for the purpose intended. Sellers have an idea that an animal which may be very serviceable on the soft roads here, or go well in the plough, constitutes all that is desired as an ideal horse for work in Britain. If the work be heavy carting on the blocked streets, his hoofs or tendons with the slight exertions here on soft ground may just be showing "something" that the expert horse dealer from home knows would not enable such an animal to stand many weeks' work under the different conditions which would make him a total wreck. The buyers of such class of horse at home know their business, and will pay big prices, but only for animals that appear likely to give a good result for their purpose or class of work. The ordinary nondescript brute, so useful here in many ways, is not wanted in Britain, and is practically unsaleable, at least so far as profits to the shipper are concerned.

To illustrate the high prices paid for good quality animals suitable for export, the Messrs. Drysdale received the high figure of $13.50 for a very nice lot of 126 lambs in Wednesday's market. These animals were loaded at Catrilo, and sold by Sr. Juan Anasgasti, the La Blanca being the purchasers.

Mr. Joseph Shepherd sold three very useful young bulls at the satisfactory average of $3933, at the Messrs. Bullrich's yard, on November 19. Included in this lot was a very nice deep fleshed young white bull which made the satisfactory figure of $6200. A number of imported Lincoln rams belonging to the same importer also realised very satisfactory prices.

The Buenos Aires Pacific Railway have formulated a scheme for closer settlement along their line, which is to be hoped will give good results. The settlement of small families of agriculturists is to be encouraged, and will undoubtedly have a very far-reaching and beneficial result for this Railway. Closer settlement is a problem which has on many occasions seriously occupied the attention of the Government authorities here, but so far the results obtained have not been as satisfactory as was anticipated. Under the competent technical staff of this progressive railway company, and following a clearly defined policy, the result, it is to be hoped, will give further encouragement to this most commendable proposition.

DEATH OF A CHAMPION SHIRE STALLION.

The death is announced of the Champion Shire stallion "Ratcliffe Charming King," the property of Messrs. Alfred Drabble Bros. and Co. This famous sire and excellent breeding horse was purchased by Mr. E. D. Drabble for 1,000 guineas from Mr. F. Farmsworth in 1908, and a fortnight later won the championship at the Oxfordshire show. This was undoubtedly one of the best Shire horses ever imported into this country, and was full-brother to that great breeding horse, "Ratcliffe Forest King," and also to the champion mare, "Pailton Sorais," which was champion in London and sold for the record price of £1200. "Ratcliffe Charming King" has bred uncommonly well in this country, and has sired many notable winners. "Drabble Model," a two-year-old filly by this horse, was champion at Palermo in 1911, while in the following year, "Drabble Charming Boy" won first prize in the two-year-old class, and was sold at the record price, for this country, for an animal of the heavy draught breed, $7200. Another son, "Drabble Charming Lord," won first in the three-year-old class, and the supreme championship for heavy horses, while a daughter,

"Drabble Spruce," won reserve champion. In 1913 his sons were 1st, 3rd, and 4th in the three-year-old class, and his son, "Drabble Charming Lion," won the supreme championship for heavy horses, these three colts giving the unprecedented average of $4500 each in the sale ring, while his daughter again won reserve champion. In 1914 one of his sons was Reserve Champion, and in 1915 his grandson, "Drabble Fisherman," was first and Reserve Champion, and was sold to Señor Martinez de Hoz for $4200. Two of his sons have also annexed championships at the Rosario Show.

OPEN OR CLOSED PORTS.

The question of whether the ports here are open for the introduction of live stock from the United Kingdom, or are really only closed against the importation of animals from declared infected areas, is causing very grave anxiety to those importers and estancieros, who are interested in the acquisition of breeding stock from Britain.

In conversation with one of the most prominent figures in this trade, he explained to me that Señor Suarez, the head of the animal Sanitary Department, assured him that the only prohibition he was aware of was against stock proceeding from the county of Somerset, where an outbreak of an infectious disease had been declared by the English authorities, and in consequence that particular area had been the only part of the British isles from which the importation of stock was prohibited by this Republic.

In the meantime the Argentine Minister in London has declared that the importation of cattle from the United Kingdom to this Republic is prohibited. Presumably this gentleman is not conversant with the view taken of isolated outbreaks and the measures adopted by the Government here which simply prohibit the importation of animals from the declared infected area, and not from the whole country. The same authority also assured me that the British Minister had not received any official notification that the ports here were closed against the importation of live stock from the United Kingdom. It is very difficult to understand the real cause of this undoubtedly peculiar situation, especially as many leading estancieros have agents in Britain on the outlook for any notable specimens of the respective breeds, with the intention of exhibiting them at the forthcoming International Show, which it is reported will be held during the last week of July, 1916, though no official notification has so far been made.

THE BREEDING OF HORSES.

It is an old and true saying—never truer than it is to-day—that "there is always room at the top," and this applies not only to the human race, but to all the various species of domestic animals.

Thus while the individual who breeds and raises scrub stock may and doubtless often does, find considerable difficulty in disposing of his surplus, the man who successfully devotes his attention to the production of a first-class animal is seldom found complaining for want of a customer. While this is true of all kinds of stock, it is for obvious reasons especially the case with regard to the horse, for while the beef from a scrub steer, the mutton from a scrub wether, the pork from a scrub hog, or the butter from a scrub cow, while not so remunerative as similar products from specially adapted animals, will, if of fair quality, generally find a purchaser, the scrub horse is always a drug on the market, and is sure to be in less and less demand as time passes, and public taste in this respect becomes more fastidious.

On the other hand, the good horse was never in greater request than he is to-day. All over the civilised world the prices paid for the good horse of any distinct class are on the rise, and the man who has him, or can breed him, is sure of his market and his money. This being the case—and that it is so is capable of easy demonstration—it behoves us to do our best to find out how to obtain him. Every man who owns a mare ought, before stinting her, to draw a mental picture of the horse he wants to get from her, and in doing so, must not, of course, lose sight of the mare herself, nor of the influence which she must of necessity yield in bringing his projects to fruition. Her size, shape, make, and breeding must all be considered and carefully weighed before the sire of the future progeny is selected, while he must be chosen with the view of perpetuating the good points and overcoming the deficiencies of the dam. The great initial law of breeding is that of "Heredity," or "like produces like"; and while there are many and frequent deviations therefrom, capable more or less of being guarded against, this is the sheet-anchor of the breeder, the basis of his calculations, and must be acted upon in all cases, except where some individual idiosyncrasy has been incontestably proved to exist. This principle of "like producing like" is so generally recognised that it is scarcely necessary to dwell upon it, except perhaps, to call attention to the truth of it.

THE GARDEN AND ORCHARD

HINTS TO AMATEURS.

(By "The Rustic.")

Garden.—A thorough overhauling of the garden should be effected during the latter part of the month. All bulbs of plants which have finished flowering should be taken out of the ground and stored away. A general clearance of weeds should be made, lawns mowed and rolled. All season plants which have finished flowering must be pulled up, the beds dug up and raked, and the watering in the evenings continued. Evergreens should be trimmed, and rose bushes cleaned of all dried flowers and leaves. The nurseries, where plants have been taken out for the garden, must be dug up, some manure added, and well mixed with the soil, and all preparations made for sowing new seeds during next month.

Orchard.—The fruit is now developing rapidly, and it is easy to tell what harvest is expected provided no plagues come to destroy the fruit, and therefore for those who intend canning or preserving fruit (jams, jellies, etc.), the utensils to be used should be overhauled, the copper pans cleaned and retained if necessary; the stock of empty tins over from last year revised, and new ones ordered, also glass jars, etc. Peeling machines should be put in order, as well as fruit baskets, boxes, etc., for remitting fresh fruit to the markets.

Plagues and Insects.—As the butterflies of the different insect varieties are now appearing, a close watch should be kept on the grubs, which will hatch from their eggs, and spray solutions should be kept ready for their destruction. Principally arsenical solutions are needed. Special attention must be paid to the class of spray used for the different plagues. It is useless to spray lime and sulphur to destroy insects, or tobacco juice, or arsenical solutions for cryptogams. Flowers of sulphur or Boullie Bordaise should be generally used at this season for cryptogams.

GENERAL INFORMATION.

Cryptogams are microscopic plants of the lower vegetable kingdom, which develop in thousands of different species on all kinds of plants and their fruits, under favourable climatic conditions, that is, plenty of heat and moisture. The spores (or seeds) of these plants are suspended in the air, and are capable of remaining in this state for any length of time, until favourable conditions present themselves for their development. Then they will grow and send out roots and branches, and even flowers, of most wonderful shapes and beautiful colours, as seen under the microscope. Their roots bury themselves in the tissues of the plant they grow on, and consume the sap from same, and cripple the life cells of which the tissue is composed until these die. This is why we see the leaves or fruit coming out into yellow or brown spots, and then withering and dying altogether. In other cases, such as the peach, the cryptogam attacks the veins of the leaves, so that they curl up. This same effect is produced by the peach aphid, but of course it can always be distinguished by the presence of the insect. In the vines one form of cryptogam produces little domes on the leaves, the under side of which are lined with what looks like a whitish powder, and covers the younger branches and fruit with the same substance. In the case of the fruit, once the disease is fully developed, the skin of the berry becomes discoloured. It dies eventually, splits in different parts, and then the grape either falls off or remains useless. Others take the form of large spots, dark in colour, which rapidly increase and destroy the skin of the fruit. The cryptogams are, of course, a great enemy of fruit growers, and in some parts of this country, especially around Buenos Aires, are the cause of the utter failure of fruit crops, principally as regards grape vines, which are generally speaking, the most susceptible. There are, however, some exceptions, as some of the hardier varieties are successfully grown in the Tigre Islands, where the damp climate is so favourable to cryptogams, and they give fairly good results.

There are several remedies for cryptogams, but the two principal ones and which are most widely used are flowers of sulphur and Boullie Bordaise. The first is used more as a preventive than a cure, and principally for the vine. The second can be used in a general sense for all plants and is more effective in its results. Its preparation is as follows:—Put 100 litres of water in an open barrel or cask, then place two kilos of sulphate of copper in a piece of sack cloth or thick material and tie it up. Immerse this in the barrel, and keep suspended in the water, when it will dissolve rapidly. In another vessel place one kilo of quick lime which has been previously powdered, and all large lumps removed. Add water slowly until a milky fluid is obtained. Strain this to remove all solid particles, and add slowly to the sulphate of copper, stirring continually. You will thus obtain a solution at 2 per mil. To make it stronger, say 3 per mil., employ 3 kilos sulphate of copper and 1½ kilos of lime. This Boullie is best when used fresh. If a deposit forms, stir up well before using. The preparation should only be made and kept in wooden or enamelled vessels, and should not come in contact with metallic bodies only, of course, when it is applied with the sprayer, which should be made of copper or brass. This spray should be applied preferably after a rain, when the weather is hot, and should rain follow its application, its effect will be nil, and another spraying will be required.

As regards the sulphur, this should be applied with bellows and during the hottest part of the day, as the strong sun's rays are the agents for making it effective in its use.

SAN MARTIN'S HOUSE?

Professor Juan Gez, an eminent authority on Argentine History and archaeology, has been deputed by Government to investigate the genuineness of the house at Yapeyú said to be the birthplace of General San Martin. So far Professor Gez is unable to positively identify any one of the numerous ruins as the site sought for. He has explored the neighbourhood, the remains of the great Jesuit church, the massive stone wall which defended the place from sudden incursions, the Residencia, the Cemetery, but does not feel justified in indicating any spot without corroborative documentary evidence which so far is not forthcoming; the reputed site rests its claims on oral tradition only. The investigations are continuing but it is certain that the economically minded Government will not be inclined to go to charges on any but the most convincing evidence.

FINANCIAL MUDDLE IN MENDOZA

GOVERNMENT SEVERELY CRITICISED.

More inexplicable financial muddle has resulted in the Government of the Province of Mendoza abandoning their proposed work of erecting defences against the rise of the rivers in the Department of San Rafael, which last season caused such a vast amount of damage. The newspaper Los Andes comments freely on the situation and explains the arrangements the government had already made to deal with the proposition.

It appears that a little more than two months ago the Chamber brought in a law allocating a certain sum of money to the purpose of constructing defences. This amount was charged to public lands. A week or so afterwards a special committee was appointed to deal with the detail and to see the matter to a successful termination. Time passed and nothing was done and the increasing anxiety of the population at last brought a deputation before the Executive, who answered that it was impossible to fulfil the law on account of lack of funds. The feeling concerning this reply is most bitter. The Government are especially accused and held blameful, because there is now no time for any protective steps to be taken and a repetition of the floods of last season will be a serious matter to many and it is stated will bring ruin to many agriculturalists who have planted freely, relying on the Government law being fulfilled.

HEAVY RAINFALL IN JUNIN

SEVERE DAMAGE TO VINEYARDS

An immense amount of damage has been done recently in the Department of Rivadavia, Junin and San Martin by a heavy fall of hail. The latest information received states that over an area of 1500 hectares, the hail has completely stripped the vines. What remedies are possible have been carried out. The losses occasioned by the storm, calculating the price of the grape at only one dollar per quintal works out at slightly over half a million dollars.

SHEEP SALES

NEW ZEALAND LINCOLNS.

On November 18, Messrs. A. Bullrich and Co. disposed of a number of imported Lincoln rams from New Zealand, the property of the New Zealand Trading Company. There was a large attendance of interested spectators, and a good selling trade was experienced. These sheep, though some what smaller of frame than the English Lincoln, are recognised as carrying exceptionally heavy fleeces of much finer quality wool, which accounts for the increasing interest shown in the acquisition of these sheep by leading sheepbreeders in this Republic.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY

NO BANQUET BY ST. ANDREW'S SOCIETY OF THE RIVER PLATE.

Unity has always characterised the doings of the local Scottish Society. With the approach of St. Andrew's Day, November 30, the great annual event, the Banquet, came up for decision. When it was ascertained that many of the members were strongly of opinion that the time had not yet come to hold the Banquet, the function was declared "off."

A substantial collection has always been realised at the Banquet for the Benevolent Work, and it is certain that the members will not allow the good work to suffer and to this end the following letter has been sent out.

Dear Brither Scot:

As you are aware, the St. Andrew's Day Banquet was not held last year, owing to the very unsettled state of affairs in connection with the war.

The Committee had under consideration the advisability of holding the banquet this year on the usual date, knowing how much a "Gathering of the Clans" is appreciated in normal times.

It is evident, however, that this is not yet the time to hold "festivities," and as no practical suggestion has been made as to how the Banquet could be conducted without being of a distinctly festal nature, it has been decided, in deference to the expressed wish of many members, to again postpone the event. The Committee hope that this decision, although disappointing to several, will meet with unanimous approval.

As a consequence of the postponement, an appeal is again made necessary for subscriptions to the Benevolent and Charity Funds.

This year, owing to so many members being absent, and for other reasons, the amount received from annual subscriptions will show some falling off compared with previous years, while the calls on the Benevolent Fund, and the amount spent on Education, are higher than the average. The very liberal response made to the appeal last November, has enabled the Committee to meet this larger expenditure, relieve all deserving cases, and carry on the work, without curtailment of any kind. They hope the present appeal will be responded to in such a way that will enable the good work to be continued to the full extent next year.

If the amount subscribed should be larger than what is considered necessary for 1916, it is intended to devote some part of the money to the special purpose of continuing to maintain four beds in the Scottish Hospital, in Rouen, France. This Hospital is maintained by the Scottish Branch of the British Red Cross Society, and the four beds, named the "St. Andrew's Society of the River Plate Beds," have been endowed to date, with monies remitted by the St. Andrew's Society, in the early part of this year.

It is requested that subscriptions be remitted, or advice sent to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. J. A. Aird, Avenida de Mayo No. 761, as soon as possible.

The Rev. Dr. Fleming, at the request of the committee, has again very kindly consented to conduct a special St. Andrew's Day Service. This will be held in St. Andrew's Scotch Church, Calle Belgrano No. 575, on Sunday, November 28, at 11 a.m., when all members and their families are cordially invited to attend.

On behalf of the Committee,
We remain,

Yours very truly,

David C. Anderson, President;
Alex. W. Grant, Hon. Secretary.

If any member does not receive a letter he will be right in assuming that his address in the Register is in need of correction and will greatly oblige by communicating with the Hon. Treasurer, Avenida de Mayo 761.

MRS. PAMPLIN'S CONCERT

A MUSICAL TREAT.

Tuesday, Nov. 16

The musical and artistic success of Mrs. Jessie Pamplin's concert at the Salón Teatro, Cangallo, last evening was undoubted.

The weather perhaps kept a few persons away from filling the hall, but those present could not have been more pleased or more delighted by a perfectly artistic and musically chosen programme.

It would only be possible to mention one slight mistake in judgment and that was the choice by Miss Mercedes Linari of the Dance Macabre in the pianoforte selections. It was well rendered with power and good technique, which is especially creditable in so young a lady, but it was a mistake to repeat the same so closely following the performance of Miss Adela Verne.

Miss Linari has sufficient art and technique or perhaps execution would be more expressive, to make a considerable future reputation for herself. Her rendering of both Saint Saens work and of Rigoletto was good and worthy of attention. The opening trio was played to perfection. Amongst Mrs. Pamplin's earlier songs one entitled "Mistica" the work of Sr. Gaito, who accompanied was perhaps the most pleasing. Its opening chords and bars had a character of originality which was noticeable through the work and peculiar as the music was, it was most tasteful.

Mrs. Pamplin was in excellent voice and bore the brunt of a somewhat heavy vocal programme very well. The gem of this part of the concert was Cadman's Indian Legend "From the Land of the Sky Blue Water."

There are time when Mrs. Pamplin's voice is heard to greater advantage in oratorio, but in the rendering of this exquisite little song she was perfection and was called upon for a repetition of it. Throughout the evening the assistance given by Sr. Constantino Gaito at the piano was invaluable. His accompanying was the work of an artist.

Sr. Alberto Schiuma played three pieces on the 'cello. Tschaikowsky's well known "Chanson Triste" was followed by a Serenade by Squire a delightfully delicate composition and beautifully rendered, encores Moskowski's "Guitarre."

Amongst the leading violinists in the city is Sta. Alba Rosa and last evening in her two selected pieces she again proved her perfection in technique, expression and ability. In the second quality one is forcibly reminded of the playing of Miss Marie Hall. Her technique is slightly different, which can be accounted for by the teaching of the different schools, but Sta. Rosa has reached a remarkable height in her violin playing and in her interpretation of the works she gives. It was a fine performance.

Not only are congratulations due to Mrs. Pamplin for her concert but for her own individual work therein. "Ah Rendium" from the opera "Mitrane" was perhaps a trifle heavy and technically beyond an average audience. Adieux Forets from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc" was beautifully sung, but one would select for its pleasing quality (after Cadman's work) Grieg's "Du Skog" which Mrs. Pamplin sang in Norwegian.

FOR THE KING.

Ye! who did not hear your brother
Calling to you as he fell:
Ye! who waiting have let others
Take your place 'midst shot and shell:
Ye! the past, almost forgetting;
How your fathers boldly died,
Such a brave example setting;
If you still will turn aside,
Let to-day its message bring!
Men of England, Hear your King!

We, whom he has called to action,
Who of yore our worth have shown;
We must stifle strife and faction,
Can we still withhold our own?
We, if for success now hoping,
All must turn us to the strife;
Cease, with lower motives groping,
Write thus: O'er our finished life,
Although none our praises sing:
"Men of England, for the King."

VICTORIA SAILORS' HOME

ANNUAL MEETING.

At 3 p.m. yesterday the annual general meeting of the Victoria Sailors' Home was held in the Hall of St. Andrew's Church, 382 Peru. The customary formalities having been complied with, the Chairman, Mr. J. Milne, in reading the report and balance-sheet, made some observations regarding the results of the year's work in the Home. It was agreed that the Report and Accounts be approved and passed. Amongst the interesting information contained in the Report were the following facts: During the past twelve months 2139 boarders were received in the Home, an increase of 531 over the previous year. One hundred entertainments had been held, over 5,000 free meals have been given, and over 4,000 free beds. In addition 366 destitute British seamen had been found berths, frequently replacing foreign seamen, so it may be said that the Institution deserves well of the community. Religious services numbering 156 have been held, and thanks are due for assistance at these to the Rev. Dr. J. Fleming, the Rev. Dr. W. P. McLaughlin, the Rev. P. Hill Nicoll, the Rev. J. Hill Williams, the Rev. W. M. Laing, the Rev. B. J. Cameron, Messrs. Tone, Benjamin, Parker and Davis, free.

During the year the sums deposited for safety by occupants of the Home amounted to $8040 cl. Owing to the war, the annual picnic was not held last January 1. A billiard table, presented by Mrs. George Bell, has been greatly appreciated.

It was also stated that no further steps have been taken in regard to enlargement of premises, but the amount in hand for that purpose now stands at $42,709.34 paper.

Lieutenant Harvey, R.N.R., having been recalled for service by the Admiralty, the Committee have appointed Mr. Stanley Parker, Missionary Manager, in his place, and feel sure that the value of the Home will be more than maintained.

The Press is thanked, more especially THE HERALD and Standard, for their interest and assistance, as also the voluntary workers.

The following gentlemen were re-elected to the Committee of Management: The Rev. W. M. Laing, Mr. R. H. Potts, Mr. A. M. Wilson, and the place of Mr. Pilling, who retires, is filled by Mr. C. D. Middlebrook.

A subscriber stated that some few weeks ago certain remarks were publicly made with regard to the question of amalgamation with the Missions to Seamen. He wished to know whether the impression he had received was correct, viz., that the two Societies had not been able to combine owing to the attitude of the Sailors' Home.

In replying to this question the Chairman stated that the whole matter was dealt with very fully in last year's report. In the first instance a scheme for amalgamation was submitted to the two Societies, which the Committee of the Sailors' Home could not accept, as their legal adviser informed them that it was contrary to their Statutes. The Committee therefore drew up a scheme which overcame the legal objection, and this was embodied in last year's report. This scheme was sent to the Missions to Seamen, who replied that owing to the state of their finances they could not even begin to entertain the idea.

The remarks referred to were therefore not only misleading, but at the same time incorrect.

The Chairman proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Fleming for so kindly lending the Hall for the general meeting.

The meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the outgoing Committee.

ROMANCE AND REALITY

PROPOSAL TO SELL THE DIAGONAL LANDS.

The Intendente is said to have proposed to the President that the present is a suitable time for the sale of the land left over from the diagonals begun under Dr. Anchorena's administration and concerning the value of which sites, very high hopes and expectations were at one time entertained.

Undoubtedly there is a great and pressing need for money at the Municipal Palace but it is probable that if such a sale should be attempted at present, the properties would bring sums comparatively very inferior to what might be expected under better circumstances. Some sites are recently said to have gone at figures of less than one fourth their actual value and bearing in mind even the fact that in prosperous times such values have been inflated the loss would be very serious and the results would constitute a melancholy contrast between the princely amounts which these lands were to bring in and the exiguous amounts which they would actually produce.

German Naval Accidents.

The Markgraf, a first class, top hole, split new Hun super-Extra Special Dreadnought of the largest size, 26,575 tons, costing £2,500,000, with ten 12 in. and fourteen 5.9 guns, has been sunk in the Baltic, and not by a mine, but by a British torpedo. No doubt Herr von Tirpitz begins to perceive that submarinery is a round game, and that the British have some good cards in their hand. Yesterday the further loss of a coastguard ship was recorded with 180 men. The Baltic is at present a particularly unhealthy resort for the German Navy, which is now restricted to taking "a pleasant walk, a pleasant talk along the sandy beach" via Stettin, after the manner of the Walrus and the Carpenter. To be knocked about thus in their own special sea is indeed hard. "Wounded in the house of a friend" scarcely describes it.

"Give me the Daggers!"

The mixture of the middle ages and modern war gets thicker and more intimate. Helmets, brigandine jackets and cuirasses, and now, daggers as regular wear for officers. No matter that they call them trench daggers, daggers they are and of many, and some of extraordinary forms. For there are daggers ranging from the long straight double-edged dirk like weapon which might hang on the hip of a steel armed knight of 1416, to wicked curved knives with knuckle bows and some like knuckle dusters, while others have a savage half oriental look like "the Curs Malayan Creese." Evidently many tastes have been catered for, but all are meant for close and fierce fighting at very narrow quarters. These amiable weapons are regularly on sale like the cuirasses, and are said to be worn over the web belt of the officer's equipment. The Highland officer's regimental outfit comprises two daggers, the skene dhu or black knife worn in the right stocking, and the long dirk at the right thigh. If the Regulation dirk had a satisfactory handle grip which is doubtful, it would be an excellent and deadly weapon in body to body encounters. The importance of plenty of hand room is emphasised, especially if the dagger is to be used, as most short daggers are, with the thumb on the pommel for the back stroke. Long daggers are most useful when employed as were the "main gauche" daggers used with the long rapier, i.e., with the point forward swordwise, and the thumb on the quillons.

Among all these weird and expensive weapons, the common ordinary short Lee Metford bayonet (to be purchased at Army stores for 1s.) would when well sharpened, make a splendid dagger, but it has one fault which will definitely exclude it from the lists of the military outfitter. It is quite practical, but it is too cheap.

PRODUCE FROM GENERAL ALVEAR

WESTERN RAILWAY'S INNOVATION.

The Western Railway have decided upon a plan which has created an excellent impression amongst the agriculturalists in the region of General Alvear—Mendoza. Besides offering certain advantages for the transport of their products, the railway proposes to lend gratuitously the galpon No. 7, at Once Station, to be used exclusively for produce from General Alvear, and furthermore, to erect a kiosk in which all kinds of fruit and horticultural products will be exhibited for sale. The idea is considered an excellent and generous one.

THE PERIL OF THE BALKANS

FRIDAY, November 19, 1915.

The feeling of uneasiness regarding the situation in the Balkans is apparent in all the dispatches emanating from London dealing with affairs in that storm centre, and the presence of Lord Kitchener on the scene is at once a confirmation of the idea that the position is serious, and a guarantee that the Allies will maintain the upper hand. There can be no question that the Greeks as a people are cordially disposed towards the Allies. If this were not so M. Venizelos would have been got out of the way long ago. He is the link connecting the Greeks to the cause of the Allies, and though he may have been deprived of the executive power which should rest with him in virtue of his having the support of the majority of electors, he is still a factor not to be overridden by the clique of Germanized officials, headed by King Constantine, who have usurped the political control of the destinies of Greece.

The position in Greece is a very delicate one. That is obvious from the fact that Kitchener is there. The King and the Ministry are inclined to side actively with the Germans. They are restrained from open hostility to the Allies, only by the fact that M. Venizelos holds the people, and a false or premature move on the part of the Government would bring about a revolution. Apparently the army is ready to follow the King, but Constantine runs a grave risk of losing his throne if he brings about hastily a collision between himself, the Government and the army on the one side, and M. Venizelos and the majority of the democracy on the other. If the Allies sustain any serious reverses, and should Greece be in danger of suffering as the result of her neutrality, it would not be difficult for the German party to justify direct antagonism to the Allies, and sweep M. Venizelos out of existence, after having won the people away from him.

It is clear that the Allied governments realise a very grave danger from a sudden strengthening of the hands of King Constantine and his followers. It is apparent that not for some time at least will the forces of the Allies be strong enough to stop the advance of the Teutonic forces. The inequality in the forces must be rapidly overcome, and doubtless that is being done by the pouring in of British and French reinforcements. Possibly in a week or two all danger will have been overcome, but it cannot be gainsaid that at the moment there is a grave danger of a sudden and treacherous attack on the Allies by the Greek forces directed by the King, especially if serious reverses indicate to Constantine that he can strike with impunity. It is this danger which Lord Kitchener is watching closely, and the Allies may be congratulated on the fact that their interests are being served in this crisis by such a man.

Kitchener is reported to have warned King Constantine that any sign of treachery will be promptly met by vigorous action. It is quite possible that this is the truth, but nobody is likely to know exactly what transpires between the two men. What it is important and assuring to know is that the Allies are quite alive to the danger, and that they have the best man on the scene, a man who has had lifelong experience in handling such crises. We do not anticipate any striking successes on the part of the Teutonic allies, though, as we have already stated, it would be unduly optimistic to expect on the other hand, pronounced successes by the Allies. They are not yet in a position to meet the enemy on even terms. The vital necessity is to prevent Greece from turning on the Allies, and striking them in the back while they are engaged in holding up the German advance. This is Kitchener's first task in his great mission to the Near East. We believe he will prove worthy of his trust, and there will be no disaster while he is in unrestricted control and has the proper backing from his Government.

WITHDRAWAL FROM GALLIPOLI IMPOSSIBLE

SATURDAY, November 20, 1915.

Judging from the question asked by Lord Ribblesdale in the House of Lords, there appears to be an inclination in certain circles in England to urge the abandonment of the attempt to force the Dardanelles, and to withdraw the forces from Gallipoli Peninsula. At the risk of being dubbed "arm-chair" critics—a foolish phrase that greets everyone who ventures an opinion on even the most elementary of military problems—we assert that the withdrawal of the Dardanelles expedition is simply impossible. To attempt to get the Allied forces off the Peninsula would be to court a disaster, and even were the safe withdrawal possible, the cause of the Allies would suffer irreparable harm.

From what we know to-day it is clear that the whole campaign has been badly managed. In the first place the expedition was decided upon against the advice of Lord Fisher and other experts. It was designed by politicians, who appeared to be obsessed with the idea that the fleet alone could force a way through to Constantinople. When the bombardment of the forts had accomplished little, and two or three ships had been sunk, the necessity for a combined naval and military attack appeared to be realised, but it could not be brought about owing to lack of coordination between the War Office and the Admiralty. We cannot forget Sir Ian Hamilton's first report in which he revealed with thinly veiled sarcasm his idea of the sad muddle into which the affairs of the expedition had been allowed to drift. Finally order was restored out of chaos, but much mischief had been done which could not be undone.

To-day, after many months of fierce fighting, the Allied forces are firmly established on the Peninsula, but it is evident that they can make no progress. It would be wickedly unfair to suggest that either the Navy or the Army have not done all that human beings could do. From the moment Sir Ian Hamilton took command both branches of the service have performed prodigious feats of valour, and there has been no lack of effective coordination. All arms have done their utmost, and the army has fought with skill and remarkable determination to win success against terrible odds. On no part of the earth has such fighting ever been seen as on that narrow strip upon which the Allied forces flung themselves last April. Greater success than has been achieved has been almost impossible. Had there not been some bungle at Suvla Bay—the details of which we have never been permitted to know—a different story might have been written to-day, but even this is only supposition. The army and navy have both done their best. They have deserved success, but they have not achieved it because the odds were too great.

Though the objective of the expedition has not been gained, nor is likely to be gained directly, it does not follow that the expedition has accomplished nothing. What benefits the cause of the Allies has derived from it we do not propose to go into at this moment. It is the mischievous result that would follow an attempt to withdraw the expedition that we wish to refer to. In the first place the Allies have no ground for manoeuvring, and for effecting an orderly and safe retreat even if they wished to. The moment the attempt is made to re-embark all the men, the munitions of war and the stores, a grave risk will be encountered of the Turks sweeping everything into the sea. It might be possible to get many divisions away, but to cover their retreat a whole army would have to be sacrificed as a rearguard. The people of the United Kingdom, and those of Australia and New Zealand would not look lightly upon the casual sacrifice of twenty or thirty thousand men, in order that the expedition might be abandoned and cease to be a source of worry to British statesmen and the War Office.

On political grounds too, abandonment of what has been won at such great cost cannot be entertained for a moment. The moral effect of the withdrawal of the expedition, with its attendant sanguinary sacrifice of brave men and millions of pounds worth of munitions would be disastrous to the Allies. In the Balkans it would smash the Allies completely, because it would be at once recognised as a sign of weakness, and both Greece and Rumania would turn actively to the Germans. In Egypt and India serious results would be bound to follow. Clearly it is not wise from either a military or a political point of view to abandon the grip on Gallipoli. It may not be necessary for the Allies to do more than hold that grip but it would be madness to release it.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE INEVITABLE

SUNDAY, November 21, 1915.

If we needed a striking example of conflict of opinion and contradiction of opinion in British ministerial circles, and of paltering and trifling with a great problem which involves tremendous issues, we should find it in the Government's attitude over conscription. We have only to take the cablegrams of the past month to find a perfectly puzzling presentation of alternate pessimism and optimism on the part of the responsible ministers and Lord Derby, who is in charge of recruiting. A little more than a week ago the noble lord clearly indicated that he was not satisfied with the response to his efforts. He set a time limit for voluntary enlistment, after which he asserted that a Government promise—the precise nature of which we have never yet been permitted to know—would be carried out. On not one, but several occasions since, Mr. Asquith has stated that everything is satisfactory, and that Lord Derby's scheme is assured of success. In the House of Commons during last week the Prime Minister was certain conscription would not have to be resorted to.

To-day we publish another statement by Lord Derby which has been accepted as a precursor of enforced military service. Whom are we to believe? What are we to think? And is there any reason to believe that if we are puzzled, the people in England are not bewildered also? This is the most mischievous result of the incapacity of the Government to make up its mind, that people do not know where they stand. One day they are told that recruiting is perfectly satisfactory, and all idea of conscription may be scouted. The next they learn that recruiting by the voluntary system is so poor that conscription must be imposed. What is the Government aiming at? Does it want every able-bodied man in the Empire to join the army, or does it want only a proportion of them? What is that proportion? If anybody can tell us when the Government ever clearly answered these questions, or when it ever told the people exactly what it wanted of them, then we shall be glad to have the information.

If the Government wants every able-bodied man in the Empire, how can it hope to get them by appealing for them, seeing that there are thousands of men who will respond to nothing but compulsion, and many will even avoid that? Again how could the Government get all the men within the time limit set? Of course these questions cannot be answered satisfactorily. Lord Derby has doubtless done splendid work, and quite possibly there has been a grand response to his call, but does he or the Government seriously believe that the "shirker" is anywhere nearer the recruiting office than he was six months ago? The whole fact of the matter is that the Government has simply been afraid to grapple with the problem in the proper way. It has simply failed to display that grasp of the situation that a weak coterie of politicians would display. Instead of getting the men necessary, it has pleaded and appealed, and then bullied and "bluffed," and left the men it wanted to get, laughing at it.

We have frequently said that we are not in favour of conscription as a principle. Neither are many millions of Britons. We could well join with others in being proud of the fact that Britain won her war by the freely given services of her patriotic volunteers. There are many people, however, who not only want to be able to say that, but insist that the right to say that, shall stand paramount to the greater need for victory at all costs. Fortunately the best of the leading anti-conscriptionists have departed from such a ridiculous attitude. They recognise that it is not a question of whether we, or they, or the Government, or even the majority of the people hate conscription, but a question of whether it is essential to our victory that we should accept it. The Government should decide this point, and decide it quickly. There should be no hesitancy about the matter; no waste of precious time in futile attempts to drive men to volunteer by nagging them into it. Britain either wants all her men to serve, or she requires a given number. Let the Government decide this issue. It should have been decided long ago, as should also the question of whether the voluntary system would produce the requisite number of soldiers. But let the decision be made at once, and then let the Government take the men it wants, without any further nonsense.

NO TREACHERY FROM GREECE

TUESDAY, November 23, 1915.

It is highly satisfactory to read that the Allies have taken prompt and vigorous steps to circumvent the pro-German official crew in Greece in any plans they might have had for a treacherous attack on the Allies. Once more we can congratulate Britain and our Allies in having at their service such a man as Kitchener—a man who knows what villainy may lurk behind oriental intrigue, and a man who does not argue with a lot of politicians, but acts quickly and acts drastically, without regard to criticism, or censure, or approval. With all reverence we can say fervently, "Thank God Britain's interests in Athens are no longer in the hands of the politicians or the diplomatists, but are in the hands of a man of action." And after saying that we feel we can say with every confidence that there is to be no humiliating defeat, and no disaster, which nobody could say a month ago when the Allies were blundering along to defeat in Greece as they blundered to defeat in Bulgaria and previously in Turkey.

In the case of Greece there is to be no humbugging, no "emphatic protests," as futile as foolish. The Greeks as a people are not antagonistic to the Allies; they are the reverse. There is, however, a gang of politicians, headed by the King, ready to hand the country over at any favourable moment to the German alliance. Six months ago the Allies would have sought to avoid this calamity by argument. To-day, fortunately, they have representing them a man of quite different calibre from that of the gentlemen who thought Turkey and Bulgaria could be won over by soft words. Greece has promised neutrality, but Kitchener appears to have taken the promises for what they were worth—nothing. He has realised that the duty of the real servant of the Nation, and of the cause of the Allies, is, in such circumstances to leave nothing to chance. Hence a powerful Anglo-French fleet is handy, and Greece is cut off from the outer world. In other words the Allies have taken the whip-hand, and if there is to be any treachery, it may be relied upon that only the traitor will suffer.

It will be noted from the interesting cablegrams relating exactly what has transpired, that the Allies declare they have no intention of attempting to compel Greece to depart from an attitude of neutrality. Clearly such an attempt would be foolish, and contrary to the spirit actuating the Allies in the conflict with Germany. British and French troops were landed on Greek territory with the tacit consent of the Greeks. M. Venizelos, then in power, and representing the democracy of the nation permitted the landing. It is true that subsequently a formal protest was made, but can it be doubted that the Allies had in fact full encouragement to land their original small forces? Whatever may be the facts relative to this technical "violation" of Greek territory, the solid fact remains that the only way to help the Serbians lay through Greece, and once Greece had permitted the right-of-way, the powers that allowed her to fall on their troops would be deserving of any disaster that might overtake their arms.

The Allies "find themselves compelled to take into account certain hints they have received, and to contemplate the possibility of Greece taking measures not in conformity with the promises she has made." This indicates nothing but the danger of a treacherous attack at the right moment on the small forces already landed, which certainly would be massacred to a man if that attack were delivered. The Allies simply could not afford to run such a risk, and it is well that they have disarmed the Government that contemplated making such an attack in response to the machinations of the arch enemy. Any delay, or paltering would have been fatal. Clearly Kitchener has seen that, with an eye quickened by experience to detect the first signs of treachery. Greece may still attack the Allies, but she will not do so with any success, especially if she cannot do it at once, and the prompt action taken by Kitchener—and his brain is undoubtedly directing the whole policy towards Greece—makes it possible for the Allies to crush immediately the nation that attempts to act falsely to her promises.

WEIRD PROPOSALS FOR PEACE

WEDNESDAY, November 24, 1915.

We have previously dealt with various suggestions for peace, suggestions which appear mainly to have emanated from German sources. To-day we are confronted with a proposition, "mothered" by a number of ladies resident or assembled at the Hague, which is to say the least of it, weird. Presumably, however, we are expected to give serious consideration to the idea, and crediting the ladies with the very best and noblest intentions in the world, we do so. The organization, from which we have received a mass of literature, describes itself as "the International Movement of Every Woman for Peace." Its plan briefly is that all the neutral nations should at once enter into a union, establish a "Tribunal Parliament for Peace," to settle war difficulties only, and to become permanent and international as soon as the belligerents "will" join. This tribunal is to settle matters, with the help of the belligerents if possible, but without them, if may be.

The "Tribunal Parliament" is to decree war a crime, forbidden by law, and as a logical consequence, so runs the circular, war may cease at once, the belligerents being protected from one another by the peace-organizing united neutral nations, "their forces having naturally, without the need of any alterations whatever," become "United World's Peace Protective Forces." These forces are to be used to compel peace, when other methods have failed. The ideas are not only weird, but absurd, but for the moment we will disregard the absurdity, and discuss the matter, so far as we can, seriously.

The Dutch ladies do not appear to have recognised that already much of the legal machinery for the prevention of wars, of invasions and of oppression of weak nations by the strong, is in existence, as the result of much discussion at the Hague Peace Palace. The whole trouble, however, is that there is no force behind it. All the present belligerents, and most of the neutrals took part in the discussions and signed the conventions. What nation among the neutrals has kept the belligerents up to the obligations into which they then entered? What neutral has even yet proposed to other neutrals that collectively they (the neutrals) should make the belligerents honour their signed bonds? And if such a proposal has been made, how do the neutrals intend to impose their will on say Germany, which agreed legally to respect Belgium's weakness, and then ruined her? How do they propose to punish Germany for having used asphyxiating gases when she solemnly obligated herself not to do so?

"But," the ladies may say, "these things are all past. Though the neutrals have failed to act, that is no reason why they should not act from now on, under our ideas." Well, the most powerful neutrals in the world to-day are the several American nations headed by the United States. Let us suppose they cooperate, and gain the assistance of Holland, and Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and other similar nations. What are they going to do? Are they going to tell the belligerents that the war must cease? Let us suppose Britain says, "Mind your own business. We are out to thrash Germany, and we are going to do it." What will the neutrals do? Will they land armies in the United Kingdom and thrash Britain? Assuming they can do that, will they then go on and apply their "United World's Protective Forces," to reducing France to compliance with their will? After that will they undertake to hammer the life out of recalcitrant Germany with their forces which we are told would need no alterations whatever? The contract looks to us rather a big one. The united forces of the Allies, augmented, organized and equipped to a degree of terrible strength of which the neutrals have no conception, have not yet succeeded in smashing Germany, but the Dutch ladies apparently believe that the neutrals can put a force—their present combined strengths—into the field and knock sense into the head of the German nation.

We regret to say it, but we are certain the "International Movement of Every Woman For Peace," is, despite its obvious good and noble intentions, dealing with a problem it cannot solve by the means it proposes. Maybe after the war, assuming general disarmament can be achieved, it is possible the world's peace will be kept by some such means as the ladies propose, but at present it looks most probable that the war will be fought out to the bitter end, and the neutrals will simply stand by as horrified but helpless spectators.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CRITIC

THURSDAY, November 25, 1915.

The cablegrams regularly received dealing with the great war seem to reflect the alternating pessimism and optimism which prevail regarding the progress on one side or the other. In the United Kingdom it is notorious that people change regularly from one extreme to the other, particularly when the class of news from the battle fronts changes quickly. For instance, when the Allies made their forward move, and achieved substantial success early last month, a wave of enthusiastic optimism swept over the country, and had it been possible to take a vote on such a question it would have been found that the mass of the people were convinced that the end of the war was only a little way off, and a complete and crushing victory was a certainty before the end of the year. When the Allies, having done their best at the moment, could do no more, and the serious news came through regarding the Balkan situation, the optimism was ousted by pessimism.

Such alternations of opinion, or changeableness of mood, are perfectly natural. It would obviously be foolish to expect a mass of people vitally interested, to be unaffected by good and bad news, or not to form opinions under the impulses provided by that news. Nevertheless it is still permissible for those who feel it their duty to mould public opinion to endeavour to promote a steadfastness of attitude, which, from a national point of view, is much more to be desired than that of a ready response to every shift and turn in the tide of affairs. At anyrate if that cannot be done, there is no reason why those who feel themselves capable of calmly reviewing the whole situation, or calculating and balancing it mentally, should not maintain a sort of unbiased attitude toward everything that happens, in order that they may the better see the solution of the problem. The man who is liable to "Maffick" over a victory, without stopping to consider its relative importance to the general campaign, or to have a brain-storm over a set-back, is not exactly the expert to decide who will win the war, and when.

A lot of the critics of those who are conventionally labelled as pessimists never seem to realise the distinction between constructive and destructive criticism. They hold the opinion, evidently, that the only way to win the war is to shout that all is well and could not be better, and they want to shout at the men, or the newspapers, who seriously survey the war in all its aspects, and point out where improvement in methods can be made, and how victory can be achieved quicker. A month ago any newspaper which suggested that affairs in the Balkans were not going well, and which recommended that the conduct of those affairs should be taken out of the hands of the British Foreign Office, and placed in those of Lord Kitchener would doubtless have been described as a pessimist, and a critic—the latter term being applied as a reproach. A critic, such a newspaper certainly would have been, but why a pessimist?

A great number of the suggestions of the much-abused critics have been followed, and good results have been obtained. We never hear, however, of any credit being voted to those who made the suggestions, and the idea of the "critic" of the critic appears to be that the things that happened, and which represented striking departures from the things that previously were said to be quite good enough, all happened as the natural working out of a plan that was conceived at the outset and which was always perfect. The serious newspaper and other serious critics and students of the war can well afford to ignore the fatuous individuals who believe that Britain entered the war in a perfect state of capability to carry it through; that her military ideas; her commercial ideas and her governmental ideas were final, and could not be improved upon by suggestion, or criticism. This absurd proposition is what the critics and students of the war are expected to accept. They do not accept it. They form their opinions and they express them with just as sincere motives as those which animate the people who shout that everything is well and could not be improved upon.

Can it be seriously argued that the man who is content with everything as it is, is a patriot, and the man who is content with nothing but the best, even though getting that best involve drastic changes, is not? The man who says he is satisfied is generally the man who shouts with joy one day, and shrouds himself in gloom the next, for the simple reason that he has not enough understanding of the problems of the war to offer a suggestion, and consequently is unable to weigh good and bad news calmly. The man who knows is not so easily disturbed from a calm contemplation of the final issue. He first of all has appreciated to the full the task before the Allies. He sees their weakness and their strength, as also those of the enemy. He aims to minimise the weaknesses and increase the strength. In fact he has a clear conception of all that lies ahead. He does not allow good or bad news to dictate his attitude and his actions. He is not a pessimist, even if he cannot be called an optimist. He not only knows that the Allies can win, but why they should win. In the mind of such a man there is absolutely no doubt about the result of this war. He sees victory assured to the Allies if they throw all their energy, all their organization and all their best, and nothing but the best, into the struggle.

Public Opinion as expressed in the Argentine Press.

FACTORS OF URBAN MORTALITY

(La Prensa.—November 18).

The influence of urban dwellings on the health returns is a subject that according to La Prensa has been insufficiently studied in this Republic. Owing to this official indifference we are still ignorant of the relation between the housing question and the death rate, and just because this information is lacking the sanitary authorities are unable to reply when they are asked to connect cause and effect, that is to say the relation between the house and disease, unless of course they use data gathered by other countries as a base for their reply. These foreign returns have however but a relative interest for us, seeing that they are affected by various local conditions and circumstances that cannot be expressed in statistics. The phenomena observed and the quotients obtained in Paris, Berlin, Frankfurt, Vienna and Petrograd, for instance, do not stand as constants all over the earth, and this is so well known that if the mortality returns of any special locality works out at so much per quarter, per square, per building, per floor, per room, one cannot blindly attribute the figures thus obtained directly and solely to the housing question. Ethical, industrial, economic, social and individual reasons also come into play.

Hence it is clear that the study of such an important and complex problem must know how to embrace all the factors that have play therein. In a city so densely populated as is Buenos Aires it is not enough to have the opinion, more or less authorised, of a public functionary, and to consider this as sufficient evidence regarding the positive or negative effects of any factor of mortality. The matter is sufficiently important to be worthy of deeper study, seeing that in many cities such study has led to reforms that have brought down the mortality returns by 50 per cent. In explanation of this statement it is sufficient to say that it is clearly proved that overpopulation and unhealthy dwellings are directly proportionate to the increase in the mortality returns, both individually and taken en masse, infantile ailments and tubercular complaints standing out with special distinctness, the curve of mortality falling with surprising rapidity when conditions of living are improved. La Prensa concludes by recommending these things to the study of our chief municipal authorities, and observes that their responsibility is not confined solely to their immediate and obvious duties, but also embraces the common defence of society at large.

THE CORDOBA WINE TRADE

(La Nación.—November 18).

A special committee appointed by the Centro Nacional Vitivinícola has visited the north of Cordoba Province enquiring into its suitability as a wine growing region, and finds, says La Nación, that the region is admirably adapted for the intensive cultivation of the vine. With ample irrigation and intelligent care of the vineyards it might even prove a rival to Mendoza, though that, says La Nación, is not desirable, its true func-

AGRICULTURAL CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES

(La Prensa.—November 19).

In an interesting memorandum, Sr. Emilio Lahitte, Director of the Department of Rural Economy and Statistics, lays before the Minister of Agriculture the result of his recent efforts towards the federation of various co-operative societies established in Rosario region. According to La Prensa a meeting was held at which representatives of fourteen societies belonging to the Province of Santa Fé and Cordoba were present, and the idea of Federation took practical shape on this occasion, the various societies agreeing to ask for prices of bags on the base of a purchase of a million more or less, and accepting the most suitable offer, which was immediately put into contract form.

As Sr. Lahitte remarks, a recital of the many endeavours that have been made to this end would be long and uninteresting. As a rule the results have been negative, as was that of the Government when it sought to buy bags and re-sell them at cost price to the agriculturalists; a procedure that failed utterly when put into practice. Direct contracts with makers of gunny bags in Great Britain were also tried, and found wanting. The Minister of Agriculture has intervened, calling together the various manufacturers, and this may have been of some use. At the same time, Sr. Lahitte hits the nail on the head by observing that until the necessary textile for bag-making is produced in the country, this difficulty is bound to recur. Hence the importance of the step taken by the co-operators at Rosario, and the probability that it will have imitators, seeing that save for exceptional circumstances such as the total failure of the jute crop in India, or the absolute impossibility of shipment, this linking-up of the buyers is bound to make business on a large scale easier. A further step forward has been taken in the shape of an agreement between the different societies to communicate to each other the prices quoted to them for staple commodities in order that they may buy collectively wherever they find the best terms given.

tion being to serve as an auxiliary to that Province. Mendoza as a matter of fact suffers from overproduction, due largely to the introduction of one type of grape only, the Malbeck, whence only ordinary wine can be produced, a wine that is unable to compete with foreign wines either here or abroad. If Cordoba merely follows on similar lines, neither the province nor the Republic will gain thereby.

Cordoba has at present excellent table grapes. Is it possible, asks La Nación, to cultivate there the finer varieties, and use them subsequently as a supplement to the Mendoza grapes. For the making of special reserve vintages of different types the great European wine growers blend their must. In Mendoza such a thing is not feasible, since there is not sufficient fruit to correct the defects of the Malbeck grape. Therefore proceed, says La Nación, to plant other growths in adequate soil. But ere doing so the trade must be put on a sound financial basis, the matter must be gone into in a businesslike manner. In short it must be business, not a mere speculation.

THE STORAGE OF HIDES AND CEREALS

(La Nación.—November 19).

As in previous years the Mercado Central the Frutos has been closed to hides and cereals in favour of the wool trade, that merchandise alone being now received in the deposits. The adopting of this measure is due, says La Nación, to the belief that since shearing takes place only at certain seasons of the year throughout the whole country, wool should have the preference, since hides are coming in and going out all the year round. Moreover the wool buyers, make a practice of coming hither at fixed periods, going away when the season is over. It is thus calculated that the wool market lasts more or less four months, whilst the dealers in hides are operating all the year round.

Nor do the reasons for granting special preference to wool end there. The fact that there are no cereals being moved enables the railways to bring all the wool in to the warehouses in under a month if they so desired, but inasmuch as no reasonable storage capacity could be provided to deal with such a quantity unless it were ten times larger than the present warehouses, continual work for four months at the rate of 12 to 14 millions kilos stored per diem and a million kilos wool delivered spreads the handling of the clip over four months. Hold space too is none too ample, hence shipments are bound to be slower than usual, another cause which is liable to keep wool longer in the warehouse, to say nothing of the fact that wool represents twice as much money to-day as it does in normal times. Finally the directorate of the Mercado points out that in August last it sent out a circular advising consignees and shippers to hasten their remittances of hides, and up to the present it has received these without any limit. Now, fearing a possible congestion it has found it necessary to advise the railways not to take any more cargoes of hides for the Mercado.

THE ECONOMIC REACTION

(La Prensa.—November 20).

Certain isolated commercial acts, says La Prensa, have raised a hope in some quarters that matters are about to improve all round, said hopes being based on the purchase of camp properties for comparatively large amounts. This is not the opinion of La Prensa; the ice is not yet broken, and the unreasonable fear shown by Argentine capital at the outset of the war still persists. Indeed to such an extent is this noticeable that the very natural trend of capital towards rentable values has been diverted, even the public funds being unable to draw it from its unnatural seclusion in the coffers of the banks. Who can deny that the country is economically infirm, when such phenomena are concurrent with an intense production, a production that moreover is sold at high prices?

At the same time this infirmity is not incurable, and by initiating a system of uplifting the value of the cultivable camps through a vigorous policy of profitable exploitation, the state of the patient might be radically improved. A sound agrarian policy, such as La Prensa has preached for this long time past, is what is needed, and inasmuch as all the great European capitalist enterprises agree in proclaiming their absolute faith in the economic future of the country all that is wanted is for the Argentine

PRACTICAL VERSUS THEORETICAL ENGINEERING

(La Prensa.—November 22).

It is axiomatic, says La Prensa, that Argentine economics consist in the solution of two great problems. First it must conquer the desert; secondly the desert land, once rendered habitable, must be fructified by organised labour. This La Prensa sums up in other words as meaning public works and agrarian credit. Argentina is endowed with tropical and sub-tropical zones; with rivers and streams and a system of hydrographic resources capable of being turned to the service of irrigation; her woods and her mineral resources are as yet almost untouched; in short the country is blessed with a fertile soil and hidden wealth in the sub-soil that may be even still more valuable. But technical application is necessary if this wealth is to be made use of. Not, remarks La Prensa, a mere simulation of technics, but actual applied science. A concrete case of what is meant may be found in the Rivadavia oil fields. In any other country, Rivadavia oil would have flooded the country and have been the universal driving force. Here, on the contrary it is still being "studied."

Technics in this country La Prensa declares to be on a par with philosophy or metaphysics or any other university theme of debate, the chief difference being that whereas discourses on the two former subjects are cheap, the technical disputes of the country's specialists are remarkably dear. Which explains why an irrigation job, to take an instance, cost 25 per cent of the total outlay for preliminary "studies." La Prensa roundly accuses the actual system under which public works are carried out. There are, it states two great groups of engineers, the men who live in tents and the men who stop in their offices in Buenos Aires. The former are living with the work, by the river bed or in the desert; they take their levels, make their observations, and submit the results to the bureaucrats in Buenos Aires. Opinions as between the two groups are frequently in discord. The Minister of Public Works, not being a practical man, either does nothing when confronted with two distinct opinions, or calls for a new commission of enquiry. La Prensa urges the need for closer contact on the part of the Minister with the practical man and less "studies," adding that a small lay-by on a little stream is productive of more "studies" than the Suez Canal! What this country needs is real engineers, and not tricksters, continues La Prensa. To understand a river something more than pure mathematics is necessary, one must also go to the waterside and study it. Then, combining mathematics with daily observation, one may be able to master all the problems planted by Pythagoras, Euclid and Newton and yet be unable to distinguish cement from mortar. The first accomplishment is learnt in the Faculty; for the second one must make experiments and be actually on the work.

capitalists to wake from their fears, give up waiting for things to go still worse than they are to-day, and take advantage of the present.

Congress is about to sit for extraordinary sessions, and the country demands that it devote some time to these problems. It is as clear as daylight that the economic order is mending. Everything capable of production is making money, the while the national, provincial, and municipal treasuries are unable to pay their debts and have reduced their employees to a hunger ration. Even the estimates based on these economies cannot be met, and the only way to meet them is to foment production. Here is room for state initiative, but alas, laments La Prensa, state initiative is conspicuous by its absence.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT IN BUENOS AIRES PROVINCE

(La Nación.—November 20).

On the last Sunday of the month the various communes of the Province of Buenos Aires are due to elect their municipal authorities, and, says La Nación none of the neighbours are in the least interested in the business; which means that the whole affair will be a farce. The same men will continue in office, to the great content of the central governments, since it is well known that the municipalities are the mainstay of the official electoral machine. It must however be admitted that the fault lies as much with the people as it does with the government. Their indifference is the cause of most of the existing bad government. At times, weary of inefficient or malevolent rulers, the inhabitants rise, hold meetings of protest, call on the traders to close down and the labourers to strike, and then ask for the intervention of the government. When however the time has come for the people to exercise their rights and vote for good authorities, they do nothing, alleging that fraud and violence prevail, though, as La Nación pertinently observes, the system of abstention from the polls will do nothing to cure the ills complained of.

This abandonment of their rights by the citizens explains why at the present time there are thirty municipal districts without direct representation, a situation that is prolonged because it suits the government to manage affairs in those districts by its direct agents. There was some outcry against this state of affairs, and the government took steps to comply with the law. The protest died down, and the only result to date is that elections will be held in some eight divisions where the official party are certain of their triumph, matters remaining as they are in all those regions where the majority is uncertain. Nor are things likely to be otherwise, concludes La Nación, until the electors arouse themselves from their trance and proceed to the exercise of their rights.

COMMERCIAL FRAUD AND ITS CURE

(La Prensa.—November 23).

Again and again the honest traders of the Republic have sought to guarantee their trade by means of diverse measures destined to check wilful fraud, and although the reform of the bankruptcy law has been once more postponed, the fraud that is promoted by the lack of all regulations dealing with the transfer of business houses, is provided for in a new project associated with the Budget Committee. This initiative consists, according to La Prensa, in establishing a tax of 3 per mil on all such transfers, whilst at the same time the act of transference must be duly inscribed in a registry kept ad hoc. Failure to comply with the new regulation renders the original proprietor liable to all his anterior obligations.

La Prensa draws attention to the fact that as it stands at present the new measure will help rather than hinder fraud, in precisely the same manner as brought about by the law relating to unpaid cheques. In the latter case the manner in which the law was drafted made it incumbent on the rightful holder to show that the cheque had been actually drawn with fraudulent intent, an impossible thing to prove. The ordinance relative to the transfer of businesses is open to the same objection; in fact it will merely put fraud on a legal footing. As business is at present conducted the buyer receives credit on the strength of his house of business, the latter being the only guarantee for the creditors. That cannot be secretly hidden away, but under the suggested ordinance a trader may owe money all round and by the simple process of registering the sale of his business and paying the stipulated tax defraud his just creditors even more easily than before.

THE CORDOBA ELECTIONS

(La Nación.—November 23).

Yesterday's figures, says La Nación, assure the triumph of the Radical party in the Province of Cordoba, the Government of which will in future be in their charge. This is the final of one of the most intense civic struggles that has been seen in the Republic to date. On previous occasions La Nación has drawn attention to the especial significance that Cordoba implies in all presidential politics, and in the present case there has been witnessed the dispute for a province wherein the two rival parties have fought a l'outrance, either side counting on influential support and ample resources. Both parties moreover realised the importance of the result, and have used all their strength to ensure success, their leaders even feeling that it was incumbent upon them to assume the personal direction of the campaign.

La Nación further observes that it is highly satisfactory to see that the passionate enthusiasm with which both Radicals and Democrats have joined in the struggle has nevertheless been compatible with perfect order. There has been a mutual respect of each others opinions, and a freedom from outrage that reflects very favourably on the development of the civic ideal in this Republic; a result largely due to the attitude observed by both parties, following the example set by their respective chiefs.

Scarce a week ago La Nación declared that whatever the result might be, it must be realised that it was an expression of the popular will, and that the candidates who triumphed might justly be proud of their victory. The Radicals enter the Government with an indisputable majority, and this very fact charges them with a heavy responsibility. In the meanwhile, pending a more detailed criticism of the results of the Cordoba election, La Nación congratulates everybody concerned on the admirable manner in which it was carried through, without one single unpleasant note to mar the brilliance of the spectacle whereat the whole country assisted with undiminished interest from start to finish.

THE TUCUMAN TOBACCO TAX

(La Prensa.—November 24).

The law recently sanctioned in Tucuman placing a tax on all manufactured tobacco, cigars and cigarettes consumed in the Province has given rise to general protest, says La Prensa, not only on account of the tax itself, but by reason of the extra expense incurred in affixing the stamps on the dutiable goods, that being the manner in which the tax must be paid. The tax has the fundamental defect of being foreign to the constitutional precepts laid down by the Supreme Court of Justice in diverse cases. The new impost as established taxes manufactured tobacco, cigars, etc., "which are consumed in the territory of the Province." As will be seen no distinction is made between the articles manufactured in the Province, and the goods imported into the province, and it is this stretching of the law to include the imported cigarettes etc., which has given rise to the charge of unconstitutionalism under Article II of the National Constitution, which prohibits the imposition of transit dues on merchandise passing from one province to another. The result of an appeal against a similar tax, also levied in Tucuman, on wine consigned to, or sold in, that Province, dissipates all doubt as to the fate of the new law. In the case cited several commercial houses resisted payment of the tax and the result of the controversy was that the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional.

The present case, says La Prensa is identical, and it is to be hoped that the Province will see the necessity of revising the existing law. No object can be served by entering into endless litigation over a question the solution of which has already been decided beforehand.

THE TRANSPORT OF THE HARVEST

(La Nación.—November 24).

The fixing of freights for the shipping of the harvest, says La Nación, has already begun. Prices as was to be foreseen are fairly high, freights from the rivers to British ports being quoted at 85 shillings per ton, and from Buenos Aires at 83½. Various causes exist which point to an upward tendency, and amongst these causes La Nación cites as the most important, the shortage of tonnage. This, is in some measure due to shippers in view of the indecisive attitude of Greece declining to contract freights with ships flying that flag, the result being that the number of Greek boats entering the port has been considerably reduced. The obstruction of the Panama Canal is another factor influencing an increase of freights. Vessels bound from Chili to New York have to pass round by the Straits of Magellan entailing a delay of thirty days, and thus intensifying the scarcity of tonnage.

The decree of the British Government requiring the sanction of the Admiralty to the itinerary of all vessels flying the British flag, will not in the opinion of La Nación produce a harmful effect on freights, the measure being simply a precaution against any possible diminution of tonnage necessary in the interchange of merchandise with the United Kingdom, and at the same time a means of control over the class and destiny of the cargoes. Notwithstanding the rumour that the number of ships entering the port will be insufficient to lift the harvest of cereals and wool. La Nación is of opinion that the present state of affairs is merely transitory, and that although the tonnage may not be superabundant and freights may still continue to be high, there is every reason to believe that within a comparatively short period the whole of the harvest can be shipped. Commenting on this it points out as a significant fact that yesterday was one of the days on which most tonnage had entered the port.

RIVER PLATE AEROPLANES

MR. HERBERT GIBSON'S CONGRATULATIONS.

The Committee of the British Society were most gratified to receive today the following letter from Mr. Herbert Gibson, at present in England:—

4 K Montagu Mansions,
Barker Street,
London, W.
October 23, 1915.

Dear Pruden,

Please accept my heartiest congratulations on the very practical support the British Society is giving to the defence of the Empire. "Jack has gone aloft." Don't stop at two aeroplanes. Make it a fleet.

Yours sincerely,

HERBERT GIBSON.

The suggestions of Mr. Gibson are most inspiring, and nothing would give the Committee of the British Society greater pleasure than being instrumental in obtaining a fleet of aeroplanes to assist in the defence of the Empire, but they are face to face with the fact of the tardiness with which the amount for the second aeroplane is being subscribed, and it is hoped that this very inspiring letter from Mr. Gibson will encourage those people who have not already subscribed, to do so at once, sending their donations to the Hon. Treasurer of the British Society, Mr. W. Watson, Calle Cangallo 536.

DR. NAON'S RETURN

Dr. Romulo S. Naon, Argentine Ambassador to the U.S. is about to return to the Republic for a brief rest from his diplomatic labours. He will, it is stated, disembark at Rio on November 30 and will continue his journey to Montevideo overland with a view to making himself acquainted with the region traversed by the railway.

THE LIVINGSTON MURDER

TWO DEATH SENTENCES.

Sentence of death is a rare occurrence in this Republic, but two of the criminals associated with the murder of Mr. F. C. Livingston in July of last year, yesterday afternoon were condemned to the extreme penalty of the law by the judgment of Doctor Saru. Other participants in the crime received varying terms of imprisonment.

The judge's summing up states that it is proved the murdered man's wife brought to a head the design to destroy her husband, that others implicated were Catalina Cavello, an Argentine 21 years of age, Salvador Viterale, 19, Rafael Prostamo 27, both Italian fishermen, Francisco Salvatto, and Juan Lauro.

The last mentioned two, both Italians, of 27 and 26 years of age respectively have been sentenced to death. The execution will take place on December 3. Mrs. Livingston, the servant Cavello, and the man Viterale are sentenced to "indeterminate" imprisonment with solitary confinement of 20 days a year on the anniversary of the crime. Prostamo receives 15 years in the "presidio."

The details of the crime, thus recalled to memory after 17 months by these sentences show that on July 19, at night, the criminals, with the connivance of the wife and servant, who gave them the key of the house, awaited the arrival of Mr. Livingston at home. At 12.30 p.m. he entered his house and was at once attacked by the men and stabbed to death. Considerable sensation was created at the time by this dastardly deed.

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN

Wednesday, Nov. 24

Owing to few vessels being in port, and also to the uncomfortable heat, there was not such a large attendance at last night's concert at the Mission to Seamen.

The programme was however thoroughly enjoyed. Miss Randle was the lady vocalist, and she sang charmingly. Her songs were "Till Death" and as an encore, "In the Sunshine of your Smiles," which were followed in the second half by "Star of my Soul" and "The Song that Reached My Heart."

Mr. Ellis Phillips was enthusiastically received for his delightful humorous sketches at the piano. "When Knights were Cold," "The Charge of the Light Brigade," being amongst his best and most humorous pieces. Mr. Phillips is always entertaining at the piano, and last night was no exception.

The Rev. Morrey Jones was encored for some clever and attractive banjo playing, and with Mr. Brady and one other item filled up a very good and enjoyable programme. Mr. Parry gave a piano solo at the commencement of the evening.

U.S. NAVAL EFFICIENCY

SUCCESS OF CAPT. A. P. NIBLACK'S VESSEL.

The efficiency records of the ships of the United States Navy for the year ending July 1, 1915, have been received at the Navy Department in Washington, and it will be interesting news to the many friends in Buenos Aires of Captain Albert Parker Niblack, formerly the Naval Attaché at the American Embassy to learn that the United States battleship "Michigan" under his command, received the highest rating of all ships in its class for "battle efficiency." By an interesting coincidence it happens that in the sports contest among the sailors of the Atlantic Fleet, Sam Taylor of the "Michigan" won the heavy weight championship in wrestling, while Lewis of the same ship won the light weight championship. So it would seem that the "Michigan" has fully earned her right to rank as a battleship.

Chacabuco 431—Rincon 689WHEAT SUPPLIES*To Great Britain*THE RACE FOR SUPREMACY

In some quarters it is believed that one reason for England's alliance with Russia is that Russia is the greatest wheat producer in the world.

But the United States hitherto has been England's principal source of supplies, and one-third of her entire supplies have been drawn from the States. During the war, however, Canada has gradually been usurping America's place as a supplier of wheat to the United Kingdom, sending over 80 per cent. of her entire exportation. India follows next, Argentina fourth and Australia fifth.

It is interesting to compare the figures received at the Canadian Commission's Department in Buenos Aires between Canada and Argentina, who now more than ever are racing for the conquest of the second place in the world's wheat export.

Argentina's total wheat export from 1909 to 1914 was $496,546,000 in gold, of which about 33 per cent. went to the United Kingdom.

Canada's figure for the same corresponding years shows a total export of 455,929,000 gold, of which over 50 per cent. found its way to the British Isles.

With the outbreak of the war, Argentina's exportation to England has considerably increased, while Canada, who still maintained her high standard of furnishing the mother country with its produce, is making great efforts in cultivating new land, thus gaining the advantage.

One of the causes advanced for the increased price of wheat in England this year is the failure of the last Australian crop.

If Russia, with sums ranging in the vicinity of 150 million dollars each year for wheat exportation, had had a free passage through the Dardanelles or a warm water port, this deficiency would have been made up. It is also very likely that another cause was the activity of the German submarines in the earlier stages of the war, which danger fortunately has now been reduced to a minimum.

For this reason England is depending chiefly upon Canada, and also largely upon Argentina, Australia and India.

Canada last winter and in early spring planted an extra 1,588,000 acres of land in wheat to take care of the mother country's needs. It makes her consequently the largest wheat shipping country in the world, and has brought to her activities records that are unprecedented.

It remains to be seen how Argentina is going to develop this particular industry with England.

The romance of Canada as a wheat country is one of fascination. And still further romance lies in the transportation problem of wheat from the Peace River, say, over the 5000 miles of blossoming prairie to its destination, which is usually Liverpool.

When Canada woke up and found she had the biggest falls in the world at Niagara, she had proved nothing except her luck. But when to-day she can confidently assert that in Fort William and Port Arthur she holds the greatest grain port, with an elevator capacity of 43,250,000 bushels, she has proved her worth. For she made that port herself out of raw backwoods and concrete.

During the 1913 season of navigation, 222,544,496 bushels of grain passed through the twin ports. During the same period Duluth-Superior handled little more than half that quantity, and Chicago less than a quarter.

To the uninitiated this carries nothing but a sense of national pride in mere figures. There can be no conception of the handling and forwarding difficulties encountered in taking grain from the Alberta farmer and giving it to the British baker without raising howls from the producer, the

LET FLYEngland's Derby "Third"*COMING TO ARGENTINA

THE HERALD was informed last evening that Let Fly, the famous English race-horse by White Eagle—Gendolotte, has been acquired by Mr. Edmund Fraser, the well known figure of the Argentine turf. Let Fly is now some few days out from England, and a telegram received yesterday states that on passing Lisbon the horse was fit and well. He is on the Deseado. One of the very best of English three-year-olds, this famous son of White Eagle is on arrival in the Argentine to be dedicated to classic races, and judging by his wonderful success in England, he should do well. Failing a brilliant running career he will go to the stud.

Mr. Fraser is to be congratulated upon his purchase.

As a two-year-old, Let Fly had a fine record. He won the New Stakes, £1834 10s. from Sunfire, Rosebud and Redfern. In the Exeter Stakes, £1181, he ran second, a short head to Redfern in the Molecount Stakes, again second to Redfern in the Champagne Stakes, losing by half a neck, but in the Dewhurst Plate £1487, he beat Redfern by half a head.

His performances as a three-year-old were even more brilliant, and with the exception of Pommern, the winner of this year's Derby (to whom Let Fly ran third in this race) he has beaten the crack racehorses in England of his age.

His arrival and appearance at Palermo will be awaited with the greatest interest. His addition to the blood stock in the Argentine will be a immense value, but as a classic runner his progress will be watched with the keenest attention. White Eagle 1905 is by Gallindale—Merry Gal (Isonomy, Sterling and Galopin blood). He is at the famous Tully Stud in Kildare, Ireland. In the years 1904, 1905, and 1907 Gallindale held the lead amongst winning stallions of the English turf.

White Eagle won the Woodcote Stakes, Epsom, as a two-year-old.

shipper, the consignee, the railways and the general public. But just go to Fort William in the busy full season, and see for yourself; buttonhole some man who knows the game, and if he is good natured enough to give you half an hour of his time you'll be just beginning to see.

Canada has become the greatest wheat shipping country in the world, but close to her heels are the United States and the Argentine, and it is interesting to watch the race between these three great wheat exporting countries.

THE INTERNED HOLGER

CARGO TO BE LANDED AND SOLD.

For months the s.s. Holger (late of Germany) has been helping to decorate the middle distance of the docks, and giving an air of business activity to the hinder end of No. 4, what time she waits till the seas shall once more be made free by the eternal chawing up of the British. Meanwhile a handsome bill in dock dues has been accumulating to her account, while the crew for sauerkraut, wurst and puchero alone must be eating her head off.

The North German Lloyd asked to be excused from payment of port dues, no doubt on the ground that they could not help the ship being here, and in fact, would prefer her to be elsewhere, but the plea was of no avail.

However, the cargo, which was destined for Antofagasta and Valparaiso, will be permitted to enter to be disposed of, provided papers are in order and that all the Customs requirements are complied with.

THE BERLIN NO MORE.

The Mihanovich steamer Berlin has discarded that appellation of evil association and sails to Montevideo today under the name of "Lisboa."

Several respectable tugs which have hitherto likewise borne German names have been so overcome by indignation that they have gone to be scraped and painted and re-baptised. The late "Bismarck" for example now bears the blameless name of "Don Bartolo."

"THE PACIFIST IS A COWARD"

Colonel Roosevelt's Strong Criticism

THE DUTY OF THE UNITED STATES

Censure of Woodrow Wilson's Policy

New York, Dec. 1.

The American Committees of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Funds having requested ex-President Roosevelt to speak at a public meeting, or at least to write supporting their views, Mr. Roosevelt wrote expressing his sympathy with the objects of the Committees and his deep indignation at the fate meted out to the Armenians.

Mr. Roosevelt however emphatically pointed out that sympathy and indignation were useless if they were limited to words instead of acts. He continued:—

"If the United States, through their Government, had not shirked their duty in Mexico during the last five years, and their duties in connection with the war that has been going on for the last sixteen months, we should now be in a position to take effective action on behalf of Armenia.

"The American professional pacifist, whether man or woman—the peace-at-any-price type who join meetings denouncing war, or protest in empty words in the name of the Armenians or any other tortured and ruined people, carry precisely as much weight as an equal number of Chinese pacifists would carry, if, at a similar meeting, they went through similar antics at Peking.

"They do ill instead of good, bringing great discredit upon the nation. They belong to the class of American pacifists who are seeking to make the United States follow in the footsteps of China. They put such pacifism, such righteousness and present safety above the duty of the present and the safety of the future.

"I am sure that all worthy Americans are deeply indignant at the atrocities and ruin which follow war; but they comprehend that unless America prepares to defend herself she cannot perform her duty. In other words the pacifist is a coward and a worthless poltroon.

"Wrong-doing can only be stopped by men who are both brave and just; who put honour above safety, and prepare to make their strength effective, shrinking from no hazard; even the final hazard if necessary, in order to serve the great cause of righteousness."

Peace-Mongers

DELEGATES FROM 25 COUNTRIES TO MEET AT GENEVA.

Berne, Dec. 1.

Arrangements are being made for a meeting of the Congress of Peace delegates from twenty-five countries, the place of rendezvous for whom will probably be Geneva.

Monsignor Werthmann has been here visiting Prince von Buelow, with the object, it is said, of creating a sentiment in favour of peace among belligerent and neutral Catholics.

Paris, Nov. 30.

The Chamber of Deputies has approved of the proposal of the Government to call to the colours the 1917 classes. This will add 400,000 young men to the strength of the army, most of whom have already received some military training.

20 PERSONS KILLED

Explosion at Dupont Works

TEUTON THREAT FULFILLED

New York, Nov. 30.

A telegram from Wilmington, Delaware, reports a serious explosion of powder in the Dupont factory, twenty persons being killed and a large number injured.

(Note.—A telegram in yesterday's issue of the HERALD received from Washington announced that posters had been fixed to the fences and trees warning Germans employed in the Dupont works to leave at once, and that the place was being strictly guarded).

INDIGNATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

New York, Dec. 1.

Details from Wilmington of the explosion at the Dupont works state that it has only been possible to identify one of the bodies owing to the horrible manner in which they were mutilated.

The force of the explosion was such that fragments of the building were hurled a distance of a quarter of a mile.

The doctors attending to the injured express the belief that few if any of the wounded will survive on account of the terrible injuries they have received. Many of them are blind.

The public demands that the Government shall take energetic measures for the protection of the men working in the munitions factories. It is expected that several arrests will be made.

ANOTHER EXPLOSION;
WORKMEN ARRESTED.

New York, Dec. 1.

A telegram from Wilmington reports that another explosion has occurred at the Dupont powder factory, with the result that three more men have been injured.

Several of the workmen have been arrested on suspicion of being implicated with the organisers of the crime.

After Five Years

EDISON TO RE-OPEN NEWVILLE WORKS.

New York, Nov. 30.

A telegram from Orange says that in consequence of the recovery in the price of cement, the famous inventor Edison has announced his intention to reopen the large works at Newville, N.J., which have been idle since 1910.

Mr. Edison expects to take on nine hundred men early in January.

A Week of Warfare

GERMAN FAILURES ON THE WESTERN FRONT.

Paris, Dec. 1.

An official resumé of the operations on the Western front during the week ended, November 27, says:—

"Artillery actions continued along the whole front, especially in the Artois district. In the region of Roye and on the Argonne the French batteries silenced those of the Germans.

"Between the Aisne and the Argonne, and in the region of the Bois de Lepretre, the contest of mines has continued in our favour. In the Bolante sector our Sappers blew up a German post.

"In the Vosges region the enemy attempted to capture one of our posts but completely failed.

"Reports on the German attacks in the Artois district, in the Labyrinth, on November 14, show that the enemy suffered serious losses. In this district the Germans made an effort of considerable importance to obtain some success against the Labyrinth where there has been so much fighting, as well as in order to convey the impression that there still existed an inclination to take the offensive against the French troops which had triumphed in that region in the month of September. The only result achieved was failure.

Letters from Germany found in the possession of prisoners show that Germany is beginning to feel the want of men. She has had to take from her last reserves the contingents destitute of both training and of military fitness."

Fighting in Mesopotamia

VARYING FORTUNES OF BRITISH EXPEDITION.

London, Nov. 30.

The "Morning Post" says that varying fortunes have attended General Townshend's expedition in Mesopotamia, but as yet sufficient details have not been recorded to clear up the situation.

From the latest official statement it does not appear that there has been further fighting since the British advance upon the battlefield of Ctesiphon; but the British have again fallen back to the Tigris, outnumbered by the Turks, and are now occupying more easily defended positions in the rear of their former line.

French African Troops

ARRIVE AT MARSEILLES.

Paris, Dec. 1.

Further contingents of troops from North Africa have arrived at Marseilles.

These troops will be kept in the rear of the firing line, as during the winter they will not be capable of lending much assistance at the front, and will only be utilised in cases of urgency.

The men are all well trained and full of enthusiasm.

THE DANGER AT SALONICA

Greece Believed to Have Declined Allies' Demands.

FEARS OF A STAB IN THE BACK

Council of War to Consider the Situation

London, Dec. 1.

It is stated on good authority here that Greece refuses to grant the demand of the Allies that they may be allowed to convert Salonica into a great military base, and that the Greek army in Macedonia be withdrawn.

If correct, this refusal leaves the Allies in the same condition of uncertainty as formerly existed as to what attitude Greece might assume at any given moment. It will compel them to maintain a large force at Salonica to prevent the possibility of the expeditionary forces on the Krivolak front being attacked in their rear.

It is known that negotiations are still going on at Athens, but it is unlikely that the Greeks will change their attitude owing to the influence of the King and the Premier, M. Skouloudis.

The matter will probably be dealt with to-morrow when Lord Kitchener attends the Supreme War Council.

GERMAN INFLUENCE IN GREECE

London, Dec. 1.

A Reuter's telegram from Athens says that the basis of Greece's reply to the second Note from the Entente is neutrality favourable to the Entente, so long as Greece's sovereign rights are not infringed and no military restrictions are imposed.

It is argued in Athens that with Salonica in the hands of the Allies, the Greeks will be deprived of the only means of provisioning their base. There are however no indications that the Entente will modify the demands already made; but both the Government and the diplomatic corps are hopeful of a satisfactory result.

More evidence of German influence is seen in the announcement that Greece is seeking delay before assenting to the requests for the settlement of difficulties. A Bucharest telegram asserts that secret negotiations are pending between Turkey and Greece for a union similar to that between Greece and Rumania, it being the hope of the pro-German element that the negotiations may prove the basis of a new Balkan League including Greece, Bulgaria and Turkey.

PROPOSED NEW BALKAN LEAGUE A BERLIN CREATION.

Amsterdam, Dec. 1.

According to information received and published by the "Telegraaf" the idea of forming a new Balkan League comprising Rumania, Greece, Bulgaria and Turkey originated in Berlin. It is proposed no longer to recognise Serbia as one of the Balkan States, but to divide her territory between the three first named States and Albania.

It is as yet impossible to say how far this is true; but it is beyond doubt that German diplomacy is displaying great activity in the capitals of the Balkan States and Constantinople.

Ultimatum to Austria

RUMANIA'S PROBABLE ACTION.

London, Dec. 1.

The rumour published in the papers that Rumania will send an ultimatum to Austria as soon as the Allies have 500,000 troops in the Balkans has not been officially confirmed.

The rumour is stated to have come from Bucharest.

RUMANIA DESIRES PORTION OF HUNGARY.

Rome, Dec. 1.

The correspondent of the Journal in Rome states that it is reported in diplomatic circles that Rumanian Conservative leaders have assured the Duke of Mecklenberg Schwerin of Rumania's benevolent neutrality, provided that Germany would persuade Vienna to relinquish Transylvania and part of Bukovina to Rumania. It is said that the Kaiser will break down Hungarian opposition.

King's Speech Interrupted

FIGHT IN RUMANIAN PARLIAMENT.

Paris, Dec. 1.

A telegram from Berne to the "Matin" states that at the opening session of the Rumanian Parliament there was a fight between the partisans and adversaries of the Government.

King Ferdinand had hardly begun the Address from the Throne when he was interrupted by cries of "Down with the Government" from Deputy Mille. The leaders of the Interventionists and the adherents and supporters of the Government replied with cheers for the King, whose speech was however constantly interrupted by the shouts of the Opposition.

As soon as the King departed there was a general battle.

Turkey's Women

GAIN GREATER FREEDOM AS RESULT OF WAR.

New York, Dec. 1.

A radiogram from Berlin says that the participation of Turkey in the war is bringing a greater degree of freedom for the women of that country.

The Turkish Ministry of Communications announces that there will be employment for women in the money order departments of that Ministry. Applicants must not be under 17 and must be unmarried. They will receive a salary of $16 monthly.

It is also announced that a school for women has been opened at Damascus.

Berlin to Constantinople

RE-OPENING OF RAILWAY SERVICE.

New York, Dec. 1.

According to a wireless telegram from Berlin, the "Frankfurter Zeitung" publishes a message from Constantinople stating that a meeting of railway authorities will be held on Thursday next at Temesvar, in Hungary, preparatory to the establishment of an express service between Berlin and Constantinople.

Fighting at the Dardanelles

TURKS DISPERSED WITH HAND GRENADES.

Paris, Dec. 1.

An official communication respecting the operations in the Dardanelles says:—

"On November 27 and 28 the Dardanelles expeditionary corps displayed notable activity, while the enemy at the same time executed various operations.

"Sapping work continues uninterrupted on both sides. An explosion caused by our troops blew up a Turkish listening post in one of our tunnels. Having discovered the Turkish tunnel our sappers entered it and dispersed the enemy with revolvers and hand grenades."

Britain's Losses

HEAVY CASUALTY LISTS REPORTED.

London, Nov. 26.

The officers' casualty lists for the fortnight ending November 8 shows 356 killed, 609 wounded, and 69 missing. Since the beginning of the war the totals have been 6389 killed, 12,561 wounded, and 1752 missing.

During the fortnight under notice the severest sufferers were the Stafford Regiment with 26 killed, 47 wounded and 4 missing; Royal Engineers with 25 killed and 26 wounded; the Lancashires with 6 killed and 69 wounded; the Leicesters with 18 killed, 23 wounded and 3 missing; the Sherwoods with 12 killed and 25 wounded; the Yorkshires, 1 killed, 24 wounded; the Lincolns, 13 killed, 14 wounded, 11 missing; and the Kent Regiment, 16 killed, 13 wounded, 5 missing. Other regiments had losses of over 20. Brigadier Forbes Trefusis was killed, Major-General Walker wounded, and seven Lt.-Colonels killed.

Explosion on the Germania

GERMAN DISASTER IN THE BALTIC.

London, Nov. 30.

It is officially announced that the explosion which is reported to have occurred on board the German steamer Germania in the Baltic was due to water contracting the boilers after the ship had been run ashore on the Swedish coast and deserted.

The New Albania

PRINCE WILLIAM OF WIED TO BE INSTALLED AS RULER.

Zurich, Nov. 30.

The "Gazette" of this city announces that the Central Empires intend to re-install Prince von Wied as ruler of Albania.

The Albanian frontiers are to adjoin those of Greece, Bulgaria and Austria, thus becoming a State of great importance.

Teuton Leaders Taken

RUSSIANS CAPTURE GERMAN GENERAL HEADQUARTERS

Petrograd, Nov. 30.

To-day's official bulletin respecting the progress of events on the eastern front says:—

"Artillery action on the Riga front is increasing in violence. Between Riga and Dvinsk no change has occurred.

"In the Illoukst region we repulsed an attack, our troops immediately delivering a counter-attack which drove the enemy out of Kazimirlich and penetrated to Illoukst, the eastern outskirts of which we occupied.

"South-west of Painsk we penetrated to the general headquarters of the 82nd Division of the German army. We captured a number of officers, including a General of Division and two Brigadier-Generals.

"On the left bank of the Styr we compelled the enemy to retreat in a westerly direction."

SNOW IN THE CAUCASUS.

Petrograd, Nov. 30.

Despatches from Tiflis state that heavy snow has begun falling in the region of the Caucasus, interfering considerably with military operations. In consequence of this there have been no more engagements recently, and tranquillity prevails along almost the whole front.

The Russian troops are being further reinforced in anticipation of an early resumption of the offensive.

The enemy remains in his trenches without attempting any offensive movement of importance.

The Russian aeroplanes have been bombarding the enemy's positions on the coast.

Bulgaria's Warning

NO RUSSIAN TROOPS MUST CROSS RUMANIA.

Amsterdam, Nov. 30.

A rumour is current here that the Bulgarian Government has informed that of Rumania that if she allows Russian forces to pass through her territory, or if she does not offer armed resistance to their doing so, Bulgaria will invade Rumania with the sole proposal of checking the Russian attack.

A RUMoured ULTIMATUM

Rome, Dec. 1.

It is reported that Bulgaria has sent an ultimatum to Rumania warning that State that the former will attack the Russians if permitted to pass through Rumania. Furthermore Bulgaria will not be responsible for any property losses.

Bulgarians in Serbia

"REORGANISING" THE COUNTRY.

Salonica, Nov. 30.

The Bulgarians are reorganising that part of Serbia and Macedonia which they have conquered. In all the towns Bulgarian authorities have taken charge, with staffs of employees from Sofia.

Owing to the poverty of the population no war contribution is being levied. On the contrary the Bulgarians are distributing money, food and medicine among those who most require them.

King Ferdinand of Bulgaria is going to Nish personally to supervise the work of organising the conquered territory.

It is reported from Sofia that several Serbian Generals have arrived there as prisoners of war. They are being courteously treated and are in good health.

Austria's Reported Desire for Peace

THREE MINISTERS RELIEVED OF OFFICE

Franz Josef a Vassal of Potsdam

London, Dec. 1.

Despatches from Rome report a rumour that the journey of the Kaiser to Vienna was for the object of dissuading Emperor Francis Joseph from the proposal of making peace separately with Russia.

The rumour says that the Pope and the King of Spain were aware of the Austrian Emperor's wishes and were prepared to signify their acceptance thereof at the proper moment.

It is further declared that the visit of Cardinal Hartmann to Rome was at the instance of the Kaiser, the Cardinal being instructed to obtain an audience of His Holiness and oppose the Emperor's proposals.

The report concludes by declaring that the Kaiser's visit can only defer for the time being the realisation of the nation's desire, the military being the only class opposed to the celebration of peace. This has been proved by more than one demonstration of hostility to the ruling dynasty.

KAISER "PERFECTLY SATISFIED"

New York, Dec. 1.

A telegram from Vienna announces that the Kaiser left Vienna last night after a further conference with Emperor Francis Joseph and the Minister of Finance.

It is stated that a plan of operations was arranged which will be put into practice with as little delay as possible.

The Kaiser appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the result of his trip.

MACHINATIONS OF WILHELM.

Amsterdam, Dec. 1.

The resignations of the Austrian Ministers of the Interior, Finance and Commerce are officially announced as having been tendered and accepted.

The reason assigned to the action of the Ministers is that they were trying to induce the Emperor to treat for peace separately with Russia, and possibly with Italy also. On this being known in Berlin the Kaiser hastened to Vienna to counteract the influence of the Ministers, in which he succeeded, with the result as described.

THE NEW MINISTERS.

New York, Dec. 1.

A wireless telegram from Vienna reports that, following the resignation of the Minister of the Interior, Dr. Karl Baron Heinold, the Minister of Finance Baron Engel, and the Minister of Commerce Dr. Rudolf Schuster von Bonnot, their portfolios have been taken over by Prince von Hohenlohe Schillingfuerst, Ritter von Loth, and Herr von Spitzmiller, respectively.

TENSION TOO GREAT FOR AUSTRIA.

Rome, Dec. 1.

In Vienna, it is stated, there are desires for a lasting peace. The tension is rapidly becoming too great for Austria.

Cheap Enthusiasm

IN THE BERLIN REICHSTAG.

New York, Dec. 1.

A despatch from Berlin states that the opening speech of the President of the Reichstag to-day was greeted with much enthusiasm.

The Secretary for the Treasury introduced a Bill for arranging preliminaries for the taxation of war profits, urging the speedy discussion of the measure. The Bill was referred to Committee.

The Reichstag adopted in its final reading a Bill modifying martial law, giving the option of a fine instead of imprisonment for minor offences.

There was no debate whatever. The Socialist member Scheidman announced that he might take up the question of certain abuses later.

The Treasurer then introduced a Bill requiring companies and corporations to set aside fifty per cent. of their extra profits during the war in order to cover their ultimate taxation.

There was no reference to peace movements during the session.

GORIZIA IN FLAMES

Great Battle Near Burning City

HEAVY LOSSES ON BOTH SIDES

Semi-official information from Austria reports that the suburbs of Gorizia are in flames, and that the evacuation of the city is proceeding in a methodical manner.

'AN INFERNO OF BATTLEFIELDS.'

Amsterdam, Nov. 30.

The correspondent of the "Berliner Tageblatt" telegraphs from the Austrian front on the Isonzo that he has had an interview with the Archduke Joseph Ferdinand commanding the Austrian troops. His Highness described the Isonzo region during the fighting as an inferno of battlefields. The battle of Gorizia, the correspondent says, was stated to be the bitterest and most bloody of the campaign, the casualties and expenditure of ammunition being enormous.

ITALIAN OFFENSIVE ON THE CARSO PLATEAU.

Rome, Nov. 30.

An official despatch published by the Italian Government reports:—"On the Carso we have developed a vigorous offensive on the northern slopes of Monte San Michele. We have captured 15 officers and about 700 rank and file."

Determined to Take Gorizia

GERMANY'S VIEW OF ITALIAN INTENTIONS.

New York, Dec. 1.

A despatch from Berlin says that very heavy losses are reported among the Italian forces on the Isonzo, they having apparently determined to take Gorizia regardless of their immense sacrifices.

The general opinion in Berlin is that the battle has not yet reached its highest pitch. All the positions are firmly held by the Austro-Hungarians, despite the fact that some of them are nearly destroyed. Every night they repair the damages sustained during the day, in the teeth of artillery fire and attacks by infantry.

ITALIANS STILL GAINING GROUND.

Rome, Dec. 1.

The last official despatch published by the Italian War Office says:

"On the Gorizia plateau and the heights to the north-west early yesterday morning, persistent and bitter fighting enabled us to make progress in the region between the mountain stream of Pounca and the main road between Foriano and Gorizia."

"On the Carso plateau, after carrying some of the enemy's trenches, our lines have now reached to within a few yards of the hamlet of San Martino del Carso."

"During the day's action we captured 264 prisoners, two quickfiers, three bombthrowers; rifles and other material."

To Invade Egypt

DJEMAL PASHA ORGANISING A NEW ARMY.

Rome, Nov. 30.

Information has been received from Asia Minor that Djemal Pasha, formerly Minister of Marine, is not endeavouring to work up a rebellion against Enver Pasha and the Turkish Government, as has been stated. On the contrary, he is actively engaged in organising a new expedition against Egypt.

Imitation Maxims

AN AUSTRIAN RUSE.

Petrograd, Nov. 26.

It is reported that in the course of a recent engagement at Dumoy on the southern front the Austrians tried an ingenious ruse in order to frighten the attacking enemy.

It is one of the phenomena of the battlefield that infantry when charging trenches provided with quickfiers are apt to swerve instinctively from the points where the Maxims seem to be thickest. However great the roar of the big guns, the little quickfiers are still distinctly audible.

Acting upon this, the Austrians, in order to increase the psychological effect of their machine gun fire, mount in the trenches a large proportion of dummy guns alternatively with the real Maxims. They produce the same noise and are worked by rapidly turning a handle.

Drowned in the Sty

FATE OF THOUSANDS OF AUSTRIANS.

London, Nov. 25.

Official despatches from Petrograd report that while large forces of Austrians were crossing the river Sty which was frozen over, the Russian artillery's fire smashed the ice and thousands of Austrians were drowned.

WILL RESIST TO THE LAST MAN

Serbian Minister's Belief in His Countrymen

RUSSIANS ALMOST READY FOR ACTION

Preparations for Opening of Great Offensive

Rome, Dec. 1.

The Serbian Minister Plenipotentiary in Rome said in the course of an interview with one of the staff of the "Giornale d'Italia" that Serbia does not know the word "surrender." The nation will resist to the last man. Serbia has still 200,000 fighting men to hurl upon the enemy, and only awaits ammunition and supplies in order to resume the campaign.

BULGARIANS OBEY GERMAN ORDERS.

London, Dec. 1.

An Athens telegram reports that Monastir has been evacuated by the Serbians. The Bulgarians however have postponed their entry until the German troops shall arrive. This recalls rumours already prevalent to the effect that the Germans had forbidden the Bulgarians to take possession of Monastir in their absence.

The Serbian Situation

FRENCH GENERAL'S OPTIMISM.

Paris, Dec. 1.

An article contributed by General Delacroix to "Le Temps" says that the situation in the Balkans must not be regarded with misgivings. The condition of the Serbians, while critical, is not desperate, and the offensive of the Allies against Istib and towards the Bulgarian capital is likely to produce a turn in events.

The General declares that the Austro-Germans failed in their main objective of enveloping the Serbians, who, although driven westwards, will be able to retire in a southwesterly direction to the Drina valley, joining the Allies in the south.

The main problem for the Serbians is to obtain supplies; but the problem will also affect the Austro-Germans, as the snow is now from six to nine feet deep.

The Serbians have still 150,000 men with the Allies, and there 300,000 available for resistance and ultimately for the offensive.

The article concludes with a strong appeal for a determined offensive in the Varda valley, with Sofia as the objective.

Calm Before the Storm

QUIETNESS ON RUSSIAN FRONT PRELUDE TO EXTENSIVE OPERATIONS.

Petrograd, Dec. 1.

The situation along the Russian front is relatively tranquil, and of late there have been no actions of importance. In certain sectors isolated combats still occur, but nothing more.

Reinforcements are pouring into the Russian lines, as well as provisions and ammunition in great abundance. Nothing is now wanting but the orders of the General Staff for the commencement of operations on a grand scale.

Parties of troops have already begun to reconnoitre the German lines without engaging the enemy in battle. There has been of late no change in the enemy's lines, although it is believed that they have been weakened by the despatch of large contingents to France.

"Wild Beast's Struggles"

GENERAL GALLIENI'S DESCRIPTION OF GERMAN ACTIVITIES IN SERBIA.

Paris, Nov. 30.

The French Minister of War, General Gallieni, characterises the present operations of Germany as the convulsive struggles of a wild beast caught in the toils. Germany has succeeded in opening communications with the Golden Horn, but she now finds herself menaced by an attack by Russia.

Germany's declaration that her operations in Serbia are over is interpreted as meaning that the campaign against the Allies in the Balkans will be left to Austria, although the general belief is that she will have to retire from Serbia to Transylvania to meet the invasion of Bulgaria by the Russians.

Russia's War Loan

GENERAL PUBLIC INVITED TO SUBSCRIBE.

London, Dec. 1.

A Press correspondent at Petrograd sends a communication describing how curious crowds are standing in the snow reading the placards posted in the city announcing the issue of a loan for £100,000,000 at 5 1/2 per cent. interest.

This is the first appeal by the Russian Government to the masses of the people to subscribe to the issue. Previous loans have always been taken up by the banks and wealthy classes.

This advertising by poster is skillfully arranged and is attracting the attention of that part of the population which does not read the newspapers. The exclamations uttered when the poster is read aloud to them promise success to the effort to draw upon the secret savings of the peasants.

"My Dear Bethmann Hollwegg"

CONGRATULATED BY THE KAISER.

New York, Dec. 1.

A telegram from Berlin states that the Kaiser has sent the following birthday message to the Imperial Chancellor:—

"I send my hearty congratulations to you, my dear Von Bethmann-Hollwegg, on the recurrence of your birthday.

"Unfortunately you have to celebrate it once more while war is raging. In these serious times you have been my faithful and tried pillar. Your successes deserve my sincere congratulations. I trust that Providence may bestow upon you further success, for the benefit of the Empire and the proud satisfaction of your family. This is the sincere wish of your grateful Emperor."

A telegram from Tacoma, Puget to the "Washington Ledger" announces the receipt of news from Victoria that the Chilian ship Carelmapu has been lost, having been driven ashore in a terrible gale a mile east of the Growland rock in Schooner Cove, on the west coast of Vancouver island, and pounded to pieces on the rocks.

The Canadian Pacific steamship Princess May, Capt. Gilliam, attempted at great risk to help the crew who were clinging to the wreck, but could not get near and the seamen were washed off and drowned.

The Princess lost an anchor and sixty fathoms of cable and had her windlass smashed.

The Carelmapu was bound from Caleta Buena via Honolulu to Puget Sound in ballast.

"Freedom of the Seas"

GERMANY'S SPLENDID (?) EXAMPLE.

London, Dec. 1.

The British Foreign Office publishes a statement made by the Captain of a Swedish steamer that before vessels sail from Swedish ports the Customs Department telegraphs to Berlin information of those vessels sailing and adding that they do not carry contraband.

All vessels leaving the Baltic are stopped by a German patrol which carefully examines the cargo.

The Foreign Office makes the observation that the above merits public notice as showing how Germany practices the principle of the freedom of the seas for neutral commerce, which she has accused Britain of violating.

The United States Ambassador at Vienna telegraphs to the Department of State that the Austro-Hungarian Government desires more time in which to compile a formal statement as to the sinking of the Ancona.

The Department of State believes that Vienna meets with some difficulty in obtaining a statement from the commander of the submarine which sank the ship.

Cettinje, Nov. 29.

King Nicholas of Montenegro is preparing a reception for King Peter and the members of the Serbian Ministry who are removing to Scutari where Essad Pasha is now staying. These personages will hold a council to discuss the best method of defending themselves in Albania.

Meantime, the resources of Montenegro being very limited, arrangements are being made to obtain from the Allies clothing, food and arms for the Serbian troops as well as for the thousands of non-combatant fugitives entering the country. The Powers will also send a medical staff, nurses and drugs to attend to the sick and wounded.

BULGARIAN LOSSES

"NOT LESS THAN 50,000 KILLED AND WOUNDED."

Paris, Nov. 29.

Telegrams from Bucharest state that the Bulgarian losses are probably not less than 50,000 killed and wounded, this high figure being attributed to the frequent bayonet charges of the Serbians and Allies.

A large proportion of the dead consist of superior officers, among them being the son of the Bulgarian Minister at Washington, and the famous insurgent leader Tchernopoff.

The "Yellow Press"

DISCUSSION IN THE COMMONS.

London, Nov. 25.

A discussion arose in the House of Commons over the methods of what is known as the "yellow Press," when the Home Secretary was questioned upon the subject.

Sir John Simon in reply read an article in the Petrograd newspaper, "Russkoe Slovo," which lays upon Lord Northcliffe's papers, the "Times" and the "Daily Mail" the blame for the diplomatic defeat sustained by the Powers of the Entente in the Balkans.

The Wolff Agency is alleged to have scored by circulating copies of Colonel Repington's articles in the "Times" pointing out the deficiencies in the British military organisation.

One of the members asked whether the articles published in the Parisian edition of the "Daily Mail" were not even worse than those of the "Times." The Home Secretary answered that he did not think it possible that there could have been anything worse, but that he was not acquainted with the Parisian edition of the paper referred to.

The "Westminster Gazette" declares that the Government has received information that the article published by Lord Northcliffe's papers after the dispute which arose between himself and the Government went far to determine the attitude of Bulgaria and induce her to make common cause with the Central Powers.

It is believed that the statements made by the Home Secretary in Parliament are an indication that in future the Government intends to proceed energetically against the papers in question.

[The absurdity of "a member's" query is obvious. In France a military censorship exists, and any journal publishing articles distasteful to the authorities is at once suppressed. Many papers have come under the ban of the censor, and there is no reason to believe that the Paris edition of the "Daily Mail" would have escaped had there been any occasion for taking action.—Ed. THE HERALD].

"War taxes" on Belgium

32,000,000 MARKS TO BE PAID
EACH MONTH.

Rotterdam, Nov. 25.

The period for the collection of the war taxes levied on Belgium by the Germans having expired on the 10th instant, a new law which gives no definite period has been enacted which specifies that monthly payments of 32 million marks must be made, of which Brussels is to provide 21,500,000 marks.

This is considered significant as showing that the banking centres are to bear the burden owing to the decline of industries and the lack of resources among the provincial communities.

Peace Meeting Wrecked

QUICK ACTION BY COLONIAL TROOPS.

London, Nov. 30.

A meeting was held at the Memorial Hall last night by a certain society which is in favour of peace and opposed to conscription.

During the proceedings a number of Canadian and Australian soldiers who had taken tickets interfered, unceremoniously turned the orators out and transformed the meeting into one for recruiting.

In order to clear the platform of the peace advocates the soldiers threw gas bombs on it, and both the opponents of the war and the women who were distributing leaflets on behalf of the cause were obliged to retreat. Those who still remained were thrown into the street together with the furniture. A motion was then proposed and carried condemning the activity of these peace societies and declaring that the only conditions under which peace would be acceptable to the Allies would be announced after Germany was defeated.

War in the Air

BRITISH AIRMAN FIGHTS FIVE GERMAN AIRCRAFT.

London, Nov. 30.

A despatch from Field Marshal French states:—

"During the 28th instant the enemy's aeroplanes displayed much activity fifteen aerial combats ensuing. One of their aeroplanes was brought down near Cequemin.

"One of our airmen met and engaged no less than five aeroplanes during a single flight.

"A squadron of fourteen British aeroplanes attacked the enemy's aerodrome at Gits, and another of fourteen machines bombarded the munitions factory at La Chapellotte, in each case doing great damage. All returned uninjured.

"On the coast also the German aeroplanes were very busy. A French aeroplane overturned one, and a British hydroplane accounted for another. In the evening a British aeroplane destroyed a German submarine off Middelkirke, the vessel being seen broken into two pieces."

Regarding the outbreak of the disease it is officially stated that since the first of the month 45 cases occurred in the Bath and Glastonbury districts and one in Pembroke. The animals slaughtered were 862 cattle, 225 sheep and 324 swine.

The area now subject to restrictions is approximately fifteen miles round Bath and a ten mile radius from Butleigh, Glastonbury.

Welsh Miners' Decision

PRO-WAR MEMBER ELECTED TO SUCCEED KEIR HARDIE.

London, Nov. 27.

The election of a member to represent the constituency of Merthyr Tydfil in Wales, the seat being left vacant by the death of Mr. Keir Hardie, took place yesterday.

The successful candidate was a miner named Charles Stanton, a man without any private means or political influence, but a strenuous advocate of the war being carried on until Germany is defeated.

He obtained a majority of 4206 votes over his opponent, a Mr. Winston, formerly representative of the Independent Labour party. He was considered to favour Germany in his opinions, although he has a son in the firing line, and despite his being supported by a Cabinet Minister, Mr. Henderson.

The successful candidate polled 10,286 votes and his opponent only 6,080.

The Press considers this an indication that the Welsh miners are determined to see the war through at all costs.

Zion Mule Corps

JEWISH TROOPS AT THE DARDANELLES.

London, Nov. 26.

Despatches to the War Office announce that in the Dardanelles a Jewish corps is fighting on the side of the Allies, being composed of fugitives from Jerusalem. It is known as the Zion Mule Corps.

SIR IAN HAMILTON'S TRIBUTE

London, Nov. 26.

The Zion Mule Corps, composed of Jewish refugees, has obtained official notice in despatches from the Dardanelles, the honour of special mention being accorded to Private Nissel Ronsenberg.

In a letter from the Dardanelles General Sir Ian Hamilton says:

"It may be interesting to know that a Jewish unit is fighting with the forces under my orders, the first time in the Christian era that such a thing has happened. The unit is composed of men who were driven from Jerusalem by the Turks, arriving at Egypt with their families destitute and starving. From them a transport corps was raised for voluntary service against the Turks, whom they detest. They all display great courage in taking water supplies to the fighting lines under heavy fire."

British Generals

TO BE RETIRED WHEN SHOWING "SIGNS OF SENILITY."

London, Nov. 26.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons the Prime Minister stated that in regard to Generals in the British army there is no age limit. On the other hand it is proposed to displace those officers whenever they show signs of senility, whether their ages be forty or eighty. It is impossible to institute a hard and fast rule of the kind to an officer whose mental and physical qualifications are still suitable for active service. Any arrested

Caring for An Army

FRENCH SOLDIERS' LIFE IN THE TRENCHES.

Paris, Nov. 25.

The local edition of the "New York Herald" publishes a description of the manner in which the French soldier in the trenches is cared for by the Commissariat Department. The article says:—

"The French soldier lives well. He has two morning meals. Early breakfast consists of bread and coffee. There is nothing he appreciates so much as the morning coffee brought in canvas buckets and sugared but without milk. If the weather is bad a little rum is added.

"For dinner and supper the staple dish is a ragout, generally thickened with beans and rice. The pot au feu receives a variety of vegetables. Occasionally the cooks, even in the firing line, vary the menu with special dishes of steaks, brains, hearts and other delicacies, which they convey to the men in the trenches.

"It is a current remark in France that the cook is the bravest man in the army. This is the general tribute to the danger he undergoes in carrying dainties to appreciative poilus awaiting his arrival in the line of battle.

"The animals for human consumption are brought alive quite near the lines and there slaughtered in the typical French economical style, making use of every possible fragment of the carcass. The hides, bones and uneatable portions are collected and sent back to be turned to advantage by the cook.

"Each mess sends an assistant in the morning for the squad's share to the butchers' store, where they promptly receive their necessary share of meat.

"The operation of carving the meat is a matter of interest to the French soldiers, who gather round the kitchen and criticise the skill of the carver.

"Meat dishes by no means complete the bill of fare for dinner. There are also small loaves of bread, the crust of which is cut away before served owing to the fact that it has accumulated dirt during transportation. Every man is also allowed a litre of red wine, and he can get salad, cheese and fruit, which are obtained locally. The men frequently have small plantations close to the positions."

Italy's War Taxes

INCREASED LEVIES OF INCOMES.

Rome, Nov. 25.

CASE OF THE PRESIDENTE MITRE

Creates a Sensation in the Capital

SOUTHERN STEAMSHIP SERVICES SUSPENDED

Calm Attitude of Responsible Native Newspapers

One subject of conversation overshadowed all others in the Capital yesterday—the case of the Presidente Mitre.

When the news of her capture by the British auxiliary cruiser Orama first came through, it was received with incredulity.

On it being made known that the incident had actually occurred, two distinct impressions were created.

One section of the public opinion was disposed to adopt a cautious attitude and to await further details. The other, however—whose organs are La Razón and La Unión—sought to arouse feeling by referring to the Orama's act as an outrage.

The principal newspapers, it is pleasing to record, are restrained in their comments.

A point of some interest is that the Winnebago which is believed to be liable to capture should she leave the Plate—is departing from the Port for the Roads, where she will await orders.

SOUTHERN SERVICES SUSPENDED

Owing to the seizure of the steamship Presidente Mitre, whose registration is Argentine while her agency is that of the Hamburg South American Company, identified with the Cap Trafalgar and the other Cap boats, by a British cruiser, the river steamer Cabo Corrientes has been forbidden to leave Montevideo, and her place on the up-river run is to be taken by the Mihanovich steamer "Paris."

The capture was made by the British armed ship Orama on Sunday afternoon, when the Presidente Mitre was well outside the three-mile limit of jurisdictional waters. The distance is given as 15 miles off Cabo San Antonio. In consequence there has been great consternation among the interests immediately concerned, and the "Camarones" of the same line on her return to Buenos Aires has received instructions to stop at Comodoro Rivadavia, and wait instructions. All other vessels of the line have suspended their sailings, fearing a similar fate. Meanwhile it is stated that Sir Reginald Tower pointed out the provisions indicated in His Britannic Majesty's Order-in-Council dated October 20, 1915, which annulled Article 57 of the Declaration of London, and reverts to the doctrine that an enemy's ship may be seized irrespective of the flag under which it sails, if the ownership be hostile. Presumably the conditions are regarded as analogous to those prevailing in the case of the Genessee and Kankatee, as also the Winnebago, now lying in the South Dock, and the British Government sustains the opinion that the vessel is really a German ship. It may be remembered that early in the war the wireless of these ships were exceedingly active, and certainly not in British interests. The passengers of the Mitre, and their personal property and the mails have been transferred by launches to Montevideo, but the ship herself is to be sent to the Falklands as a prize of war, her German officers and Austrian or German members of the crew being held as prisoners of war. The captain is among these. Should the Argentine Government decline to guarantee the safety of ships of this line, they will probably suspend their sailings altogether. The Press generally is commendably cautious, and very little comment is made until the facts are fully known.

This naturally does not apply to "La Razón," which is far in advance of Government, and demands to know what the A. B. C. is going to do about it?

The Presidente Mitre is German built, having been constructed at the Reiherst's Schiffswerk Yach, Hamburg. Captain Jansen, a naturalised German, commanded her.

The Anglo-Argentine Treaty of 1825 recognised as Argentine ships those the hulls of which had been constructed in the natural yards and which were worked by Argentine capital. After the interview with Graf von Luxburg and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Vice-Admiral Saenz Valiente, Minister of Marine, referred to these clauses.

LOCAL PRESS OPINIONS

"LA PATRIA."

"La Patria" states that the general feeling in British shipping circles may be given as follows: The impression created is not one of astonishment, as the action taken is simply identical with that employed towards German ships which have sheltered themselves behind the American flag.

It is perfectly well known to all the shipping agents, including those of the Hamburg Sud Amerika, that the British Admiralty intends to make no exceptions.

It, after the publication of the fact that Great Britain had denounced Art. 57 of the Declaration of London, and which takes no cognisance now of the change of flags, but only of actual ownership, the Hamburg line persists in sending its vessels out into neutral waters, no one need be surprised, and, least of all, the agents of the Presidente Mitre, if she has been captured. All the British shipping agents are much amused at the almost comic haste with which Count von Luxburg hastened, as soon as the capture transpired, to run to the Argentine Chancery with his complaint and protest. This hurried intervention on behalf of "a neutral" vessel is ipso facto evidence against the German Minister, and proof, if such were needed, that the ship belongs to a German Company. Everyone of the British consulted has insisted on this circumstance. Furthermore they consider that even if public opinion were at first somewhat excited by the capture, the explanations given could not fail to tranquillise it, and that afterwards things would go on as before.

SEÑOR MANUEL UGARTE.

In regard to the opinions expressed in the Argentine Press, the following may be quoted:

"We are not," says Don Manuel Ugarte, in "La Patria," "of those who stir up disorder and fire violent and tumultuous passions. Neither are we of those who take advantage of circumstances to exhibit out partialities in favour of one or other of the countries who are tearing each other to pieces in Europe. It is with a mind free from all bias or passion that we consider the case, which, from our point of view, is exclusively Argentine.

One of the conflicting nations has considered itself justified in seizing a ship carrying the Argentine flag under the pretext that the vessel belonged to a company which was partly composed of citizens of another belligerent nation. The national conscience instinctively rises against the injury.

If we have so far so carefully abstained in the present war, it was in order that our neutrality should be respected.

"We are both surprised and grieved that Britain, a nation with which we have for so many years maintained the most cordial relations, should thus break that peaceful record. . . . The Argentine may at times appear indifferent, but he has forgotten nothing of his past, and he abandons no title of his future."

EL DIARIO.

"El Diario" merely records the facts that while at the Hamburg Sud Amerika offices the opinion is heatedly affirmed that the Argentine Government must take up a firm attitude, the British maritime agencies and shipping opinion consider that the affair is a matter of small importance, and that the Hamburg South Amerika boats are, beyond question, German, and liable to capture, as soon as they are surprised in neutral waters, and that it is not possible to unduly magnify a very ordinary incident of the war.

LA RAZON.

"La Razón" says: "One fine day Germany declared her submarine blockade without regard to lading, port of origin, flag or nationality, and following this England denounced the 'Declaration of London.'"

In the light of strict right, there is no doubt of the nationality of the Presidente Mitre. She is Argentine. This should be determined judicially, so that the flag, whether flown in Argentine or Oriental waters, should cover the merchandise in accord with the prescriptions of the Treaty of Paris in 1856.

On this point the Argentine Government must support its rights in the claim formulated. We are inclined to believe that a ship with the national flag which has for years sailed between Argentine ports, which does not carry contraband of war, even if it does belong to a German Limited Company, of which there may be members of all nationalities, should not be considered as strictly German to the extent of seizure.

THE DECLARATION OF LONDON

EFFECTS OF THE RECENT

'ORDER IN COUNCIL'

The Case of the "Presidente Mitre"

(Exclusive to THE HERALD).

In view of the very natural agitation that is felt in Argentine shipping circles at the news of the arrest of the s.s. Presidente Mitre, a well-known trader to the Southern ports of this Republic one is perforce constrained to adopt a conciliatory attitude when endeavouring to explain the reasons that have led to an apparently arbitrary act prejudicial to Argentine interests on the part of the British naval authorities. It goes without saying that the Teutonic interests here will do all they can to make out a case for their government; the capture of the "Presidente Mitre" will be held to establish the truth of Germany's contention that she is fighting for the liberty of the seas, and to the uninstructed or ignorant among the Argentine people, this argument will appear unanswerable.

Hence it behoves all British subjects to refrain from exulting over what is undoubtedly another shrewd cut at German capital interests; a cut that almost savours of just retaliation when one remembers the early days of the war preceding the battles of Coronel and the Falklands. The crux of the matter lies in the abrogation of Art. 57 of the Declaration of London, and the return on the part of France and Great Britain to the old sea rule, a rule that goes back to the days of the Oleron Laws, whereby enemy ownership spells capture whatever the flag that floats at the jackstaff. Prior to the London Conference held in 1908 this rule held, and Great Britain consented to the modification whereby neutral registry and a neutral flag covered cargo not expressly determined as contraband and not consigned to an enemy country with the very greatest reluctance.

Now the Declaration of London, Art. 57 states that "subject to the provisions respecting transfer to another flag, the neutral or enemy character of the vessel is determined by the flag which she is entitled to fly." This safeguard is now expressly done away with by His Majesty's Order in Council of October 20, which says:—"in lieu of the said article, British prize courts shall apply the rules and principles formerly observed in such courts." This ruling at once places the vessels of the Hamburg South America Line under liability, but Argentines will do well to remember that there are many reasons, argumentative as well as provocative, that warrant Britain's action. In the first place the Declaration of London was never formally ratified by all the nations taking part in the Conference, and early in the war Germany by her deeds, if not in so many words, drove the proverbial coach and horses through almost all the provisions designed to humanise, if the phrase be permitted, modern maritime warfare. She has paid as much attention to the clauses of the Declaration of London as she has done to the Hague Convention, the neutrality of Belgium, or any other bond to which she has put her signature when it appeared to her advantage to break faith.

Two wrongs do not however make one right, and Great Britain would have no right to make the important announcement that is embodied in the Order aforesaid were it not that the Declaration of London is still incomplete. It was, as La Nación observes in an article which is paraphrased elsewhere in this issue, a great step forward. But unratified and regarded as not binding by the enemy, it has proved on more than one occasion to be a severe handicap to British efforts. For over a year we have carried this handicap, but the recent disclosures relative to the wholesale transfer of German tonnage to neutral flags, the strenuous attempts made to embroil Great Britain and the United States, attempts which thanks to the sound common-sense of the American nation and the forbearance of Great Britain, have had no evil results, proved that the time had come for action. Here in Buenos Aires we have seen in the case of the s.s. Winnebago how determined the German agents provocateurs have been to cause trouble. No other end could be attributed to the cabled statement that certain American diplomatic circles were in favour of sending an American man of war down here to escort that ship to her destination. As a matter of fact, the case of the American Transatlantic Company's boats is yet one more instance of the debt that the Allies owe to the honest impartiality of the United States. In this, as in many other matters they and their rulers have shown that the sneer of those who dub them mere dollar hunters is as undeserved as it is mean. With an export trade reaching unheard-of dimensions, and growing literally every day; with a limited mercantile marine, and dear freights for what tonnage is on offer, the temptation to take over German tonnage must have been severe in

PRESIDENTE MITRE CASE

Questions in Congress

ARGENTINE PROTEST TO BRITAIN

It is now stated that the Minister of Foreign Affairs has received a wire from the Argentine Minister at Montevideo informing him that the Commander of the Orama, British cruiser, has decided to liberate all the crew of the s.s. Presidente Mitre, irrespective of nationality. He received this information direct from the British Minister in Uruguay.

Doctor Zeballos, Deputy for the Capital, inquired yesterday in Congress, whether the Minister for Foreign Affairs would at the Sessions of December 6, give such explanations as might be deemed compatible with the public interest, on the capture of the national steamer, "Presidente Mitre." Dr. Zeballos complained of the attitude assumed by the Argentine Government on this and similar questions in isolating itself and keeping its intentions secret from Congress. He intimated that failing satisfaction to the inquiry he had made, he might bring in several proposals relative to the preservation of Argentine neutrality and jurisdiction over the adjacent waters.

On Tuesday night the Minister of Foreign Affairs sent a long telegram in cipher to the Minister in London, Doctor Dominguez.

The terms of the protest are not known beyond the fact that it is energetic in character, and that it states that Dr. de la Plaza's Government considers itself injured by the action of the British Commander and requests the revocation of the seizure and restoration of status quo ante.

About a hundred steerage passengers called yesterday at the Agency of the Hamburg Sud Amerika Line, Delfino Hnos., to ask the return of their passage money.

They were informed that the Agency could not return the money, as the fact and fault that the journey was not completed was not theirs. They advised the passengers to demand that the National Government should transport them to their respective destinations, or in default, pay them their passage money. This sounds like a heartless joke, and it is stated that some accepted this sage advice. On calling on the Foreign Minister they were told that Dr. Cantilo, the Sub-Secretary, would see them. He did so, but only to tell them that the Government would give them no help whatever beyond permitting their stay at the Hotel de Inmigrantes until they can find means to make another voyage.

The opinion has been expressed, many quarters. But there is an idealism in the American character that goes beyond immediate personal gains; an idealism that modern German materialism can never fathom. The spirit that freed the States from the stain of slavery, that made Cuba a Republic, that has prompted the education and eventual independence of the Philippines, still lives; the stern refusal to countenance the shady dealings of the hyphenated German-Americans proves it. That Argentina should feel sore at the apparent injury to her flag is natural, and her feelings should meet with tactful consideration at the hands of every Ally. But one is convinced that when the whole position is explained through the proper diplomatic channels, the cogent reasons that are ours, backed by the powerful example of the United States' attitude will mitigate the immediate bitterness, whilst it is not too much to prophesy that in all likelihood Britain will take immediate steps to heal the wound in a more material manner by providing such shipping facilities as the Southern trade undoubtedly needs.

says "El Diario," by several Radical Deputies that it is difficult to understand that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has actually been in possession for over a month of exact information of the intentions of the British Government in view of its altered outlook on the situation without attempting in any way to approach that Government or come to a friendly arrangement with them to avoid the troubles which have now materialised involving the Argentine flag in an unpleasant episode.

Having been aware of the British Government's expressed intention to take energetic measures and the critical conditions thereby created, it is considered that these vessels should not have been allowed to sail unprotected. Enquiries of an embittered nature are likely to be made in consequence, from the Foreign Relations Department owing to this entire inaction.

It is stated that neither Dr. de la Plaza nor Dr. Murature attribute any exaggerated importance to the affair, and the negotiations with London are being conducted in the usual calm and friendly manner, and through the customary channels. "El Diario" adds sarcastically, "Of course the Geese of the Capitol have begun to make their customary clamour, but the Executive is said not to be much impressed." Surely, surely, this cannot refer to the moderate and sapient "La Razón"?

For the transport of passengers and goods to Southern Ports, the Mihanovich Line have a number of steamers actually in movement; the Avellaneda Rawson, Pellegrini, and Madrid, are all sailing, and more can be put in if required. The Hamburg Sud Amerika boats were not the only pebbles on the Coasting Trade beach.

STORY OF THE CAPTURE.

Particulars related of the capture of the Presidente Mitre by the Orama state that the Orama signalled the ship to stop. The latter then showed the Argentine flag, which her funnel contradicted. A boat with two officers and 18 men all armed came smartly alongside. Some of them boarded the Mitre with the officers, who attached as prisoners 21 Germans of the steamer's crew who were taken to the Orama, leaving a prize party on board the ship with the officers. The latter collected the ship's papers, took all arms belonging to the officers and crew and closed the wireless room placing two sentries at the door, armed with Lee Enfields. The ship then turned and followed the cruiser, and next day, Monday, arrived off Montevideo. Lying about 4 miles off the port, the passengers and luggage were transferred to a tug. It is stated that great alarm existed among the women and children, who feared that the British intended to pursue the brutalities and ferocities of the Germans as in the case of the Lusitania. Nor were the fears of the more nervous dispelled until they were landed. The Salvation Army gave food and shelter to many of the third-class passengers when landed at Montevideo.

During the fifteen years of its existence, the Hamburg Sud Amerika branch to Southern ports has acquired a practical monopoly of trade, and has at different times run the following steamers:—Comodoro Rivadavia, Chubut, Rio Gallegos, Camarones, Tucuman, Columbus, Presidente Quintana, and Mendoza. The stranding of the Mendoza last year off Magates is still a fresh event; the Comodoro Rivadavia was lost in Bear Bay, and the disastrous burning of the Presidente Roca will be recollected as an event of about eight months ago.

SERVICES WITH THE SOUTH

In order to avoid as far as possible any inconvenience to the Southern Ports owing to the Mitre's capture and the immobilising of two other vessels of the same line, the Marine Minister has placed two Government transports on the route as temporary liners. These are the "Guardia Nacional" and the "10. de Mayo." The former will carry goods and mails between Buenos Aires and Rio Gallegos, calling at intermediate ports and taking general cargo, returning with local freight. The "10. de Mayo" will sail to and from Deseado, taking official cargo outwards and general goods homeward. The "Guardia Nacional" will begin her sailings early in January, and the "10. de Mayo" at the end of December. Freights will be on the old level before the increases made by the shipping company. The benefit of these sailings is the greater owing to the fact that the amounts of wool and hides awaiting carriage will be exceptionally heavy.

THE WINNEBAGO

LEAVES FOR THE ROADS.

The South Dock is more forlorn than ever. El Paraguayo has gone to La Plata, and now the Winnebago has gone, not to sea, for there prowls British cruisers sniffing after prey, but out to the roads. As no orders have arrived to sail for New York, and as it is understood that the U.S. Government is not inclined to send a warship to escort her, it has been decided that living where there are no dock dues to pay is cheaper than remaining in port.

"ALL GERMAN"

(To the Editor).

Sir,—Once again La Razón is out for a screech. What an indignity to the National colours, the pale blue and white horizontal stripes of Argentina?

In truth the local national flag has suffered an awful, an unforgivable indignity, and has suffered it for many years to the detriment of its own local shipping and by its own fault and neglect.

Now to explain. In some unknown manner, but by a means open locally to only too easy an explanation, this vessel, built in Germany in 1894, manned by Germans, was put under the Argentine flag and the crew all became, or mostly became, Argentines! but they did not lose by this purely commercial process their German nationality. This is notorious. Similarly the mere changing of the flag, and the name from Argentina to Presidente Mitre, leaving all else as before, did not change the nationality of the ship. She kept the same Funnel and the same house-flag of the H.S.D.G. (Hamburg-Sud-Americana-Dampfschiffahrts-Gesellschaft), head offices Holybrücke 3, Hamburg, Germany.

The Cap boats and many others belong to the same firm. When the Cap Trafalgar and others changed their funnels from black to yellow and then to white with a red top, the only similar funnel mark in existence, these Argentine! boats, still flying the H.S.D.G. flag on their mainmast heads, did likewise, following the orders from Hamburg.

The "insult" to the National flag consists in the flaunting this Hamburg flag and these Hamburg Company's funnels, in the faces of the Argentine officials who frequently board them and who can only discover anything Argentine in the name, the National flag, various rules and regulations they have caused to be put up and in the seals on their boiler safety valves. All else is German, and if the Argentine authorities have permitted this, it is clear that a British man-o-war is not going to be bound to allow a similar slight to be put upon her, by allowing to pass her, in derision a number of Germans on a German-built, German-owned and German-managed ship, simply because she hides her H.S.D.G. flag at sea, and sails only under the borrowed flag of Argentina. The vessel competes with local industry, her profits go home to Germany, her crew wages ditto, all that she uses comes from Germany (when it can) and now she will be condemned as a lawful prize and the sooner the local coasting trade is rid of the rest of them, the better for Argentina. As usual, La Razón is not in "the Right" and has no Razón to scream.

Yours, etc.,

"HISTORICUS."

U.S. SUBJECT'S COMPLAINT.

Washington, Nov. 26.

The Secretary of State has promised Mr. Chandler, Deputy for New York, to investigate the case of the New York citizen O'Connor, who declared in an affidavit filed at the Department of State that when he went to visit his property in Ireland, last October, he was held prisoner aboard the St. Louis while at Liverpool from October 24 to November 3. He was guarded by British soldiers and kept in confinement for several hours, no one being allowed to see him. Finally he was sent back to New York.

ROSARIO

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Rosario, Nov. 30.

The Tea Concert Programme.

In fulfilment of my promise of last week, I am now able to give the full programme arranged for the Tea Concert to be held at the Salon of the Savoy Hotel on Saturday next, in aid of the Christmas Fund for Soldiers and Sailors. The Rosario British Ladies' Committee, and especially Mrs. Spencer S. Dickson, are to be congratulated on their selection; there are few violinists in the country to hold the proverbial candle to Sr. Vidal, and the name of Madame Grandjean is one to conjure with. One thing the Committee do urge, and that is that those who attend will make every effort to be in their places punctually. The first notes of the "Perpetuum Mobile" are to be sounded at four sharp. During the interval between the two parts tea will be served in the smaller rooms adjoining the salon, and a list mentioning all who have helped in the provision of this item would be a lengthy one. The programme is as follows:

Piano, Perpetuum Mobile (Weber), Miss Florence Dean.

Song, a) "Those Azure Eyes," (Garnet W. Cox); b) "Unless," (Caracciolo), Mrs. Harper.

Recitation, "The Glory of the Garden," (Rudyard Kipling), Miss Hutchinson.

Song, a) "Air de Manon," (Massenet); b) "Chanson Revés," (Maurice Pesse), Madame Grandjean.

Dance, "Tarantella," (Compton-Duckworth), Miss Duckworth.

Recitation, "An Appeal," (Scots Greys), Miss Hutchinson.

Song, a) "June" (Roger Quilter); b) "Goodbye," (Tosti), Mrs. Harper.

Violin, a) Ballet, (Gluck-Vidal); b) Humoreske, (Dvorak); c) Reverie, (Schumann); d) Capriccio, (P. Vi-day), violin Sr. Pedro Vidal.

Song, a) "Le Nil," (Xavier Leroux); b) "Chant Hindou," (Bemberg), Madame Grandjean.

Dance, "The United Kingdom," (selected), Miss Duckworth.

God Save the King.

The accompaniments will be played by Sta. Alabern and Professor Donizetti. Tickets, $2, can be procured at 1222 Calle Urquiza, and at the British Consulate, 460 General Mitre. For tea, or other refreshments, a uniform charge of $1 will be made.

Gentlemen's Singles at the Plaza.

The final of the gentlemen's singles Class "A," at Plaza Jewell lay, as I mentioned in the HERALD of the 21st, between H. Talbot and G. Fritsch, who had beaten Manley and Naylor respectively in the semi-finals. The play for the final came off on Sunday, and an exciting game resulted in the honours going to Talbot.

Football Finalists Draw for Charity.

There was a great game at the Rosario Central's ground on Sunday, the proceeds of which were to go to the Fund for Officers' Widows and Families. The teams were San Isidro and Rosario Central, who had got into the finals in Buenos Aires and Rosario respectively. They lined out as follows: San Isidro—Wilson, goal; Bruno and Idiarte, backs; Olivari, Moroni and Badarecco, halves; E. Fernandez, J. Fernandez, Sayanes, Marini and Azra, forwards.

Rosario Central—R. Moyano goal; Z. Diaz and J. Rota backs; Perraza, Blanco and Rigotti, halves; Blanco, Laiolo, H. Hayes, E. Hayes and Bartieri, forwards.

There was a large attendance, and at four o'clock sharp Mr. J. P. Crouch kicked off. The first half was of a give and take order, in which strive as they might neither side could gain an advantage, and crossed over with bloodless toes. The game after the interval was characterised by more dash, and after some twenty-five minutes' play the visitors scored through their centre forward Soyanes. With only five minutes to go, H. Hayes made a splendid solo effort, and equalised, leaving a rdraw as a fitting result to an interesting game. The display of the homesters was the more creditable in view of the fact that on the previous day six of their number had been taking part in the final of the Ferro-Bancario League down in Buenos Aires, a match which the F.C.C.A. men won from the Central Cordoba team by four goals to nil.

The Markets.

Business in grain has been slow, and of small dimensions during this week; indeed not for several months has so small a movement been registered. Maize has met with small demand to fill old charters, and holders have done their best to maintain prices, but values have declined from $5 to $4.90, and some liquidation in the option market has been done at the same rates.

Wheat has steadied for new crop and values have recovered 15 to 20 cents for January, and 10 to 15 cents for February-March; but the trading is very narrow, and practically restricted to jobbers' operations, as neither are exporters buying, nor first hand sellers offering, both preferring to await developments. New Crop advices show the approach of harvest in this district, as being close at hand; indeed in several parts cutting has already begun. The plant samples of ripening wheat are showing well developed ears with full and plentiful grain. General opinion is inclined to anticipate one of the best crops reaped since that of 1907-1908. Fine harvesting weather is all that is now needed so that the good crops may be safely garnered.

The maize crop is coming on well, thanks to favourable weather; during the last day or two there has been a good rainfall, running to three or four inches in some districts.

Freights continue to be exceedingly scarce and dear. As much as 98s. 9d. has been paid for a steamer to load about December 20, which marks high water mark for up-river loading. The situation is an extremely difficult one to gauge.

St. Bartholomew's School: Concert and Sports.

I hope next week to give further particulars about the sports and concert which are to make the break up of St. Bartholomew's School for the Christmas vacation. The Sports will be held at Plaza Jewell on the 11th of December, and the concert at the School Hall on the 22nd.

Bishop Every's Visit.

Bishop Every spent a long week end in Rosario, arriving by the rapido on Thursday evening as the guest of the Rev. F. Middleton at St. Bartholomew's Parsonage.

On Friday evening he conducted a service of intercession at Alberdi Church, and afterwards held an informal reception, many people taking the opportunity of meeting him. Light refreshments were provided by the kindness of a number of lady members of the congregation.

On Saturday afternoon there was a reception at St. Bartholomew's Hall, amongst those present to meet the Bishop being Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, Mr., Mrs. and Miss Benedict, Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Every Miller, Mr., Mrs. G. J. Van Oppen and the Misses Van Oppen, Mr. and Mrs. Murray Hudson, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer S. Dickson, the Rev. F. Middleton, Miss Mangel, Miss Pride, Miss Seddon, the Rev. S. C. Deacon, Miss Gillbee, Miss Pegrum, Mrs. Roberts, Miss Studdert, Mr. and Mrs. Wittemore, Mr. and Mrs. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Parr, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Day, Mr. T. H. Marston, Mr. G. A. Middleton, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Lace, Mrs. Ricardo Le Bas, Mr. H. Spicer and others. Tea was provided by a number of ladies, and the afternoon passed very pleasantly.

On Sunday morning Bishop Every preached at St. Bartholomew's, there being an unusually large congregation. In the afternoon he went over to the Talleres Church, and whilst there expressed his appreciation of the manner in which the work was being carried on, and of the cordial feeling which exists between Mr. Deacon and the Church workers. At 6 p.m. Bishop Every was again at Alberdi, where a service was held in English. It was of unusual interest from the fact that the Bishop took the opportunity of licensing Mr. Deacon for work in the Argentine Chaco, and also as temporary chaplain of San Pedro. In the course of a short and impressive address he spoke of the hardships of work in the Chaco, and how after the arduous life up there a term of leave was a very real necessity. It was mentioned that Mr. Deacon would be leaving for that region in March next.

Finally Bishop Every held a service in Spanish which was exceedingly well attended, the members of the Spanish congregation being greatly pleased at this opportunity of showing how much they esteem and regard him.

Afterwards the Bishop caught the night train down to Buenos Aires.

Fire on a Steamer.

The British steamer "Ariadne" arrived in Rosario at the latter end of last week with a cargo of case oil, and proceeded alongside the wharf to discharge. Yesterday morning about nine o'clock the master was advised by telephone that fire had broken out on board. The fire brigade was summoned, by the time it arrived the fire had been got under. The seat of the outbreak was in one of the lifeboats amidships, over the officers' apartments. It is not probable that the fire was caused by sparks from the funnel or the galley chimney, for both were netted in; and a possible solution is that one of the drivers of the electric overhead crane may have thrown a careless match on to the vessel. One other suggestion presents itself, but I dismiss it as unlikely!

The Presidente Mitre.

The case of the "Presidente Mitre" has been the talk of everybody all day. One cannot forget that it was on a sister ship that one of innumerable champagne banquets to celebrate the sinking of the "Lusitania" was held. It is I believe capable of proof that officers and crew alike of the "P. Mitre" were but very thinly veneered with the varnish of Argentine nationality, and she and the other vessels of the company flew the familiar house flag of the Hamburg South American flag as soon as they were on the high seas. Their courtesy to interned enemy vessels, again, had little enough of the neutral in it.

Spring Tennis Tournament, Cordoba A.C.

The finals of the Men's Doubles furnished some very good tennis on last Sunday afternoon, at the Cordoba A.C. courts when the two "minus 40" teams, Morton and Zimmer v. Marks and Babb met to settle who was the strongest team. The first set was won by Morton and Zimmer 6-1, Marks and Babb as usual not getting under "full steam" at the start. The second set found Marks and Babb getting into their stride, and they won a well played 6-4. In the third set Marks and Babb continued play stronger, while their opponents seemed to fall off to some extent, the score being 6-3 in favour of Marks and Babb. The final set was easily won by Marks and Babb, Mar-ton and Zimmer only winning two games, the fourth and deciding set therefore being won by Marks and Babb 6-2, and the match by 3-1, the Club "Champs" thereby retaining their title as the strongest men's double team. Eddie Marks was in his best form and his tennis was of the "first water," his driving and placing was a treat to watch, his partner Louis Babb played his usual strong game at the net, stopping the swift returns of Zimmer time after time, the team play of the winners was up to their customary standard, and is no doubt responsible for their popular win. Miss Gladys Symonds was successful in her match against Miss Gladys Guppy, and she well deserved her fine win, considering the points which she was obliged to concede her opponent. Next Saturday afternoon it is hoped that the final of the Mixed Doubles will be played between Mrs. Walters and Mr. Morton v. Miss Florence Morton and Mr. Zimmer, and also the match between Miss Glancy and Miss Gladys Symonds. The Tennis Committee are desirous of completing the present tournament which has been underway now for some weeks and request the players who have uncompleted matches to play to appear at the courts this coming week end in order that the remaining matches may be played.

Visit of the Villa Devoto Tennis Club to this City.

The Villa Devoto Tennis Team in charge of Mr. Theo. Macdonald, will leave Buenos Aires on next Friday night for Cordoba, where a series of matches will be played against the Cordoba A.C. Four teams of two men each will represent Villa Devoto: Messrs. Macdonald, Kirby, Newell, Tarver, Tebbutt, Reeves and Johnston are included in the team. The Cordoba A.C. line up will be as follows: Marks and Babb, Morton and Zimmer, Dunbar and Schultz, Struthers and Schiber, with Ferguson and Parker suplentes. It is expected that an all day match of singles and doubles will take place on Sunday, Dec. 5, the visiting team returning to Buenos Aires on the Sunday night train. This is the first time in five years that a visiting team has played tennis in Cordoba against the local Athletic Club, and consequently a great deal of interest is being manifested in the coming "interprovincial" contest.

Sale of Work, Sports and Garden Tea in aid of English Church Building Fund.

At the meeting held at the English Club, last week, of the Committee appointed to arrange the sports for the Sale of Work and Garden Tea to be held at the Cordoba A.C. grounds, on Wednesday, Dec. 8, at 4 p.m., the following gentlemen were present:—Messrs. Rev. Sugden, Dunbar, Babb, Lang, Fowler and Walters. The Rev. Sugden, was elected Chairman, and Mr. L. G. Babb, Honorary Secretary and Treasurer. It was decided to have the following programme of sports for adults and children: Flat Race, Three Legged Race, Blind Driving, Skipping Race, Whistling Race, Hopping Race, Thread and Needle Race, Potato and Spoon Race, Marking the Pig's eye, Sack Race, Hunt the Prize, Tug of War for Ladies and also for Men, Married against Single in each event, Consolation Race, etc. Mr. Fowler was appointed starter, and Messrs. Dunbar, Lang and Sugden, judges; Messrs. Babb and Walters, stewards. Many excellent prizes have already been given. It is hoped that sufficient entries will be received to run off all the events on the programme. The entrance fee, including all sports will be very moderate, $1 for adults and $0.50 for children under 15 years of age. Miss Lilly Robinson will have charge of the garden tea assisted by Miss Doris Robinson, Miss Florence Morton, Miss Gladys Guppy, Miss Blanche Guppy, Miss Phyllis Davis and Miss Gracie Baxter, Mrs. Sugden, Mrs. Babb, Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Dunbar, Mrs. Guppy, and all the ladies who are assisting in the needlework, will help in the selling of the articles which have been prepared for sale.

AT ST. JOHN'S PRO-CATHEDRAL

November 30

Yesterday being St. Andrew's Day—a day which through long custom has been universally observed as the Church Missionary Festival—a meeting had been arranged to take place at St. John's Hall, which had as its object a plea for the Zenanas and the Society of the Propagation of the Gospel. The chair was taken by the Right Rev. Bishop Every, D.D., and amongst those present on the platform were Sir Reginald Tower, C.V.O., K.C.M.G. (British Minister in the Argentine), Mr. H. G. Mackie (H.B.M. Consul General), Miss Gregson, the Rev. Canon Stevenson, H. W. Brady, Morrey Jones, Dr. Mulcahy and others.

At the commencement a hymn was sung and Dr. Every then rose and spoke concerning the presence of Sir Reginald Tower and pointed out what was the attitude of responsible Governments towards the missions and missionary works. Governments could not aid missionary work financially, but they could be fair to it and responsible Government work had much to do with responsible missionary work.

Continuing his remarks the Bishop said it was a public belief that Christian servants in native countries were unreliable.

The contrary was really the case and a story concerning the refusal of Indian troops in the South African war to accept their pay was told. Their loyalty was uppermost.

The Church people who gave to the Missions had a right to criticise and this they did, but it must be remembered that the criticism was levelled against the organisation not against the works and its objects.

Bishop Every then introduced the lecturers who followed.

Miss Gregson who has lately come to this city from a tour in the Holy Land after having done invaluable work amongst the northern colliers of England, had much of interest to say concerning her Holy Land experiences. She told of Nazareth and of the journey to Jerusalem and the mountains of Moah and word painted a picture of the whole, of the atmosphere and of the indescribable feeling of something expected. Miss Gregson called it "The Land of Waiting." She spoke of down trodden Jews and told how Jerusalem was to-day in German hands. It had been denied that they had fortified the Mount of Olives, but she believed this true.

The streets were full of Germans, St. George's Church was sealed up and what had become of the little Christian children she did not know.

This interesting lecture was followed by one from the Rev. J. Morrey Jones on the "Chaco Tribes."

Three years spent in the Paraguayan Chaco had taught the lecturer that the expression that "everything is beautiful in the country except man" could be reversely translated. Mr. Morrey Jones explained that the natives were children but not fools, that they were fettered with religious custom, by witchcraft and the like which had to be fought and the process was a long one. He told many amusing stories. A picture were shewn to a native, of an angel. The native could not accept it because the wings grew out of the back instead of the shoulders. They were not fools.

It was 18 years before medical work was commenced after the original start and when it was explained that the native had religious prejudices against milk, beef, tea and the like, it could be understood what their original difficulties were.

Once the lecturer saw some natives milking a goat. They had the animal on it back four of them were employed one each to a leg the other was milking (?) it.

He told also of a patient with double pneumonia who was being treated by mustard plasters and how these were torn off with the man saying they were cooking his inside.

The native believed that death was a spirit and that it floated about the air after the person was dead and that if it could not get warm it entered the body of another person. Death was an evil spirit. This accounted for the natives burning up everything after a death and the lecturer drew attention to hospital difficulties when a death had occurred there.

Most amusing was the account of nicknames given to people.

The natives were liars and believed if they lied "big" enough that there was no lie, because no one could be deceived. They were particularly agreeable to people and this led to many lies for the sake of being so.

How a native who had "fishy" hands before assisting Mrs. Stirling (the first lady to visit the country) out of a boat, wrapt his hand in the cloth used around his head, only shewed how they were not fools. A story of suicide by forcing a rattlesnake to bite due to grief for the loss of a wife also elucidated the native character.

The natives had paper money, a cow portrayed represented one value, a horse or an elephant other values. They could not count, at least above 20 and that was an awful process such as so many figures one hand so many toes here, pass to the other hand 3 toes etc. etc., which ultimately might equal some figure!

This most interesting and humorous lectured on "The Eastern adoption of peal for help. Another hymn was sung and a collection, which amounted to $150 taken before Dr. Mulcahy lecturer on "The Eastern adoption of Western civilisation and its logical Deductions" and the lecture concluded after reference to the war with the impressive words that we should have much from God who had done much for God.

Canon Stevenson then gave a short address and spoke of missionary work in Uganda and how the natives had promised a subscription of £10,000 towards their new Cathedral. A pleasing overseas connection between St. George's College, Quilmes, and of Jerusalem was mentioned and after a suggestion that two books "Unknown People in Unknown Lands" and the "Church in the Wilds" should be read by all as most interesting and instructive works, the Missionary festival was brought to a close by the singing of the Doxology.

GRAVEYARD BANDIT

ARREST OF A CEMETERY PROWLER.

The police are entertaining at Comisaria 40, a person named Francisco Marco or De Marco, although he has a large selection of aliases to choose from, who formerly exercised the profession of cochero in which he may have acquired a taste for highway robbery by extortion of unjust fares.

He is considered a very dangerous character as no less than 33 cases of robbery with violence, common theft or fraud, with convictions for carrying unlawful weapons have been recorded against him. His speciality seems to have been a ghoul like propensity for frequenting cemeteries where among the winding paths, monuments and funeral yews, it was his use to stick up and terrorise stray mourners or individuals whose appearance bespoke timidity and the possession of portable property. He was arrested on November 21 after failing in an enterprise of this nature. Dr. Luna Olmos has him in charge and will probably restrain his activities for some time to come.

LEGALIZED ROBBERY

Impunity of Fraudulent Traders

ANOTHER STRIKING EXAMPLE

(Exclusive to THE HERALD)

On many and various occasions of late, THE HERALD, following in this respect the salutary example of La Prensa, has dedicated considerable space to the question of the actual results obtained from the Argentine Bankruptcy Law as it stands to-day. The fact that trade is mending, and the heavy failure lists of 1914 fortunately not being continued in the current year is in some quarters regarded as warranting the belief that the urgent need for reform in this matter of commercial legislation has passed.

This is not the case. In fact, expressing what must perforce be but a merely personal opinion, fraudulent practices among a certain class of traders are on the increase. If a digression be permitted, the fact that the cheque, one of the most useful instruments of credit, is being more and more used as a medium for the commission of what one may term incipient fraud, is an index of the laxity of mind characteristic of the lower class trader. If it were not for the intense individualism that characterises all business here, one might attempt to compile a list of the number and amount of cheques returned from bank to bank, or through the Clearing House. The sum in dollars would not be striking; the number one ventures to predict would be—in any other country—an immediate call for the imposition of a stringent law protecting the viability of the cheque.

Bad Management and Fraud.

In many cases bad management begets fraud. It is too often forgotten that the lower class retail trader here and in the camp is nowadays under greater temptation to carry on his business on lines that will infallibly lead to loss unless affairs have his personal attention every day in the year. The abuse of credit has become ingrained, and will not be driven out in a day. It therefore becomes the easiest thing in the world to meet a proximate payment to the wholesale house by selling off some merchandise in stock, usually through the agency of an auction house or broker. There is no getting the trader to see that actually this is an immoral act prejudicial both to his creditors, and, ultimately, to himself. It is but the first step that counts. Carry on the system and you get a case such as that portrayed in the frequent returns of the courts, wherein, when payment eventually stops, the creditors get nothing.

Some few days ago THE HERALD drew attention to a case in Cordoba Province, wherein ordinary creditors for close on a quarter of million dollars got nothing. Only the liquidator and the lawyers were paid, but that is another story. Complete impunity is the lot of the partners in the firm in question, notwithstanding that the liquidator in his report stated that the major portion of the merchandise had been abstracted, fictitious credits figured in the books, and unreasonable sums attached as mortgages to such real estate as existed. In the words of the liquidator, "it is regrettable that justice does not punish these deeds, indeed I will go farther, and say, these premeditated robberies." Yet Justice sits with folded hands and does nothing.

A Turkish Triumph. Assets $221.25, Liabilities $133,616.15.

Admittedly the Turkish trader is the most barefaced offender against commercial morality. He is in many cases "out for blood" from the moment he lands in this country and gets credit from one of his countrymen to the extent of a pack of goods. If he is shortsighted and fails to meet his liabilities in those early days, it is a case as a rule of "dog eat dog." Such cases are however rare; there are means, not of the courts, whereby the wholesaler prevents such disasters. It is when the business has grown, a house in the centre been taken, a camp store or so started, that the infidel wholesaler is brought in and despoiled. Such a case is now being quoted in the commercial press. A Turkish firm, the name of one of the partners, Cassim, being strangely reminiscent of the Arabian Nights (Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves? Ed. B.A.H.) domiciled in this city, called a meeting of their creditors in October 1914. Their balance sheet showed: Assets $94,102.13 against Liabilities $136,616.15. They arranged with their creditors on the basis of a payment of 40 per cent. spread over a year and a half. None of the said payments have been made, and the creditors, on taking the case to the courts find that the Assets have fallen to the infinitesimal sum that heads this paragraph. The official accountant appointed by the courts to intervene qualifies the failure as culpable and fraudulent. There the matter rests for the present. Being Turks, they may, if arrested, be sentenced to a term of imprisonment. It is to be hoped so at any rate. But such harsh measures are very, very, rare, as the Cordoba case aforementioned serves to show. The point of the actual example is that the first presentation to the courts also showed clear evidence of irregular trading, and until this can be penalised in time, the unscrupulous man will continue to rob the confiding under the guise of commercial operations, well knowing that even if the worst comes to the worst, he can always be certain of getting the fruits of his robbery safely stowed away long before the law can touch him. Nay more, by adopting the bold course of invoking the law as his protector by calling a meeting of creditors, he paralyses all their efforts to control his ultimate moves, and he may figuratively and literally, if he so chooses, cart off his creditors' merchandise before their very eyes, and expose it for sale with a very fair chance of being able to get away with part, if not the whole, of the proceeds obtained. There is room for reform.

MATTO GROSSO CONCESSION

THE PURCHASE BY ARGENTINE SYNDICATE.

The Brazilian Press has been much exercised over the acquisition of a large tract of land in the State of Matto Grosso by a syndicate of Argentine capitalists. The Deputy for that State, Dr. Anibal Toledo, said in Congress that the matter really only concerned a transfer of lands in exchange for a previous concession, by the State Government.

Deputy Barbosa Lima also who first brought the matter up in Congress on account of the publicity and comment made on the affair, stated that there was nothing out of the ordinary in the whole business. Such transactions were quite common in States which are being for the first time exploited and parcelled out and that if there be any regrettable feature in the case it is the evident proof furnished that the Brazilians neglect the colonisation of their own territories, either through sheer incapacity or negligence. The Gazeta das Noticias has also dealt largely with the affair deprecating the unjustified excitement imported into it. Señor Toledo says that the sale was authorised by the late Baron Rio Branco, a proof that it involves no political perils. Being virgin soil in an entirely savage state it was sold at the very low figure of 500 reis per hectarea, with a total extension of 1,000,000 hectares. Much of the concession will never be of great value consisting of pools and marsh along the Paraguay.

Patient and chivalrous,
They are so dear to us,
God save our men!

TOBACCO FOR THE TROOPS

SEAFARERS AND THE WAR.

Another good meeting of the Seafarers' Tobacco Fund was held on Nov. 26 at the Seamen's Mission, Mr. A. G. Pruden being in the chair. In addition there were present: Captain Harrison, Supt., Houlder Bros.; Captain Humphries, Supt., Lamport and Holt; Captain Lewin, Supt., Houston Line; Rev. H. W. Brady, Hon. Treasurer; Mr. Cowan, Chief Engineer, s.s. Voltaire; Mr. Evans, Purser, s.s. Voltaire; Mr. Macaulay, Chief Engineer, Neutral ship; Mr. J. Gall, Supt. Engineer, Nelson Line; Mr. Neilson, Wilfred Deacon and Co.; Mr. R. F. Willis, Chief Engineer s.s. Hyperia; Mr. L. F. Keady, Chief Engineer s.s. Hesperides; and Mr. F. E. Beatty, Hon. Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved, after which the Reverend and Honorary Treasurer proceeded to collect the takings for the week. These were found to be so gratifyingly large as to amount to more than double the average results, the exact figures being $777.75, a record week, and bringing the total up to $4931.82. This amount is cause for legitimate pride on the part of all concerned. The result of the collection from the various ships stand:—

S.S. Commonwealth	$98.00
S.S. Hyantes	106.50
S.S. Hostilius	13.00
(Second collection; first realised $180)
S.S. Asiatic Prince	119.30
S.S. Highland Scot	41.30
(Engineering Dept. only)
S.S. Vestris	117.00
S.S. Plutarch	80.60
S.S. Saxon Prince	23.00
S.S. Brodholme	29.00

The thanks of the meeting were voted to the Engineers of the Voltaire and conveyed by Mr. Cowan, the "First" there present, for their remarkably generous efforts.

It having been decided to send £100 worth to Salonika (in place of Gallipoli) on the motion of Captain Lewin, seconded by Rev. Mr. Brady, it was formally resolved that this should be authorised by cable, with the inscription on the card attached to every packet, "A Christmas Present to Soldiers from Sailors." There are still some lists to come in, and Mr. Willis stated that the Hyperia's contribution would materialise by Monday evening. It was mentioned that Mr. F. Chevalier Boutell had kindly offered $100 towards the Christmas package proposal, and it was resolved that his generous offer should be accepted, although he is not a seafarer, on which ground a similar kind offer by Mr. A. G. Pruden had been scrupulously declined.

In conclusion Mr. Pruden congratulated the meeting on the fine results achieved, hoped they might be continued, and that another good meeting would take place next week.

RIVER PLATE AEROPLANES

THE CHRISTENING CEREMONY

Unique and pleasant was a brief ceremony performed on November 27 at the rooms in Cangallo, of the British Society in the Argentine. The occasion was one of importance, and was mellowed by just the touch of seriousness and the true sincerity fitting to the all important formality of drinking the health of the Aeroplane River Plate No. 1.

At 3 p.m. yesterday (English time) Mrs. Ord Marshall, the Honorary Secretary of the League of Empire, christened the aeroplane presented by Britons in the Argentine, at Farnborough; and at 11 a.m. (Argentine time), which time corresponded with the English christening, a number of gentlemen gathered together at the British Society's rooms and drank a sincere God-speed to the aircraft.

Not only did the occasion mark this alone, but it marked another important thing, that was the arrival in England by cablegram of a sum sufficient to supply River Plate Aeroplane No. 2.

The ceremony simple and sincere was presided over by Mr. A. G. Pruden, the President of the British Society, who punctually to the time addressed a few words to those present.

Apologising for the unavoidable absence of Sir Reginald Tower, H.M. British Minister, who regretted his inability to be present, Mr. Pruden explained the occasion on which all had gathered together for the purpose of wishing good luck to the aeroplane and her crew. He said that one night in Belgrano there was a talk of a warship fund being opened, when Mr. Plowright, who was amongst those assembled, suggested an aeroplane. Then and there the idea was enthusiastically adopted, and, since first mooted, subscriptions had flowed in up to over $42,000, and comprised those ranging from ten cents to $3000. He had specially to mention Mr. Drabble for his magnificent donation of $3000, the Western Railway for their fine subscription list, Mr. Blomefield, and Mr. Foster also.

Mr. Pruden read a letter from Mr. Herbert Gibson offering his congratulations and the advice—"Don't stop at two, make it three," but, Mr. Pruden said, it was no good flogging a willing horse, and that they had for the time being decided to close the lists. The money for a second aeroplane had been telegraphed so as to coincide with the christening of the first. They were still a little short in the amount, which they had anticipated receiving, and therefore they telegraphed the money.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Pruden, "I offer you the toast of 'Mr. Mackie; the Aeroplane River Plate No. 1, and the brave crew that man her.'"

The toast was drunk heartily.

Mr. H. G. Mackie, H.B.M. Consul-General replied briefly, saying he regretted the absence of Sir Reginald Tower, and spoke of the remarkable response to the idea of an aeroplane. He wished the British Society in the Argentine every success and prosperity, and thanked all for the toast of his health, and said, with Mr. Herbert Gibson, that they should not stop at two, but go for three aeroplanes.

Mr. Andrew M. Wilson spoke of the work done by Mr. Pruden, and asked all present to drink his good health. The President of the Society replied, and suggested that the real thanks were due to Mr. Plowright, the originator of the scheme, whose health he accordingly proposed.

Mr. Plowright, in his reply, suggested that all the work had fallen upon the shoulders of Mr. W. Watson, and that without him he could not say where they would have been.

Each one of those present might wish to be at home, but everyone cannot be, but that all could remember that although so far away, they could do their little bit here. He suggested not one nor two, but a fleet of aeroplanes in time to come.

Mr. Watson was called upon for a reply.

"I am busy collecting money," he said.

The meeting then broke up.

FAMOUS AMBULANCE TRAIN

The Caledonian Railway Company have constructed an ambulance train on the order of the War Office for service in France. It is the last word in up to date arrangements. It has been on view at various centres and has attracted over a quarter of a million people. The admission was one shilling and the Railway Company announce that the admissions have resulted in £13,255 being available for distribution amongst the local branches of the Red Cross Society. There is only one word to describe the efforts being made at home for Red Cross Work and the word is "magnificent." St. Andrew's Society of the River Plate realise that it is the duty of Scots here to back up the home efforts and to this end have bracketed an appeal for funds for Scottish Red Cross work with the usual appeal for funds to carry on the Benevolence of the Society locally. The members of the Society—as was expected—have responded most generously, and the Hon. Treasurer is kept busy endorsing cheques. His address is Avenida de Mayo 761.

VICTORIA SAILOR'S HOME

November 27

Miss Winifred M. Common had arranged a most attractive programme for the Sailors' Home concert last night, and this was added to by the success with which the concert obtained.

Miss M. Wilkinson's playing on the violoncello was greatly appreciated, and she played both tastefully and well. Miss Elena Rau and her singing attracted lively encores, and she was constantly recalled. She possesses a very pleasing voice, and her choice of songs was most suitable. Miss M. Griffin was another lady whose singing was thoroughly appreciated.

Miss A. Estella is a brilliant young lady pianist, and played a Rondo Brillante exceedingly well.

Mr. Common was the humourist of the evening, and an attractive trio was another good item.

"Three Old Maids of Lea," by the Misses Reynolds and Miss Griffin was most amusing. With masks on the back of their heads, they reversed the order of things, and sang backwards-way on. The effect was most humorous, and received an encore.

Miss Common throughout the evening was the accompanist, and is to be congratulated on her efforts, and upon an excellent programme which was as follows:—

Part I.

Piano duet, "Le Jet d'Eau," Miss R. Common and Miss R. Bell.

Song, "Little Grey Home in the West," encore "Sympathy," Miss M. Griffin.

Cello solo, "Consolation," Miss Wilkinson.

Song, "Little Annie Rooney," encore "Loch Lomond," Miss Elena Rau.

Song, "Ailsa Mine" and "Up from Somerset," Mr. Stanley Parker.

Violin, piano and cello, "The Daughter of the Regiment," (repeated), Miss M. Wilkinson, Miss M. Common, and Miss H. Wilkinson.

Humorous song, "Watching the people pop in" and "When Irish Eyes are Smiling," Mr. C. Common.

Interval for refreshments.

Part II.

Piano solo, "Rondo Brillante," Miss A. Estella.

Song, "Where my caravan has rested," encore "Absent," Miss M. Griffin.

Trio, "Trot du Cavalrie," Misses Wilkinson and Common.

Song, "Roses" and "Jock of Hazledene," Miss Elena Rau.

Vocal trio, "Three Old Maids of Lea" (repeated), Misses Reynolds and Miss Griffin.

Cello solo, "Serenata Braga," encore "Chant d'Amour," Miss M. Wilkinson.

Humorous song, "Are we downhearted?" Mr. C. Common.

National Anthem.

ANOTHER MURDER

RESULT OF AN UNCLICKED

CUB'S IMPUDENCE.

So frequent are murders in lodging-houses and their environs that the Press might almost keep a heading permanently set up on "Bloody deeds in Conventillos."

At Garibaldi 2025 lived Salvador Cutinano, married, aged 36, who went to remonstrate with a neighbour, Salvador Arzeano, whose son had thrown missiles striking him in the fact.

Not only was his remonstrance ill-received, but Arzeano and his brothers Francisco and Carmelo attacked him, and another ruffian, Domingo Benicci, came against him with a huge knife which he plunged into Cutinano, causing instant death. He then turned on the brothers of Cutinano, but was disarmed, and is in the hands of the police. The report naively adds that "the knife has been confiscated."

A LONDON LETTER

TO THE BRITISH PATRIOTIC COMMITTEE IN URUGUAY

LONDON, Oct. 25, 1915.

Carson and the Cabinet.

If changes in the British Cabinet were to be brought about, it was natural that they should begin with the resignation of Sir Edward Carson. From the formation of the Coalition Government this distinguished lawyer has been out of sympathy with his colleagues. He himself knew that this would be so from the beginning. It was his first experiment in Cabinet co-partnership, and yet he was expected by his friends to be able to associate in daily official intimacy with men with whom he had long been on the worst of political terms. When asked to join the Cabinet he declined to do so and only yielded under extraordinary pressure. It is now recognised that he was right in declining, and that his friends were wrong in persuading him to accept. At the same time when Sir Edward Carson was induced to join the Government his fellow-countryman and great political adversary, Mr. John Redmond, was also offered office. Fortunately Mr. Redmond was strong enough to resist the entreaties of those who desired to see him imitate his rival's example. Accordingly he has remained outside the Government, and from this detached position has been enabled to give support to Mr. Asquith far more powerful than any that he could have rendered as a colleague.

The Value of Independence.

Doubtless Sir Edward Carson has been impressed by the contrast between his own position as a Minister, and that of the Nationalist leader as an independent auxiliary. In a Cabinet of twenty-one members only a few individuals can expect to command the public attention, while the majority if loyal to the disciplinary traditions of their office, must be content to perform their duties in silence. As Attorney-General Sir Edward Carson was in one of the silent posts, and as he is a man with a strong sense of duty it probably never occurred to him that he might remain a minister and yet take part with his old freedom in the general controversies of the time. By resigning he has regained his freedom, but now that he has done so it is by no means certain that he will continue to be attracted by the magnet of controversy. For one thing he is a passionate supporter of the policy of fight to a finish—a principle on which Irish Unionists and Irish Nationalists are quite as united as are all sections of Englishmen, Scotsmen and Welshmen. If there have been differences between himself and his colleagues concerning the war they have been caused by the ex-Minister's eagerness for a more aggressive war policy, certainly not by any weakening of his faith in the justice and coming success of the Allies cause. Probably it will be found that he will be a greater help to the Cabinet as an outside supporter than his strongly marked idiosyncrasies permitted him to be as an actual colleague. Such, at all events, is Sir Edward Carson's own opinion.

The Coalition.

On the general question of differences in the British Cabinet, it may be observed that there is a curious tendency on the part of critics to apply to the present highly composite Government the stringent rules of etiquette and convention applicable to normally constituted or homogeneous Governments. Indeed it is obvious that even Ministers though they are known to be acutely divided on almost every question of ordinary domestic politics, consider themselves under an obligation to maintain an appearance of absolute intellectual unity. This is a fallacious doctrine and it has the effect when differences are not to be suppressed of giving a false impression of fundamental disagreement. Thus we have the paradox of Sir Edward Carson proclaiming quite truly that the nation and its rulers were never more united than now in a common resolve to prosecute the war to a victorious conclusion, and yet at the same time announcing his resignation from the Government because of a scruple concerning some point of strategical detail. In a Coalition, which, as the name implies, necessarily embodies a wide diversity of opinion, there is no need for such pedantry. To the English mind, familiar in normal times with the theory of collective Cabinet responsibility, and with its fastidious interpretation by individual Ministers, such incidents may seem of little account, whereas to the foreign observer they may quite conceivably suggest all sorts of inferences, usually not less erroneous than portentous.

Murder of Nurse Cavell.

Great political effects, using the term in its largest sense are likely to follow from the death of Nurse Cavell. It would be impossible to exaggerate the depth of the horror, anger and grief, caused in every part of the United Kingdom, by this tragic event. Since the sinking of the Lusitania the war has seen no more tremendous revulsion of feeling. Presumably the perpetrators of the "execution," as it is called, imagined themselves to be acting in the ordinary course of judicial routine, though this is a difficult assumption in view of the energetic and impassioned representations to the German authorities by the Spanish and American Ministers on behalf of the martyred woman. Whether or not the sanction of German military legality may be pleaded for the deed is irrelevant. In this country, and apparently in every neutral country as well, mankind feels itself outraged as if some incredible and monstrous affront had been put upon the most elementary instinct of human relationship. Morally, therefore, Miss Cavell's death has become one of the landmarks of the war, denoting a new phase in the temper at once of German militarism and of the civilisation to which this final challenge has been delivered.

Kitchener's Army.

Before many days are over the magnitude of Germany's blunder—to use the only argument that she herself would consider pertinent—will be manifest throughout the world.

Other causes too, are operating to swell the numbers of Lord Kitchener's reserves. A profound impression has been caused by the King's letter appealing for as many men as may be required to finish the war. Prophets have no doubt that the response will be adequate, as indeed the replies to all previous demands of the kind have always been, for it is perhaps worth emphasising that there has been no failure so far in the reception given to any special recruiting appeal. What makes the King's letter particularly interesting is its reliance on the voluntary principle, and its acknowledgment of the miraculous results already obtained under that system. There is a general feeling that the miracle is not yet exhausted.

CANADIAN APPLES

From Mr. B. S. Webb, the Canadian Trade Commissioner, THE HERALD has received samples of apples taken from a consignment of several thousand cases which Mr. George Brougham has just received from British Columbia. The quality of the fruit is perfect, and once more is demonstrated the fact that properly packed and handled Canadian apples can be brought to this market in prime condition. The fruit must command a ready and profitable sale. There could be only one difficulty—given that the apples are of prime quality and are landed in perfect condition—and that is in the way of marketing them. In the hands of Mr. Brougham, who knows the market thoroughly, this difficulty, is however, negligible.

GARDEN FETE AT ROSARIO

$ 5,000 FOR OFFICERS WIDOWS AND FAMILIES FUND

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Rosario, Nov. 23.

The Garden Fete and Bazaar at "La Quinta" this week-end will rank as the social event of the season in this part of the world, and as an outstanding success viewed in the light of its premier object, that of helping forward the Fund for Officers' Widows and Families. In war time numbers of men accrue to the officer class, who in normal times would not have the means to belong to it; they feel compelled by their sense of duty to assume a status which they are not really in a position to support, and in the event of their being killed or disabled, their dependents are only too often left in circumstances of peculiar distress. The Fund is a recognised channel through which relief is being organised, and one feels specially grateful—in view of the large proportion of men from Argentina who now hold commissions—that Mrs. J. P. Crouch and the ladies who seconded her efforts should have provided such an opportunity for discharging something of our debt to our officers.

There was room for everything and everybody.

The stalls, four in number, were well supplied with articles a long way removed from the usual. Mrs. Dickson Miss Gay and Miss Dover had charge of the Fancy Stall; Mrs. P. Deakin and Mrs. B. Lee ensnared the children with a tempting display of toys, many of which had been made by Mr. Harold Deakin in the shape of wheelbarrows, hand trucks, and exact models of carts of various kinds; Mrs. A. Martin and Mrs. C. H. Montgomery put up a fairly powerful opposition with sweets of the toothsome variety that is male at home, leavened by a number of sundry articles which went to make the name of Miscellaneous Stall; and Mrs. R. W. O. Le Bas, Mrs. H. F. Talbot and Mrs. A. G. Krell offered a large assortment of children's clothing, most of which came from the Fisherton Ladies' Work Party. Celoid fish and other aquatic and amphibious creatures rose readily to nets hired out by Messrs. W. H. Dilrew and H. W. Tyrrell; and the bran-pie had been split up into two, after the fashion of a cell in the evolution of animal organisms, the Girls' and Boys' tubs, attended respectively by Miss Johnston and Miss Baillie. Mr. H. Deakin drove a thriving trade in coconuts, Mr. Hindell had arranged for frog races. Mr. Gillespie encouraged marksmanship, and Master Norman Baillie peeped into the future with an ingenious doll as medium. A useful contribution to the proceeds came from the gaming table run by Mr. D. O. Le Bas—one only of his many activities towards the general success of the venture.

The tea tables were attended by Mrs. Murray Hudson, Miss Barnes, Miss D. Robinson, Mrs. J. H. Smith, Mrs. H. Gerard Smith, Miss Smith, Mrs. Ryberg, Miss A. M. Gillbee, Miss Studdert, Miss M. Van Oppen, Miss E. Van Oppen, and Mrs. Berry. Other helpers included Miss Benedict, Miss N. Le Bas, Miss Manley, Miss Garside, Miss Knight, Florence Van Horne, Inez Lace, Clare Lace, Chummie Bowlin, Muriel Dean, N. Baillie, and Noreen Clarke; and mention must also be made of the Boy Scouts under Capt. Story, who with the faculty for making themselves useful highly developed, yielded a deal of unostentatious service. Another useful function was that fulfilled by Mr. Drake at the parcelling booth.

The Police Band, under the conductorship of Capt. Sant Angelo, attended on both afternoons, and rendered a series of familiar airs, in which "Tipperary" recurred at such frequent intervals as to make one suppose it now ranks with our Allies as being our most typical feat in modern music. Which, of course, it is.

SPORTS AND COMPETITIONS

The children's sports took place on the opening afternoon, and provided plenty of work for the Stewards, Messrs. C. H. Montgomery, Hy. Talbot, R. W. O. Le Bas and H. Atkinson, and various other gentlemen who assisted. They also provided a huge amount of fun for the little ones, and of pleasure to the children of larger growth who looked on. The sports were supplemented by donkey rides and drives in the pony carriage, arrangements for which were in the hands of Mr. J. Rowley; and for the babies there was a goat chaise drawn by two puzzled animals which had been trained by Señor Anisetti, who was kindness itself to the little ones.

Mrs. Spencer S. Dickson distributed the prizes, all of which had been bought at the Toy Stall, and was rewarded with cheers and a neatly turned word of thanks from Mr. C. C. Cox.

Appended is a list of the awards: Flat race finals, Girls under 9.—1st, Kathleen Dean; 2nd, Joan Lee.

Flat race finals, Girls over 9.—1st, Constance Van Oppen; 2nd, Veronica Van Oppen.

Flat race finals, Boys over 9.—1st, Carlos Silva; 2nd, George Gibbons.

Flat race finals, Boys under 9.—1st, Charlie Carter; 2nd, Billy Boardman.

Babies' Race (under 4).—1st, John Christie; 2nd, Betty Lee.

Boy Scouts' Race.—1st, Edward Turner; 2nd, Carlos Clifford.

Boys' Sack Race.—1st, George Gibbons; 2nd, Carlos Clifford.

Egg and Spoon Race for Girls.—1st, Inez Lace; 2nd, Marguerita Hunt; 3rd, Nellie Symonds; 4th, Kathleen Dean.

The competitions for grown-ups were held on the second day, with the following results:

Egg and Spoon race for Ladies.—1st, Mrs. Krell; 2nd, Miss Dover.

Hat trimming for Gentlemen.—1st, Norman Baillie; 2nd, Gerard Smith.

Tilting the Ring.—1st, Sr. Diaz (jockey) and Mr. S. O'Shea (horse).

Ladies' Dressing race for Gentlemen.—1st, Señor Diaz; 2nd, Norman Baillie.

Ladies' Sewing Competition (judged by Mrs. Bowling).—1st, Mrs. Berry; 2nd, Mrs. Deakin.

The prizes for these events were distributed by Mrs. Diego Le Bas, to whom Mr. Montgomery suitably proposed thanks. The comic items created much merriment, and the device for the tilting said much for the ingenuity of its designer, Mr. Montgomery.

THE PROCEEDS.

Quite early on the opening day it became apparent that the results of the fete would outrun all expectations; there was good business at the stalls, and the attendance, thanks partly to the special railway facilities from the centre and to the ideal weather, was splendid. The sales were helped by Señor Uranga, who conducted clever auctions of some of the more costly articles, and realised good prices.

Naturally Mrs. Crouch and her helpers were much gratified, and so too were all present. Before the break-up on Sunday evening, Mr. Spencer S. Dickson, the British Consul, expressed appreciation of the splendid effort which had been made, and called for hearty cheers for Mrs. Crouch. Cheers for Mr. Crouch were then given.

Mr. Crouch, in a genial disclaimer, attempted to fix responsibility upon Mrs. R. W. O. Le Bas, to whom, far more than to anyone else, the credit for the original idea belonged. Many of the helpers too, he said, had worked far harder than Mrs. Crouch and himself.

The company which shortly afterwards dispersed would have been the despair of the Artful Dodger.

I understand that up to this evening the estimated receipts from the Fete were returned at something over £500 sterling.

THE CARAVAN OF DEATH

Turkish Torture of Armenians

INTERVIEW WITH EMIR ARSLAN

Facts relating to conditions in Armenia, the massacre of Armenian Christians and the wholesale deportation of inhabitants of cities, were furnished to a HERALD representative on Nov. 29 by the eminent diplomatist and editor, Emir Emin Arslan. Many of the Emir's statements were confirmed by correspondence which he had received from residents in the Ottoman Empire.

In a summary of the existing situation, Emir Arslan declares the plain truth to be that the Turks who are in power to-day have determined to exterminate the Armenian race.

"In many cases," he said, "Turkish officials do not share this purpose, and large numbers of private citizens who are also Turks look upon such a policy with horror and disdain. They realise how their welfare and daily life are linked with those of their Armenian neighbours; but the more powerful officials at Constantinople are relentless in spite of public protests, arguments and appeal.

"Responsibility for this campaign of tyranny is charged upon Enver Pasha and Talaat Bey, the despotic rulers of Turkey to-day. Behind them, it is repeatedly alleged, Germany is responsible, at least passively responsible, since it is obvious that a word from her could stop these outrages. German officials in Turkey are quoted by word and deed as encouraging the procedure.

"Three means of extermination are being employed," continued the Emir, "deportation, massacre and recantation.

"By recanting their faith and accepting Islam altogether a good many Armenians have escaped further persecution. In many cities, such as Trebizond, in the north and Mardin in the south, there have been wholesale massacres of the Armenians; in other cases, as at Massevan, smaller numbers have been executed; at the last-named place a group were sent out from the city to dig a trench. Lined up on its edge, they were shot and buried in the trench they had dug.

"Deportation has been the novel and most widespread method of extermination. It was least repulsive and quite as effective. In city after city, such as Zeitoon, Aintab, Sivas, Erzurum, Harpoot, and in lesser measure from cities in the Cilician Plain, Adana, Tarsus and Hadjin, Armenian men in the prime of life have been drafted into the army and set to work upon roads, while women and children have been forcibly taken from their homes into a strange country there to be scattered among strangers.

"In these attacks upon the Armenians, the leading men, best educated, most well-to-do, and most influential, have been the first to be seized and the most harshly dealt with. They have been tortured, their property expropriated by individual officials or by the Government, and they themselves subjected to the penalty of death or exile.

"Sickening sights have been witnessed along the line of these deported masses, if the reports I have received are reliable," he said. "Often the roadsides have been strewn with corpses; women have abandoned their babies to die on the way; starving, penniless, broken almost to the point of despair, they have stumbled on to what seemed to be certain death, a little further on the way. Women and girls have been cornered off by Turkish soldiers or seized by 'brutish beasts' in the shape of citizens in the towns and villages through which they passed. Large cities and towns where thousands have lived have been, so to speak, swept clean of Armenian inhabitants. Teachers in mission schools and professors in mission colleges have been arrested, tortured and even slain. The whole interior of Turkey is one wild scene of terror and oppression."

"No Armenian is really safe," he went on to say. "No one knows but that his turn will come next. It is impossible to give numbers, but it is affirmed that a wide region around Sivas, where 600,000 Armenians lived, is now practically depopulated.

"Hundreds of thousands, it is alleged, have gone into Russia, but the mass of the people, who were not seditions or a menace to the Turkish Government, have been left to become helpless victims."

"Here, continued the Emir, 'I have some letters which are written by a wealthy merchant in Turkey, on his account of the systematic deportation of Armenian citizens of that land, and a Turkish diplomat whose name diplomacy obliges me to hold secret.

One of these documents stated that suspicion on the part of the Turkish Government of the loyalty of their Armenian citizens had led to some drastic repressive measures, namely, disarmament of all non-Moslem soldiers in the army, rigid espionage, and the deportation of Armenians en masse from some towns and villages in central Turkey. The total number of Armenians deported to-day are 32,500, of whom about 6,000 have been sent to the Koniegh region, 7,500 to Aleppo and its vicinity, and the remainder to Mesopotamia, some of them nearly as far as Bagdad.

The process is still going on, with no indication of where or how it will stop. A general order was recently published giving all military commanders power to deport at their discretion any persons, individually or collectively, of whose loyalty they may entertain suspicion.

Although the orders for the deportation may have been humane, the manner of their execution has often been brutally harsh. One ward of a city, or a whole village, has been sent off at literally one hour's notice and without opportunity to prepare food for the journey, to provide transport or animals for the weak or aged, to collect their flocks or herds, or even, in some cases, to gather all the members of the family. Even when time permitted they were obliged to sell off their property at a small fraction of its value, and in some cases were prevented from selling at all—as it was taken by the Government under some excuse or other. Conditions of travel, highly difficult at the best of times, have been made unendurable and even fatal in many cases by the brutality of the gendarmes in charge.

Most of the men have been conscripted, and four-fifths of the total number deported are women and children.

In some cases, it appears, according to this communication, that the Government has condescended to feed these refugees fairly well, and in some places half-fed them, while in other places not only did the Government refuse to feed them, but ordered in no uncertain way that all others should refrain from aiding them in any way. There has been great distress from hunger and thirst upon the road, and a good many deaths are reported to have occurred. Women and girls are known to have been outraged mercilessly.

The orders state that these people are to be scattered in the villages, in small groups of three or four families each. No adequate provision is being made for their subsistence, and unless aid comes from outside in the next few months it is evident that most of them will be destroyed by either famine or disease.

Another letter to the Emir states:—

"The atrocities now committed in Turkey surpass anything that has ever preceded, even in the palmiest days of Abdul Hamid, the Arch-Assassin. They are carefully planned and diabolically executed, and include tortures of the most revolting types, murder by the wholesale, and venomous method of deportation that separates families and sends large numbers of the victims to inevitable death.

"In one prosperous city twelve of the leading Armenian men were taken out upon the road under pretence of deportation. In a few hours the guards returned alone. The unfortunates had been butchered.

"A few days later, 300 men followed the same path, which was to be the end of all their agonies. This method is being duplicated everywhere in the interior of Turkey.

"Women and children, old men and invalids are driven from their homes at the point of the bayonet and sent along different routes covering many days, even weeks, of travel. No preparations for the journey are made or permitted. Children born upon the road are sometimes strangled by the despairing, almost maddened mother, who is forbidden to lag behind the caravan of death.

"Those too ill are left alone by the roadside to die unassisted.

"The women who survive this journey of cavalry are scattered among Moslem families in Mohammedan villages, where the choice before them is Islam or death. This method of extermination is going on from Smyrna to Persia and from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean. Some entire Armenian towns have been depopulated and Moslems from Macedonia have been brought in to occupy the abandoned houses.

"Turkey is now free to satisfy her thirst for blood and destruction, and to carry out the examples shown by her masters in Europe. Never in Moslem history," this message of Armenian atrocities quotes, "has there been such a riot of crime and carnival of murder aimed at the annihilation of the Armenian race, whose fault apparently lies in the fact that the Moslem religion is not their worship.

"The gruesome devices sought by the cruel authorities are hair-raising," continues the writer.

"In some cases nails and sharp points are being driven into the ends of the fingers; men are beaten until they fall senseless to the ground; the bottoms of their feet are pounded and then boiling water is poured on to the raw, bleeding flesh. In other cases, the man is beaten until it is impossible to recognise him.

"All this torture is given with the idea of forcing these victims to confess or reveal secrets, and to inform the Government of plots and plans that may or may not be formed against it.

"I am sick of these tactics," continues the writer, "used by my country; of politics, and of everything around me. I wish I could leave this spot that resembles Hell in its wildest conception. Pity me for being obliged to see such sights, and to what our country has descended," the writer terminates.

RIVER FATALITY

BELGRANO MEN DROWNED.

Another of the drowning fatalities which never fail to occur each summer occurred in the river when Luis Falch, F. A. Oliva, and Lucian Peyranno, of the Club Nautico, Belgrano, put off in a small rowing skiff, and endeavoured to reach one of the buoys marking the channel. Finding the water outside very choppy, and their craft in danger, they called for help to the yacht Brisa. In attempting to catch a line thrown from this vessel, however, their boat upset, and Oliva and Peyranno perished.

NEW PORT WORKS

Plant Removed by Contractors

DR. MOYANO'S ULTIMATUM

It is stated that the Direction General of Hydraulic Works has reported that on Thursday the Constructional Company of the New Port Works has withdrawn some of the machinery and plant in use at the Works. This has been communicated to the Minister of Public Works as an uncalled for act on the part of the contractors. Dr. Moyano, after a careful consideration of the facts and contingencies of the case, has sent a letter to the Management requiring them to replace the plant within forty-eight hours. The Company replied at considerable length, stating that their intention is to proceed with the works on a very modified form, limited almost entirely to the maintenance and conservation of the works already constructed. This is all they can do owing to the present stringent financial situation, with the difficulties of which they have already acquainted the Government, and in pursuance of that restricted policy they have seen fit to remove some of their plant.

Dr. Moyano has seen the President to consult as to what ought to be done, and an expert of the Obras Hidraulicas has been ordered to report on the subject, while the Procurator or the Treasurer is to give an opinion on the legal aspects of the case.

"THE STILL TONGUE"

EVILS OF INTERRUPTIONS AT POLITICAL MEETINGS.

While it is not advisable even in Britain to interrupt an enthusiastic political meeting with hostile cries it is absolutely dangerous to do so in Argentina as has just been practically demonstrated to Rogelio Jimenez who has been removed by the Asistencia Publica to Ramos Mejia Hospital, suffering from severe wounds. His account of how he received them was confused but credible. In the afternoon of Sunday he was in a political club "in the vicinity of Avellaneda" where a young gentleman with smoked glasses and very long hair was denouncing the iniquities of the Radicales. Rogelio is presumably, a Democrate for he ventured to utter a shout of dissent. Immediately several earnest, bright and high souled young politicians converged upon him and argued the matter with him so convincingly that he lay down and went senseless.

The incident has been unfortunate for him further in that, the police have recognised in him a deserter in 1914 from the Training Ship Sarmiento.

Do not meddle in politics unless your record is spotless (this will exterminate politicians) and at political meetings of all kinds, shout only for the majority.

THIEVES IN SOUTHERN SUBURBS

GONE TO EARTH AT LANUS.

Complaints from Berazategui state that in that and neighbouring rural districts robberies have been excessively numerous of late, and have created widespread alarm and uneasiness. A gang of professional thieves is believed to be operating, and they are broad-minded in their ideas of spoil, stealing alike horses, cattle, harness, or personal valuables. On Wednesday night they attempted to enter the house of Señores Amarelli who heard the noise made in forcing an entrance. Shots were exchanged, and Señor Celestino Amarelli sustained a graze from a revolver bullet. The police pursued the thieves up to the vicinity of Lanus where they succeeded in taking cover. Lanus police, please note.

FLAT-HUNTING

One sees no visible signs of the equipment necessary to the flat-hunter. There are no tangible weapons, no special accoutrements such as would be necessary in any other sort of hunting. All that is needed are a strong body, a stout heart, and an utter disregard for the "bicho" kingdom.

A friend of mine asked if I would help her to find a flat. Certainly I would, an easy task, judging from the innumerable boards bearing the legend "Se Alquilan" hanging everywhere throughout the city. The flat my friend required had to be like the various belongings of the little bear in the fairy story labelled "Golden Locks"—not too big, and not too small, but just comfortable; not too hot (in summer), and not too cold (in winter) but just the happy medium; not too close in the city, and not too far out for convenience; not necessarily in the ultra-fashionable quarters; but most decidedly not in a suspicious one. If furnished and suitable so much the better; but unfurnished if suitable would be no bar to the closing of a contract. My friend and I boast of the possessions, each of us, of a strong body, and a stout heart; but we admit that for "bichos" of any kind we each possess a strong and particular aversion.

Therefore at the end of a trying day, wherein we had sampled all sorts and conditions of furnished and unfurnished flats, we realised that although we might be born Amazons, we were not born flat-hunters; for the "bichos" had scored. My friend had worn white hosiery, after one visit to a large "departemento" house, a sartorial descriptive writer would have said "Señora Z. wore white hosiery speckled with black," and her frequent spasms, and attempts to dislodge a particularly annoying "speck" while going from one "likely" house to another was the cause of curious speculation on the part of the male promenaders, who frequently passed remarks which would have been rude had they not been so humorous.

After a thorough disinfecting we were prepared "to lay our case" before the "better half" of the flat-hunter. "Well, Henry," my friend said, "I saw a sweet little furnished flat. Such a gem! The rooms were all that even I could wish; and the furniture was all new—even the pots and pans, rows of which in all their aluminium glory were arrayed on the shelves of a darling little kitchen, which opened on the roof of the sixth storey."

"Well," Henry answered, "why didn't you take it." My friend examined her finger-nails attentively before she replied slowly, "I am a married woman, and I realised that the bijou house was not furnished for such as me. The rent was $400 per month." "Certainly, certainly, out of the question for us," said Henry, purposely ignoring the innuendo in my friend's answer, "but surely you saw something which would suit at a lower rent."

"I saw a very nice suite of rooms unfurnished in Exclamation Street; but you advised me not to go there because it is a rendezvous for the Aspasias of the community; and I also liked a little house in Lower Avenue, but there was no bath, only a shower, and the kitchen was so dark. The agents are most obliging; they will ask anything from $200 upwards; but they so kindly take off a few twenties. If the kitchen be dark, they explain that they have changed their supply of electricity from the German Company to the Italian Company, because the latter is so much cheaper; and that as the lights may be necessary in daytime they will take off $10 per month. Then other disabilities are allowed for. Under one room on the floor of which we stood was a perpetual

THEIR BROTHERS' JOBS

A writer in the London "Evening News" talks interestingly of the girls who are filling "their brothers' jobs":

"This war really has some compensations," said the tired man.

"My milkman doesn't whistle rag-time music now. They've turned him into a girl."

And the tired man chuckled.

She is a significant sign of the times, this non-whistling milkgirl, who does her work so quietly in the early morning hours, a new and interesting type among many new types bred by the war. And she is one of a growing sisterhood.

It may be that the lift-girl, who carefully lands you at the wrong floor, was recently a very ordinary schoolgirl, and would in peace time have qualified as a typist or a milliner.

It may be that the feminine postman, who double-knocks with uncertain fingers at your front door, might in normal circumstances have become your cook-general.

But in her new sphere the girl who has replaced her brother is growing into a different girl than she would have become in the shop or the office or the kitchen. She has picked up the quickness of the streets.

She has learned to "answer back." She is developing a sense of humour. Perhaps in time she will even learn to whistle!

What the girls think of their new employments is shown in these interviews:—

The Commissionaire.

"My duties? Oh, light enough in a way, though they make you feel rather slow now and then. It doesn't want much energy to whistle up a taxi, does it?"

"But the uniform! Just look at it! The skirt! Did you ever see such a cut? Why, it might have tremor and humming noise. A corner flat was undesirable because of the noise; but the agent explained that if we kept the doors shut we would not notice it; and as for the other noise, well, another $10 off would be compensation. We saw flats with all the rooms ablaze with scarlet wall-papers—the crimson lamp evidently was insufficient—some had hundreds of thousands (more or less), probably more of nails and tacks in the walls or in the floors. In one place, the wash-basin in the bath-room had more hole than basin; in another there was more smell than kitchen. In one house the agent said he had 50 departementos, and only two vacant, and if we wanted one, it would be necessary to be there before nine o'clock the next day. And here it was we got the "bichos," free, gratis, and for nothing—about the only free gift in the Argentine—but there is no stint about this, the only one. I saw many very nice houses; but all too large for two people, who wish to lead the simple life; and the smaller variety are either all occupied or impossible."

My friend stopped, and her husband said, "Well, what are we going to do about it, girl? We had better find another boarding-house," and he grinned; for already he has named his wife the "peripatetic missus," because she is always walking about in search of a "home from home" sort of boarding-house, which never materialises. But my friend declared that not another boarding-house would she patronise. "No," she declared, "I would rather buy one of those 'jolly little houses at $95, mosquito proof, and with every virtue required by the fresh air lovers. Yes, even if I have to be my own cook."

All the same, we have fixed another day for another hunting expedition, still in hope of finding the ideal house at a reasonable price.

been made for my grandmother!"

"And the hat! How could any girl with an oval face like mine look nice in a hat without a brim?"

"No, the work isn't hard. But the uniform!"

The Messengeress.

"It's nice enough when it doesn't rain, riding about on 'buses and things, and going to places. I never knew London was so big."

"Much better than going to school. But some people are so funny. I did laugh the other day."

"I had to take a lot of flowers—just lovely, they were—from a gentleman to a lady. Lived in a flat, she did."

"Well, when she saw me—I'm not vain of my looks, but she seemed to think I was the gentleman's friend, and I hadn't even seen the man!"

"Why didn't he send a boy?" she says. Quite bit me head off. Jealous, that's what was the matter with her."

The Milk Girl.

"Suits me all right. Better'n bein' shut up all day in a washhouse. Gettin' a bit cold in the mornin' though."

"I don't think so much of the skivvies who take the milk in. Saucy hounds! They miss the young fellows who used to go round with the cans, that's what I put it down to."

"The Guy'nor says us girls get about our rounds quicker than the boys. That's cos we don't hang about and make eyes at the cook. Oh, I know all right; I've been there!"

The Tricycle Girl.

"It's tiring when the box is full; but I happen to be in the drapery, and the thing don't weigh a lot generally."

"But my shop's at Clapham Junction, and there's an awful hill if I have to go over to the Common. I have to get off and shove."

"Before this I was in service, but it's much nicer bein' out and seein' things."

The Lift Girl.

"I've been here for eight months now, and there's only one objection—the ladies are inclined to patronise a bit. One asked me if I'd care to come into her service as under-housemaid. Funny, wasn't it?"

"I was going in for typing if I hadn't taken to this, but I don't want to change now. Of course, it won't go on for ever. No girl would want that, would she?"

And she showed a little Royal Fusilier's badge.

The Carriage Cleaner.

"Carriage cleanin' aint all it might be, but we get decent pay, which is more'n you can say w'en you're doin' a bit of charin' or office cleanin' unreglar-like."

"My man was cut o' work for a long time an' joined the Army over a twelve-month ago. Dead, sir! Killed almost as soon as he got out there."

The Postwoman.

"The work's far more tiring than I ever imagined. My limbs at the end of a long day are absolutely done for."

"No wonder the postman walks badly. There won't be any postwomen when the war's over, I'm sure."

The Ticket Collector.

"I'm very pleased with my work. Standing at the barrier makes a woman tired, but we have a room where we get a fair amount of rest."

"I was at a shop cash-desk before, and this is far healthier. People have been very kind."

"The other day a gentleman offered me a pawnticket. Poor man! he was awfully confused when I pointed out his mistake."

"I've now got over the office boy's impudence, although he still asks me to have a cough tablet when I cry, 'All tickets, please!'"

The Bookstall Girl.

"Yes, I like it, sir, and I hope they'll keep me. I should have gone into service if this hadn't come along."

"Time doesn't hang; there's so much to look at. And we do see some funny people."

SOME WOMEN AND MANY THINGS

According to an Amsterdam telegram to the Agence Fournier, the Grand Duchess of Luxemburg is being so strongly urged by agents of the Kaiser to consent to a marriage with "one of the Kaiser's sons" that, after many refusals, she has declared she will not marry at all.

It is even stated that she proposes to enter a convent if further pressure is brought to bear upon her.—"Central News."

The Grand Duchess's determination not to marry is an old story. The only unmarried son of the Kaiser is the youngest, Joachim. The Grand Duchess is beautiful and twenty-one.

Glasgow has just appointed a woman constable, the first Scotland has ever known. She is Miss Emily Miller, and an experience of some years in the City Vigilance Association will make her of valuable assistance to the local police in their handling of cases of women and girls.

Madame Clara Butt has figured in a dual role. She recently appeared on a platform both as singer and speaker. In her speech she pointed out that while women were to a large extent denied their share in the nation's work nearly everything symbolical of the nation was represented by a woman. The only thing she could recall in which a man figured was the moon. (Laughter). And in other countries there was not even a man in the moon. In America there was a woman in the moon, in Australia a kangaroo, and in Germany—she supposed the Kaiser. (Laughter).

The good work done by women police was discussed at a conference in London of the National Union of Women Workers.

Miss Norah E. Green, the secretary, referred in her annual report to the women patrol movement, which started in 1914 with the official authorisation of the Home Office and the Chief Commissioner of Police.

The patrol now numbered 2,301, and were at work in 108 different places in Great Britain and Ireland.

Mrs. George Morgan (Birmingham) said women workers had not been resented by the policemen, but welcomed.

By the employment of women police a great many people would be brought to justice who at present escaped, while the preventive work which women could do was of enormous consequence.

The policeman could not be got to understand how to talk to the "flighty girl." In fact, the "flighty girl" knew a great deal how to talk to the policeman. (Laughter).

The conference adopted a resolution urging the appointment of women police constables, with powers, salaries and pensions equal to those of male constables.

The "Hamburger Fremdenblatt" is greatly concerned about the future of the German girl, who will now find it very difficult to obtain a husband.

Many a mother who is blessed with daughters peers anxiously into the future, and above all the mother who regarded the marriage of her daughter with a well-provided husband as her only salvation. The prospects of marriage are not very bright at present, and what they will look like after the war no one can say!

But the girls must be provided for. And so the mother who formerly never thought about it is driven to prepare her daughters for some vocation so that they may have a profession in which they may be entirely independent.

The writer complains that many mothers think that they have done all that is necessary by leaving the girls to look after themselves and sending them out to work. There are far too many of these half-educated girls, he says, who are the despair of their employers, and their position will be still more serious after the war.

Land of Lilliput.

Conducted by Egeria

My dear Lilliputians,

I suppose you have all heard of "K. of K." Who is it or rather he? Or do you not know? And would you answer as a schoolboy did recently when asked this question? Instead of saying "Kitchener of Khartoum," this boy answered very smartly "K. of K. is King of Kings." But this same boy was not so ignorant of the war business as you might think from this answer. For, being asked to say something about Queen Elizabeth, he replied that "Queen Elizabeth is a great battleship!"

Here is quite a different story about a kind but somewhat stupid lady, which serves to show what silly questions may be asked because one does not think. This lady saw one of our heroes hobbling along on crutches, but smiling cheerfully notwithstanding. He was wearing his soldier's uniform, and probably she saw at a glance that he had been to the war, and that he was convalescing as the place was at a Military Convalescent Hospital. However she could make no other attempt to talk than to ask the soldier. "Have you been to the front?" Hearing this was so, she next said, looking at the empty space where the soldier's right leg used to be before the war. "And have you been wounded?" The soldier evidently wished to teach the lady a lesson, for he replied "Oh, no, madame, my leg was bitten off by a dog!" So you can all see how exceedingly silly it is to ask questions about things which are self-evident!

Do any of you ever try to write stories? A Lilliputian thought to try and this is the result. What do you think of it? She called it "Lost and Found" or "The Story of a Little Green Bag."

"I am only a little green bag, but I have seen quite a lot of life, both good and bad. I remember first, when I was made, such pretty things were said of me, that I'm sure I grew rather proud of my appearance."

One day I was wrapped in brown paper and taken to a bazaar to be sold to benefit the sick and wounded soldiers. I did not mind much. I was glad to be of some use. (You see I was good as well as pretty). But I did hope to get with nice people. At the bazaar I was put in a bran-tub. It was fun at first, but I soon got tired of being hustled and hustled about by the other packages. At last my turn came to be taken out. A lady's hand seized me and I heard a pleasant voice saying, "This is for you, dear!" I felt myself taken hold of by a little girl. She was delighted with me, and admired my dainty green colour and smoothness. Peeping inside she found a pretty little blue and white handkerchief. I was pleased to know I had come to such a nice little girl, and was quite satisfied with thoughts of a home with her. She carried me on her arm by a silken cord. We stopped at the sweet stall and girlie bought some sweets. Oh, dear! I was so afraid I should have to carry them. Nasty, sticky things! I gave quite a jump at the idea, and in doing so slipped off girlie's arm and fell with a gasp to the floor. Alas! girlie was enjoying her sweets so that she did not even miss me. There I lay. Large and small feet tramped on me. "Oh! this is worse than the bran-tub!" I cried. "Oh, my beautiful complexion; my dainty colour!" I do not know how long I lay there. I was in despair. Suddenly I heard a voice saying "Here it is!" A kindly hand picked me up and once more my little girl took hold of me. Cuddling me on her arm she said, "I will take such care of you, and not lose you again."

I am sure many of you could write about similar things if you tried, and you would do it better and better, until some day you might write stories for people who have left Lilliput, and who would be glad to read about the old place. Did you hear the story of the sixteen-year old Countess, Helene Jonglie d'Arday, who was sentenced to three months' imprisonment by a German court-martial at Ghent for wearing the photo of King Albert of Belgium? A German officer had her arrested because he said she had insulted him. Now I think the insult was on the part of the officer, and I am sure you will, too, when I tell you that he tore from the young girl the chain with the medal attached which she was wearing around her neck saying: "Away with that King without a country!" The Countess bravely replied: "The Belgians prefer a King without a country to an Emperor without honour"; and for this she was sent to prison. The truth is unpalatable to those who are dishonourable.

This week your story is called:

THE SPIRIT OF THE FLOWERS.

(By Daphne MacIntyre.)

It was dusk—that most beautiful time of all, the small boy thought as he wandered through the fragrantly scented garden of his lovely home; very far away a few stars were beginning to twinkle.

The boy had been ill for three weeks, and this was the first time he had been out—even now his nurse imagined he was safely tucked up in his warm bed, in the cosy room, but he had been possessed of a sudden longing for this quiet garden away from the stuffy fire-heated room and sloppy milk foods; away from the thick woollen clothes; he had even become tired of his toys. He told himself that this was worth all the scoldings from his nurse and reproachful glances of his mother to be among these dear flowers and the cool evening air in the garden. Everything was very still and quiet, but somehow things seemed different from usual. He went close to a bunch of roses and peered at them, then suddenly drew back with a gasp of astonishment, for they were gradually opening—instead of closing as they had always done at the end of the day, until they seemed three times their usual size. He rubbed his eyes as though dazed, and gave a startled cry. In the centre of a red rose there appeared a tiny fairylike creature in a filmy red dress with a green cap on her dark head. She was very pretty, and as she descended upon the ground her vivid red lips parted in a smile. She waved her long white hands gracefully over the other bushes, and from every flower there emerged a similar creature dressed in red, white, pink, yellow and many other shades. They all clasped hands and commenced to dance slowly, lightly, rising and turning, all the while surrounding the boy.

"Come with us! Come with us!" the fairy voices sang. He felt a touch on his arm, and, turning, beheld standing by his side one far more radiant than all the others, whom he instantly knew to be the Queen.

"Come with us! Come with us!" softly tempted the singers, and he felt himself moving slowly as though gently pushed by unseen hands.

The boy raised himself with an effort, and discovered he was in the midst of thousands and thousands of roses and flowers of every kind and colour; not ordinary flowers such as those we see in our own gardens, but flower fairies. He wondered where he could be, and what the time was. Then from a great distance he heard distinctly a voice calling:—

"Master Jack, where are you? You should have been in bed hours ago. Where are you hiding, you naughty boy? You will catch a bad cold and then have to remain inside for months."

Ah! how very well he knew that voice! It had been his companion incessantly during the past three weeks, until he had become weary of the constant presence in the white cap and the stiff grey dress that invariably rustled when he was feeling worse than usual. He glanced round to see from whence it came, but in vain. There was no one in sight. He started up with an expression of fear in his brown eyes and a dread in his heart, but a warm little hand slipped into his and pulled him down again. It was the Red Rose.

"Where is she?" he whispered fearfully.

The Red Rose smiled reassuringly.

"Listen," she said. "This is the earth under the ground, and it is the home of the spirits of the flowers. You heard your nurse calling to you just now—that was because we are directly under your home. You, my boy, are the only mortal who has ever been here."

"Where is the sun?" he asked, noticing that it was not there, and yet a faint light was shining everywhere.

"The sun, as a great many people seem to think, does not cease when it touches the ground, but goes on and on, down and down, until it reaches us."

"What do you do when the rain is falling?" Jack was of an inquiring turn of mind now that he had fully recovered from the strangeness of the whole affair.

"It is very dark, and we sleep," was the reply. "At different times of the year we are sent up on earth to perform our various missions. In winter most of us rest. In the spring are sent up violets, pinks, daffodils, bulbs and flowers too numerous to mention separately. When spring-time is past they return to us. Then we and hundreds of others go in the summer, and, like the others, when we have finished we come home here again to give place to autumn with its chrysanthemums and flowers that bloom at that period."

"How wonderful!" breathed the boy, his face aglow with the splendour of the scene before him. "It seems strange to me to see daffodils and chrysanthemums dancing together hand in hand."

"Yes, I suppose so. They are very fond of one another, and this is the only time they can be together."

In silence they watched the marvellous colours dancing here and there while the scent was almost overpowering.

"Tell me what happens when we pick the flowers that blossom in our garden?"

The Red Rose smiled sadly.

"That is the only death we know." Her eyes filled with tears. "I lost the dearest friend I had in that way. She was a sweet little mignonette, and a careless passer-by picked her, and a few moments after flung her away, and I on my tree watched her die in agony on a gravel walk in the burning sun. We are so happy together, and we wait—you could not guess how eagerly—for our dear friends to come back and then sometimes—many times—they never return, and we know that they have been picked."

"You seem so happy here—is your Queen kind?"

A slow, sweet smile curved the mouth of the Red Rose.

"She is the kindest of all, and we are happy because we give people pleasure, because we try to make everyone up there happy. Do you think we succeed?"

"Yes," responded the boy. "If I had not thought of you and other flowers, I would not have come out this evening—if our garden had been a bare patch I would have preferred my room."

He looked right down into her blue eyes and saw the stars and the water reflected in them.

"I am glad. You will get well quickly now and be able to come out to the garden often—you will not pluck the flowers, will you?"

Again he caught the reflection of

NATURE STUDIES FOR CHILDREN

At the suggestion of Mrs. C. M. Goethe the Chamber of Commerce of Sacramento, California, is undertaking a novel method of nature study schools. The Chamber of Commerce insists that "every child has the same right to read a roadside that he has to read a book." In other words, the Chamber of Commerce is urging the educational authorities to introduce nature study excursions into public schools.

The University of California and the State Fish and Game Commission have taken up the subject and are working for the success of the experiment. If it proves a success the Fish and Game Commission plans to extend the scheme to every school in the State. At present they are almost convinced that the most effective way of preserving wild life is not by working with grownups, as heretofore, but by teaching young children to love nature.

This method of teaching nature was suggested by Mrs. Goethe by investigating the playground activities in Great Britain, Switzerland, Germany and Denmark. Mrs. Goethe asserts that these countries are as far ahead of the United States in nature study as the United States is ahead of them in the development of new playgrounds.

The Foreign Office in London upon recommendation of the Ministry of War, has awarded a gold medal to Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, of New York, president of the American committee for clothing and caring for the wounded.

The woman rifle shots of Australia have subscribed for a motor ambulance for use in connection with Australian sick and wounded soldiers. This was recently handed over to Lady Helen Ferguson at Federal Government House in Sydney.

Lady Mackworth, of Wales, is one of many women in the warrior countries of Europe who has stepped into the business shoes of the absent man of the family. Lady Mackworth is managing her father's huge coal business at Cardiff.

In Los Angeles Mrs. Maud Crew Waters was elected to the Board of Education. Mrs. Waters is the president of the Friday Morning Club, the largest woman's organisation in Los Angeles and said to be the most powerful in California.

Miss May Matthews, an Irish Australian girl, who has long been an organiser for the Labour Party in New South Wales, means to try her luck as a candidate for the Federal Parliament next election. Mr. Fisher is quoted as having said over six years ago that he hoped to see a woman returned as a Labour candidate as speedily as might be.

the stars and the water, and promised.

"Then you think he will be well enough to go out in the sunshine tomorrow, doctor? He has been simply pining for that."

"Sure, Mrs. Lane; and let him have plenty of it. The lad has been shut up in this room long enough."

Jack opened his eyes swiftly at the sound of voices and found himself in bed with his mother, and the doctor standing over him.

"How do you feel, by boy?"

"All right, thanks, mother. But where are the roses?"

"Out there in the garden. I believe you have been dreaming."

"I have not—" he began indignantly, but his mother laughed.

"But you have slept soundly the whole afternoon."

Jack was puzzled for a moment, and then he smiled.

"I suppose I was," he said. But in his heart he was registering a solemn vow.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY

The Local Society's

QUIET CELEBRATION

For many years it has been the pleasant custom of St. Andrew's Society to exchange fraternal greetings with the kindred Societies who are dispersed abroad in many parts of the Earth wheresoever the ubiquitous Scot has set up his household gods. Many members have actually close associations and connection with these Societies and such hails, are the sign of that impalpable bond which exists among "our ain folk." Another sign whereof is the tentatively interrogative assertion "Ye'll be a Scotsman likely?" which is so frequent when two men of even of three generations descent from Scotland, foregather. It is the call of the blood.

This year, however, there has been no formal dinner. The St. Andrew's Society felt that now, as last year, the time was no time for eating the fat and drinking the strong and the warlike scream of the pibroch has not been heard for, have not the Pipers of the Society also, like those at the Battle of the North Inch, drawn their dirks and gone up to the forefront of the battle? These things are indeed so, but though there is no gathering of "Lowland or Highland far and near" the greetings have been exchanged as usual, indeed never perhaps have they been charged with greater feeling and stronger patriotism than on this occasion. The Sean-nachies of the various septs have not struck their harps in vain as is evidenced for instance by the following "frae the Brithers in Valparaiso" whilk is beyond the Greater Gram-pians.

"Greetings frae West Coast Scots
tae East

Fu' Snell the wind that piercing bites
Let skies be bleak, let cauld winds blaw

The warm Scots' heart, can vanquish a."

Sae fervid greetings, East frae West
Surmont yon icy lowering crest
Tae brither Scots, this year o' fray
On Guid St. Andrew's festal day."

It is evident that the "snell wind that piercing bites" must prevail "over yonder." It has no reference to the Gehennalike temperature prevailing in the City of Good Airs.

St. Andrew's Society of Buenos Aires has replied in the following manner, whilk while gently and firmly asserting the superiority of all things Extra Tweed and Cheviot, is perfectly polite and non-committal towards the "bodies" who have had the misfortune to be born elsewhere or of non-Caledonian strain.

"River Plate Lads send heartiest greeting

An wish ye á at the Tap o' the Tree
Many ither races in unco places

The Scotsman aye maun tapmost be."

Here the Bard has decided to change the metre for variety and proceedeth.

"May ye rise abune sorrow, forbye above care

Though round ye the angry winds whistle

And whatever yer lot, keep in mind ye're a Scot

And haud heigh yer heid like the Thistle."

SERMON AT ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH

At St. Andrew's Church, Calle Belgrano, on Sunday, a special Scottish service was held in the morning at which all Scotsmen were invited to assemble, and more especially those belonging to the St. Andrew's Society of the River Plate who have been worth to assemble on St. Andrew's Day to make merry together and to remember the things that pertain to the Grey Northland.

It has been felt, however, that on this occasion feasting was out of place and that a special service was in every sense better and more seemly. The Rev. Dr. J. W. Fleming preached. Very appropriately to the times, the circumstances and the character of the foes against whom the Empire is contending, the text chosen was Ephesians, 6. 12. 13. "For we wrestle, not against flesh and blood, but against Principalities, against Powers, against the Rulers of the Darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand on the evil day and—having done all, to stand."

From this text like a trumpet blast, Dr. Fleming, speaking very earnestly and forcibly, naturally touched very largely on the war. He said that yet again did St. Andrew's Society meet under its sombre shadow. Since last year they had to lament the loss of comrades and relatives who were here then. It should be, as the Empire is passing through a crisis in its history, the deepest regret of all that they who are far away cannot do more to show their country that though far from the scene of strife they are yet anxious in spirit, as keen, as earnest as those living at the very heart of the nation.

Dr. Fleming said he believed that many here had that spirit, but it ought to be more vividly spread in the community than it is. Patriotic sentiment might be loud, yet shallow, but they could point to deeds, the brave men who had gone from their midst, many of them members of that Society. It was clear that these men had given up everything, situations, family ties, friends, big hopes, yea life itself, for their country, and that should evidently be the exact measure of the sacrifice that they in turn might be called to make. Many people are dull in their sense of duty. They do not realise the true issues of the conflict which is not only a personal and vital war against flesh and blood, but against the Powers of Darkness themselves.

Let them think of Armageddon today as did St. Paul of the Early Christian struggles with Nero, Claudius and Roman officials behind whom were other powers. A higher and more correct outlook is that this is a Holy War and behind the Emperor of Germany and the Sultan stand the Powers of Darkness and of All Evil.

No one—said Dr. Fleming—claimed that God was on his side more frequently than the Kaiser; but it was common, unfortunately, to see men and women claiming that they were on the side of Right when their schemes were far from being to the mind of Christ.

So also let us make no boast of our national integrity. Let it be acknowledged that the Churches have failed lamentably in their duty; yet to-day the Powers of Light and not of Darkness stand behind us. We are fighting the Devil, and not only the world and the flesh. As a colleague had put it, it is the question whether "the mailed fist or The Nailed Hand shall prevail." Let that issue be accepted. They were on the side of Christ and in the position he would have them hold.

In the River Plate, they could associate themselves as closely as possible with the armies and the Nation in the Crisis, putting on the whole armour of God. Enthusiasm could reach out and inspire those taking their places. They could assist and uphold them in prayer. Public opinion too could do much. During the last year St. Andrew's Society has supported four beds in the Scottish Hospital at Rouen. Let this tie be maintained and strengthened. In this time it became the community to manifest the grace of endurance. As the old Scottish motto says "Thole on" or as it sometimes runs "Thole and Think," that is "Endure, think, but speak not." Let them fix their eyes on the goal. Awful though is the price paid for Patriotism. Mr. D. Mearns, one of the Society—who left a year ago in the vigour of youth, is blind for life. That was the endurance that meant so much. Terrible is the fight, but like Elisha's servant, they might see "They that are with us are more than they that be with them!"

BRITISH HOSPITAL

CHANGE IN ADMITTANCE HOURS.

Subscribers and the public generally are hereby notified that commencing from December 1, the admission of patients to the Hospital will, until further notice, be restricted to one hour per day, viz.,

From 9 to 10 a.m.

The Committee have been obliged to put this rule into force owing to the fact that, due to the war, it has been impossible to obtain the services of Resident Medical Officers to replace those whose contracts have now expired, the whole of the work for the present being undertaken by the Senior Medical Officer and the Honorary Visiting Staff.

The Committee earnestly ask for the co-operation of the community in adhering to this arrangement, and beg that with the exception of cases of accident, urgency, or emergency (which will as heretofore be admitted at any hour) all ordinary cases may be sent up at the hour indicated.

CHAMBER MUSIC

AT THE SALON ARGENTINA.

There were one or two especial features at the concert of chamber music given last evening at the Salón Argentina.

Mme. Jessie Pamplin filled the third part of the programme as the vocalist of the evening and one feature was the reception extended to her after her songs, another the songs themselves.

A purely music loving and critical audience of sufficient numbers considering the over oppressive weather, heard a fine interpretation of the instrumental music of Beethoven and Schubert by the Fontova Quartette.

It was owing to the inability of Mme. Ripert-Marcille to sing last night, that Mme. Jessie Pamplin consented to take the former lady's place.

She sang three songs and each one of them to perfection. It is a questionable point as to when Mme. Pamplin has been in better voice.

There had been an outburst of long matured evil, now there was a rising of good. A supreme moment comes in every battle. When this conflict is over there will be a better world. Our Father in Heaven will take this terrible experience of bloodshed and desolation, and turn it into blessings. He has done once and can do it again. Might He grant that as the final issue.

MUSIC AT ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH

Great interest naturally attached to the musical portion of the Service identified as it was with so many national associations. There was no bar here against nationality in Funeral Marches, and the opening was Beethoven's Funeral March, followed by Chopin's masterpiece. Mr. T. Llewellyn Hawes played both finely, with intense feeling, and made a manifest impression. In the anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land," the choir acquitted themselves well, the solos being excellently rendered by Mrs. T. L. Hawes (soprano), and Mr. J. W. Colquhoun (bass). "Scots wha' hae" was very convincingly rendered by Mr. A. F. Adie. This song is in the class of three which includes La Zraban-conne, and La Marseillaise. The Psalms and Hymns, all reminiscent of the Kirk at home were rendered with great power and evident enjoyment by the congregation. After the National Anthem, the majestic "Dead March in Saul" was given, and the full powers of the fine organ were utilised. It was a fine interpretation and made one feel more than ever that the work of George F's Kappelmeister, more English than his King was, ought not to be banned. It made a fine and fitting conclusion to a service which had many great moments.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

The keenest interest in the great war is now centred in the Balkans where the Allies are hastily throwing all available forces to check the Teutonic advance. Our frontispiece shows the busy scene when the first British troops left their transports for the landing place at Salonica. A later picture shows the great guns of one of the Dreadnoughts of the fleet covering the landing, which although tacitly consented to by the Greeks, was nevertheless a risky enough proceeding to demand the close attention of the Navy. It is only a week or two since we referred to the complaint of the London press that the British people were not allowed to see the tangible evidence of the victories which the army had gained in the western front, while the trophies captured by the French were always on view. This cause of complaint has now been removed and Londoners have lately seen a long row of German guns taken in the fierce fighting around Loos. What these 'captures' meant in effort, is well exemplified in the next picture showing the German gun in a revolving turret, let into a concrete pit and commanding the ground over which the allies advanced. The French artillery fire proved too much for this miniature fort and it was put out of action. Another picture demonstrating the intricate nature of the German defences, shows the details of the construction of a front-line trench. The last picture is of sad interest. It depicts the heroic Nurse Cavell, seated among the nurses of her school in Brussels. On her right is Dr. Depage, the famous Belgian doctor.

JOHN WALKER.

The many friends of the late Mr. John Walker, of the firm of Touche Faller and Co., of this city, will have learned with sorrow of his sudden death. On Nov. 27 his friends fulfilled the sad duty of conveying his remains to their final resting place in the British section of the Chacarita. The service at the graveside was conducted by the Rev. Stuart Cameron, in the presence of a large number of deceased's friends. Beautiful wreaths were sent by Messrs. Touche Faller and Co., Leng Roberts and Co., the staffs of Touche Faller and Co., and Leng, Roberts and Co., and from S. Kanstrup.

AMERICAN PRODUCE

Enormous consignments of American produce, eggs, apples, pears, etc., continue to arrive here from U.S. ports. The fruit comes in excellent condition, and owing to the well-known inability or unwillingness of Argentina to produce high-class fruits of these types, finds a ready sale at satisfactory prices. In spite of high freights the shipments have been highly successful from every point of view.

THANKSGIVING DAY

Celebration in the Capital

AMERICAN AMBASSADOR'S ADDRESS

Nov. 25 was "Thanksgiving Day." Americans in Buenos Aires celebrated it for the 23rd year, at the Methodist Episcopal Church. No more beautiful nor solemn service could have been held on this day of days, than was the case at the American Church last evening.

It was a Thanksgiving for the American Nation, welcomed with a spirit of unselfishness for the sufferings of other nations.

The church was filled to overflowing when Mr. Welby, the organist, played the Himno Nacional, and when a vast audience stood and sang "America."

Mr. F. F. Bideleux, through illness, could not sing, but Mr. R. H. Downing was impressive in "The Lord is my Light." A solo rendered with perfect fitness to the occasion.

A service which will be long remembered as an expression of a full thankfulness was one which in its beauty, even apart from the occasion, appealed. The choir sang perfectly, and had given an immense amount of attention to the two anthems "O that men would praise the Lord for His goodness," and that delicately perfect anthem "O how amiable are Thy dwelling places."

There were many things in this service of Thanksgiving which were impressive. Mrs. Jessie Pamplin in her solos was magnificent. She breathed forth an atmosphere in perfect feeling with the occasion. There was no levity, but a lightness in her singing, which at the same time carried a seriousness which created a feeling that it was a day of Thanksgiving.

Mrs. Milne interpreted some Schumann before the hymn "Alleluia" was sung by the entire congregation. The words were composed by Dr. McLaughlin, to music of Edward Elger's, and led by the choir, "O Christ our Lord and Master, Thee we praise" swelled fullvoiced through the church.

The Hon. F. J. Stimson, U.S. Ambassador to Argentina, then gave an address as follows:

U.S. AMBASSADOR'S ADDRESS.

John Bassett Moore, in an address that I received only yesterday, has spoken words that should this year be listened to by all, by all Americans, North and South; and on this Thanksgiving Day, almost the most serious that we have ever known, I shall venture to speak for all the Americas. For, while we have much to be thankful for, our thankfulness must be of grave mood. It is true, as Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe makes the old negro Hannah say, "Children, think on your mercies"; yet we cannot but feel that our mercies are just those which for a large part are withheld from the rest of the world; for nations with all of whom we sympathise, with all have ideas in common.

Henry Clay was surely the father of Pan-Americanism. Bolivar had, perhaps, anticipated the idea, and San Martin espoused it; but it was Henry Clay who first gave it form for the two Continents. On July 9, 1916, the Congress at Tucuman declared the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata to be "a free and independent nation," and on December 6 of the next year Clay announced in our House of Representatives that he intended to move the recognition of Buenos Aires. In 1818, the United States first named commissioners to South America, and Clay moved for a Minister for the "Independent Provinces" of the River Plate. He would not, he protested, give just cause of war to any Empire, not even to Spain. He believed that the policy of the United States should be one of a strict and impartial neutrality, but this was not, he maintained, incompatible with recognition. As to the nature of the Governments the independent countries of Spanish America might maintain, he urged that it was a question for themselves. No matter what Governments they might adopt, he believed that these Governments would be animated by American feeling and guided by American policy. They would obey the laws of the New World, of which they would compose a part. Nay more, surveying them with still greater comprehensiveness, he assumed that, in respect of European wars, the several parts of independent America would stand neutral, observing a liberal system of neutrality which all America would be interested in maintaining. As to the capacity of South American States for free Government, he affirmed they were in some particulars in advance of ourselves—in one particular, indeed, greatly so: that Granada, Venezuela and Buenos Aires had emancipated their slaves. It was not the intention of the United States to change its standpoint of a neutral policy. Part of this was the maintenance of peace, which was declared to be the greatest want of America, and, in regard to European wars, confidence was expressed that the policy of all America would be the same—that peace and neutrality which the United States had consistently laboured to preserve. On this supposition, the greatest importance was, as shown by the instructions of 1826, drawn by Clay and signed by the President, attached to the question of maritime neutrality. This was the time of the first Pan-American Convention, that of Panamá, and the delegates from the United States were instructed to bring forward a proposition to abolish war against private property and non-combatants upon the water, as formerly proposed by Dr. Franklin.

So far Mr. Moore, twice Counsellor to our State Department and acting Secretary of State, and one of our leading publicists and international lawyers. And, after the lapse of nearly a hundred years, we are again confronted by the same question.

We are not here to discuss International Law, but to give thanks; and while we do so earnestly, prayerfully, we must surely add to our thanks to the Almighty for ourselves, our prayers for others. For the present, it is said, our industries may be profiting by the terrible conflict. I could wish that all this profit might come to us with a sense of obligation, with a sense that we hold it but in trust, that we should give, and give largely, to the countries or the peoples of the countries from whom these profits are derived, not only returning it to some, but giving our benefactions, our Red Cross subscriptions, our gifts of food and clothing to the peoples of the countries, one and all, that are at war. In some of the countries engaged in the war, they are doing this. We read in the newspapers that large portions of the profits of the industries caused by the war are being given, directly or indirectly, to the poor of the people. I wish it might be largely so with us. Thus only may our prosperity be blessed. Only the lustral waters of Charity may make pure our hoards of gold.

Our hearts are surely wrung by the suffering of others in these years; the hearts of all Americans, North and South, must be moved and fired and chastened by the emotion of the awful tragedy. Ralph Waldo Emerson says somewhere that this is the high function of the drama; that when our hearts are wrung and our souls stirred by the tragedies and pathos of the stage, our natures and our characters may be uplifted. But, as he hastens to add, it is only true if that exaltation is followed by a high resolve, that deep emotion by earnest action. For this reason music, as some of its enemies have said, is not an uplift in art, nor is drama; for while our feelings, our emotions may be moved, this is followed by no action. Emerson says, and I think he is right, that an emotion, however high, is weakening to the character if it ends in itself; the moment the stage door closes, we go back to our selfish affairs. And, strangely enough, I

FILTH AND FICTION

Novelists and the "Sex Problem"

PICKINGS FROM THE GARBAGE HEAP

The late Mr. W. T. Stead was so great a journalist and so large-hearted a man that it has always been a source of regret to me that while he denounced the unclean play he did not at the same time condemn the unclean novel. That regret was intensified when, for some inexplicable reason, he applauded the cleverness and psychological insight of Miss Victoria Cross, at that moment famous for a particularly filthy effort known as "Anna Lombard."

In those days Miss Victoria Cross possessed almost a monopoly of the "problem novel"; but she has since been challenged for supremacy by a number of other writers—principally female—whose "problems" are just as find this same thought in John Bassett Moore, when he is speaking of that first Pan-American Convention. "So long," he says, "was the departure of the plenipotentiaries of the United States delayed, that when they appeared on the Isthmus of Panama the Congress had adjourned. For all practical purposes the Congress seemed to have been a failure, but we commit a grievous error if we assume that all great thoughts perish when some measure designed to make them effective falls short of immediate success." But I think we should add, with Emerson, that while there need not be immediate success, there must be immediate action. Therefore, when you go away to-night, with the last words of the Recessional dying upon your ears, that so well expresses our need of earnestness and responsibility in times like these, let us remember, let us Americans all remember, with in and without these walls, that while we give thanks this year, it alone is not enough: our thanks may turn to evil if we do not recognise the debt we owe. Let us pursue, therefore, the ideals so well voiced by our great statesman, Clay; let us think them, act upon them, and finally, still more, if our actions, our resolves, are blessed by the Almighty, let us give equal or greater labour, equal or greater thought, equal or greater help to the peoples of all these nations of the Old World who for at least a hundred years, some far more than that, have consistently been our friends.

In the reply to this, given by Dr. McLaughlin, thanks were expressed to Mr. Stimson and to the nobility of his expression. President Woodrow Wilson's message to his people was read by Dr. McLaughlin, and in his concluding remarks, the speaker said "that if the United States of America had cause for prosperity and Thanksgiving, that they must not forget in the future, their true generosity—the need perhaps of their generosity—to the suffering nations. As they prospered so must they give, until the day of a world-wide prosperity."

Kipling has never surpassed nor has he ever produced a more wonderful work as the "Recessional," one of the most perfect expressions of pleading, of sentiment and of magnificence ever written in the English language. Set to the music of De Kovea, an American, a most impressive rendering was given "Lest we forget."

A hymn and the closing voluntary followed, and as the congregation departed, a congregation that gave thanks for all the blessings on a Nation, there still rang in their ears "Lest we Forget," and with the Ambassador's address, so closely woven were these sentiments, that after Thanksgiving Day, those who attended the beautiful service at the American Church must have been impressed with a new unselfishness.

unreal, just as impure, and just as damaging to the weak-minded reader. In England to-day we have a whole school of novelists whose main ambition seems to be to invent something more lurid, more foul, and less interesting than anything that has previously been written.

It was my ill-fortune, a few days ago, to discover a colonial edition of a story entitled "The Unconscious Bigamist," from the pen of a woman named Mrs. Cameron Shute. Now Mrs. Shute may be an estimable lady, of unimpeachable morals, and possessing that indescribable attribute in female writers known as a "soul." A perusal of the story, however, has convinced me that, had the same estimable lady been deprived of permission to write about alleged sex problems, she would not have written at all. At any rate, she would never have succeeded in publishing a story from her pen. The book is trifling in the extreme; it tells us nothing that we did not already know; it does not entertain; and, if superficial evidence may be permitted to weigh, it is the effort of an erotomaniac. Since "The Unconscious Bigamist" was given to a tired world, there is no record—so far as I am aware—of Mrs. Cameron Shute having done anything. Probably she will be forgotten, and so desirable is it that she should be, that I ought to apologise for lifting her from oblivion.

However, Mrs. Shute provides an excuse for the discussion of the whole subject, and only on that account can the mention of her name and literary (?) work be justified.

The greatest objection to the "problem" novel is that it does not present a problem at all. Every incident, every intrigue, and all the "sentiment" are overdrawn, are untrue to life, and entertain few except the curious school-girl and the boy who has not yet gone out into the world. If the writer of literary atrocities be sincere, then she is to be pitied as a victim of defective intellect. On the other hand, there is a possibility that the novelists dealing in such goods are not sincere at all. They may realise that there are many peculiar people who are prepared to waste money on mere alloy when pure literature is obtainable, and they strive to meet the demand. It is the old cry of "If the public want garbage, then by all means give them garbage" heard or turned into hard cash. When it is admitted that such a demand exists, there is no way of coping with the evil except with the aid of the police. I am against a censorship: I object to the idea that a mere official is capable of deciding what is and what is not sound drama; but, at the same time, people such as the afore-mentioned Mrs. Shute, Victoria Cross, Elinor Glyn, and other purveyors of cheap nastiness, have no standing in literature, nor have they any claim to be regarded as dealers in art. Therefore, let their works be withdrawn from sale.

The pernicious influence of books such as "Three Weeks," "Five Nights" and "The Unconscious Bigamist" is necessarily great on the undeveloped minds of youthful readers. It is also demoralising to the older woman who believes that a cheap cynical nose is a sound substitute for intelligence. "Literature" of that type is unwanted; moreover, it is undesirable. The English employed by its writers is not always of the highest standard; the characterisation is weak; the "plot" absurd. Until such time as the authorities cease to interfere with writers like Shaw, Masfield and Ibsen, and turn their attention to the female filth-mongers, the remedy must remain with the public. A boycott of the problem novel, with the consequent fall in revenue, would cure its authors of their "soul's mission" much more rapidly than any attempt at argument.

In Russia it is said that no fewer than 400 women are known to be bearing arms. One of these heroines is a colonel in a Cossack regiment, and many have covered themselves with honours by their bravery. The number of women fighters is said to be owing to the absence of sex antagonism in Russia. Men and women work together as comrades more than in Western Europe.

Sports and Pastimes

THE TURF

PALERMO

The results of the racing at Palermo on Sunday were, for the most part, logical. An interesting programme with plenty of runners pleased the public well enough. There is not over much to be said concerning the Classic. The whole story is told by the one statement that shows the time for the Classic as 3.15 4/5. Capullo beat Picacero by half a neck, with Bombazo, the only other entry, two lengths behind.

It was not the riding of Mingo that really won this event, it was the riding of Ardouin that lost it. No race could possibly have been run at Palermo more in the favour of Capullo than this one was.

The pace was an absolute crawl until the last 1000 metres. In fact, one can describe the event thus: Bombazo leading from Picacero with Capullo last, had a canter round the track to loosen their limbs before entering upon a race over 1000 metres, in which Capullo just got home.

No, Mr. Ardouin, your riding may have been all right, but your tactics were all wrong. After winning the Premio Comparacion, and showing your mount in perfect form, why if you had wanted to win this last Sunday's race, did not you go right ahead and do so, and run the others off their legs, which you could have done, and let them try to catch you?

There is nothing more to be said about it. There should have been but one result, if the race had been run in even 3.11, say. Imagine a horse like Gringuito doing it in 3.11 1-5 the same day. No, the whole trouble was that there was nothing to make the pace, and we feel sure that the further the horses travelled the more Mingo must have smiled. Every inch they went was in his favour, but would not have been if Ardouin had ridden out and risked making his own running. The race was a colourless farce.

Beethoven was in one of his good moods, and smashed up all opposition in the first race, which he won in a canter from Sanchez, the favourite, by 1 1/2 lengths.

Lanatti rode the winner for a change, and they certainly seemed to suit one another. Beethoven could and would have won many races more than he has done, were he not such a rogue. This event showed plainly, what we have often claimed, that Beethoven could win when he wanted to.

Uriburu's running did not surprise us. He is a crock, and mule-minded, too. Congrio was not trying. Pegaso's exhibition was genuinely rotten.

At the last moment David Englander decided to ride Santa Ines in the second race, and scored a popular win. The filly cantered in easily in front of Augusta, and considering everything, paid a nice dividend of $5. Saavedra brought Camboatá in fourth.

Our "speshul" was the third event in hollow style. Centauro beat Pushing and Bataclan with ease. The public fastened upon the latter, in view of his recent performances, and made him a scorching favourite. Wotan's brother, however, proved himself much superior. Leonem's running was the surprise. He never seemed to try, or if he did he has gone off shockingly, nevertheless he will spring it on us one of these days, and don't forget it.

The class mare of the fourth race won an exciting race from Riparia by half a neck. Debutante has been running down the course for a long time. She had no form whatever, but a glance at the entries will show that really she had very little to beat. Ermita never tried a yard from a good start, and let the public down by running fourth, the most usual place for a failing favourite. Patrulla belted round the course, but still she ran.

Nowhere, of course, and so the poor public lost some 6,500 dollars. All these things however are in the ordinary luck of racing, and no one can complain.

Fachinero was a snip for the sixth race, and cantered in a winner by 2 1/2 lengths from Despota III. Domingo Siete, who did the distance in almost similar going last time out in 1.5 3/5, was nowhere. Is it possible that in so short a time he has gone off some 5 seconds over 1100 metres? Let such a yarn be told to the Germans, who believe and swallow anything just now, especially if official.

Jesus Bastias and Domingo Siete we should have thought better things of you, and shall hope for them the next Sunday you are together.

Aguerrido was logically a good thing for the seventh race, and proved that he was all right. Retrecherro, however, ran a poor race, and really should have contested every inch of the going with Aguerrido on past form. Persil ran a good second, and the time, 1.51 2/5, was fairly fast.

The last event was undoubtedly between Gringuito and Siskin. The latter should have won after his last 3000 metre run, but no, he could do no better than third, and allow Gringuito to win by threequarters of a length from Podesta, a rank outsider, who paid $10.80 for a place. Siskin was two lengths away.

It was a feeble finish to a goodish day, and nothing will convince us that Siskin showed his proper form. This, however, does not detract from Gringuito's performance, which was perfectly consistent.

Acosta is showing himself a bit of a mascot in this last race of the day.

SOME INTERESTING NOTES.

Ocurrencia.—It has been decided to run Ocurrencia in the Premio Classic Palermo on Sunday next. The prize is one of $18,836, $3096 to the second, and $1548 to the third. This event promises to be of the most sensational character, if only the filly is in proper trim. It is a race, weight for age, over the mile, and Ocurrencia has to meet the unbeaten Pan Pan, as well as Mustafa, Last Reason, Evoe, Wotan again, and five others, who have notified their inscriptions. Ocurrencia was originally to have been reserved for the Classic on December 19, but as she is considered well again, she is to run in both classics. Against Pan Pan over the mile! Sounds sensational, doesn't it?

Lanatti.—In the coming season this jockey is to ride officially for the El Talar Stud.

Real San Carlos Races.—Shortly races will be run each Sunday at Real San Carlos. Prizes will be for $500 gold, and races will not exceed 1200 metres. They should provide a considerable attraction.

RÓSARIO

The great event at the Hippodrome Independencia on Sunday was the Grand Classic, Carlos Pellegrini. A wonderful race was run, which ended in a dead heat between the crack Mi Nene and Lord Bramble. The ovation the jockeys received was stupendous. Ibarra, the jockey of Lord Bramble, received a public tribute which should live long in his memory.

The great feature other than this was the riding of Pablo Claverle. He brought off four races, the second and fourth with the same horse—Topacio II. He also rode Resorte and Ambicioso to victory.

It is unfortunate, that after the big race, Mi Nene hurt herself about the legs.

LA PLATA

Sunday's racing at La Plata was only of a very ordinary character, and with the exception of the Classic, provided the minimum of sport.

The classic was won from point to point by Diorita, who was very well ridden by Justo Pena. With the exception of this, the meeting was colourless.

Results in detail were:—

DANIEL CARDOSO

The trainer and jockey Daniel Cardoso has recovered sufficiently from his recent accident for him to be removed from the hospital to his private house yesterday. It will be remembered that while riding Prologo at La Plata in the classic event on November 19, the horse fell and the jockey received some injuries from the horse Hidrato, who was following. It is not expected that Cardoso will be able to be in the saddle at Palermo for at least another fortnight.

SMASHER

Although progressing favourably, it is stated that Smasher, the famous racehorse, who underwent the serious operation of removal of the lower part of his off hind leg a short time ago has been showing some signs of shock due to the operation.

The veterinary surgeons state, however, that his progress is normal, and expect that in another week's time his nervous system will have again regulated itself. Smasher has been rather restless and has been feeding none too well.

LAWN TENNIS

MARMOL L.T.C.

Only two matches were played on Sunday afternoon in the tournament now taking place at the Marmol Club. In spite of perfect weather, or because of this, there were very few people on the courts. Grant beat Chapman and Nugent beat Wright, and this was the result of the day's play.

Nugent —3/6, 15 beat Wright 6—0, 6—4.

BUENOS AIRES BOXING CLUB

An entertaining programme, consisting of seven exhibition boxing bouts, had been arranged for Sunday evening on the premises of the Buenos Aires Boxing Club. These provided some good sport. The training of the competitors had been in the capable hands of Willie Gould. Señor Passo shared with Engineer Mascias the duties of referee, while Señor Gandulfo was the time-keeper.

Competitors met at weights ranging from 50 to 73 kilos, and were well matched to give entertainment. These were:—

(1) D. Sansome v. L. A. Polero. Both at 50 kilos. The latter finished the better.

(2) Julio Perez 50 v. Oscar C. Wiurnos 54, a poor bout, in which Perez was superior.

(3) Rafael Elizalde 57 v. Alfredo Bringas 60. A good bout, with some boxing in it. Elizalde was the stronger, but Bringas used the right well.

(4) Rodolfo Mongiardini 65 v. E. R. Oyomi 66. A nice entertaining bout.

(5) E. Wolff 69 v. Jaime Carbonell 73. The heavier man had the better of a nice bout.

(6) E. Frescara v. L. Lascona. A poor bout.

(7) McCarthy v. Gallardo. The best bout of the evening, with some good clean work shown.

The arrangements were much superior to those of the meeting before. As for the boxing, there was too much tendency in some of the bouts, which were only exhibition bouts, after all, to close in and not stand up and box. It was an enjoyable evening.

CRICKET

HURLINGHAM v. B.A.C.C.

Yesterday was well nigh an ideal one for cricket, and even the Buenos Aires cricket ground at Palermo had recovered splendidly after the rains of Friday and Saturday, albeit still remaining a wicket in favour of the attack.

Hurlingham were the visitors, and it is a question whether when winning the toss and electing to bat, that a mistake was not made. Hurlingham had the worst of the wicket, and although as the afternoon wore on the wicket improved, this improvement was not really very marked, still there was an improvement.

Each side played twelve men. Hurlingham sent in Jackson and Powell-Jones to face Brandon and Emerson.

Jackson scored off Brandon—a single, but Powell-Jones failed in the next over. Mold filled the vacancy, and in his usual slow and steady style played most carefully. Jackson was out to Emerson shortly after this, and another disaster occurred when the Hurlingham captain got out first ball. Little could be done with the bowling, and Mold was the only batsman to put up any decent score. His 47 was invaluable. Shoyer assisted with 27, and the innings closed for 112. Brandon had bowled exceedingly well, and finished up with 7 wickets for 31.

Buenos Aires also started disastrously, and lost Brown and Hooton, when the score was only 12. Five runs later Ayling was out. Gardom again was successful and caught and bowled Thomas, so that four wickets were down for 27. Play continued slowly, and after Emerson was bowled by Jackson, it looked as though Hurlingham were going to score an easy win. McHeard and Boyd however, stopped the rot, and with Brandon taking a hand and helping the latter, the score mounted up. The innings closed for 120, without Young batting. It was a good game, but somewhat slow. The full scores were:

BELGRANO II. v. BANFIELD.

At Belgrano. The wicket was good, and the weather perfect. The home eleven batted first, and after a slow opening, began well enough. When Robinson and Griffin got together, the whole complexion of the game changed. Runs came apace, and by excellent play all round the wicket, frequently finding the boundary, these two rattled up the score to 147, and remained united when the innings was declared closed. Robinson 62, and Griffin 54 not out.

Banfield commenced well enough, although Fairclough was soon bowled by Hughes. Hearne joining Edgecombe. The latter then lost his wicket, and after another quarter of an hour's steady play, a rot set in, and the remainder of the game became a procession. The score was only 44 when the last man was bowled by Hughes, who came out with the fine average of 7 wickets for 18.

BASEBALL

ARMOUR'S v. FRIGORIFICO ARGENTINO.

The fifth game of the league series between the Giants and Beavers chronicled twelve to eleven runs at the end of the seventh inning, on Sunday, at La Plata, favouring the Giants. But in the eighth the Giants, who had been at work hard and persistently with the bat from the beginning made a sudden newly-awakened dash at the pill and scored eight successive runs, before the Beavers captured the bat in an effort to redeem their loss—but all in vain. The score was 20 to 12, which makes the series more one-sided than ever. For the Giants now credit themselves with having played five game and won each one.

The champions raced away with 3 runs to the Beavers 1 in the first inning, then the honours were pretty evenly divided until the eighth inning when balls began raining down upon the Beavers. This inning broke the deadlock. Until that inning, it was a stubborn, close and unyielding game, but after that fatal inning the Beavers went up in the air.

However, the game may be classed as the best of the season. It was a real combat, with both teams playing hard and capably and with vigour and dash, with a fillip of breathing moments and legerdemain feats in the field. It was absorbing right down to a fine catch by Mason which deprived McEnnelly of a chance for his life, for that savagely driven fly ball was well on its way to the bleachers when the fleet moulder leaped into the air and smothered the ball overhead.

It was a close issue from the start, snappily played in every inning and growing in interest as the innings came and went. It held the attention of all the spectators to the end, and in the latter innings when everything that happened took on additional importance, the eyes of the public were fixed upon the contestants on the field. It was a good, clean, lively game, which to the fan was enough tiptop ball playing to appeal to that fine discrimination which, as a genuine fan, is his.

The most influential battling integer of the group engaged was though strange to say, the pitcher of the losing team, Phillips.

He is stocky, deliberate, crafty and although only operating in his second game he pitched with consummate skill.

No contesting pitcher can be equalled in that cool, calculating, consistent merit which belongs to him solely. Moreover, not only did he show marked handicraft as a twirler but he hit with surprising force.

He lost this game, simply because he had no support; but all felt that he was a power on the mound just the same.

The Giants made twenty hits off Phillips; the Beavers peppered Lo-

Reyes, A. Betular, F. Olazar, R. Pepe, Z. Canaveri, A. Ohaco, L. Vivaldi, J. Hospital, J. J. Perinetti.

Est de La Plata.—Barcos, Pastor, Galup Lanus, Loustanan, Duarte, Indart, Aranguren, Lamas, Lascano, Leonardi, Tolosa, Valenciani.

In the first half Ohaco scored twice and Olazar once.

Pastor and Leonardi, two La Plata men, were ordered off the field, and did not take part in the second half, in which Hospital scored the fourth goal.

HURACAN v. RIVER PLATE.

Played at Avenida La Plata before an immense number of spectators, this game ended in a pointless draw.

The teams were:—
Huracan.—F. Pazos, A. Alberti, A. Palacios, M. Fontana, M. Bassadone, N. Carabelli, E. Acevedo, J. Laguna, D. Abantangelo, M. Saverredi, L. Caldera.
River Plate.—C. Irola, A. Chiappe, P. Calneggia, A. Aioldi, C. Garcia, C. Simons, P. Praza, A. Peruzzi, A. Penney, A. Penza, A. Ameal.
Referee, H. Oury.

pez; the swarthy side arm master of the Giants, who was supported by Wilson and Mason, for sixteen. It was largely a pitcher's battle, nevertheless although these three men on the mound had the numerical advantage, Phillips, was still a hard nut to score on.

In most of his innings, Phillips was adequately effective but his support was as near nothing as anything human can be. Brilliant hits were made by McEnnelly and Reymeyer and Kemp, the swatters for the visitors, with four and three hits respectively; good catches in the outfield by Reymeyer.

The fielding of the Giants was fast, devouring, above reproach.

It is difficult to select any individual star in the field as they all pretty well contribute in maintaining uniformity of skill.

The Beavers, on the other hand, only at rare intervals exhibited sensational feats.

McEnnelly, Reymeyer and Kemp starred at the bat. McEnnelly is also a remarkable player in his own way. On the defensive he proved a corker; he caught a puzzling fly after losing it in the sun twice on Sunday.

A very unfortunate and regrettable accident occurred to Kemp, the Beaver's star left fielder, who after making a beautiful single attempted to pilfer second, fell and wrenched his knee cap. He will be out of the game for several weeks and his loss will be keenly felt by the Beavers, especially at this time when they are playing such wonderful ball.

Phillips took his time, weighed every situation as it related to the batter who happened to be up, had speed and faultless control until that unlucky inning, the eighth.

He could skim the corners of the plate with hairline accuracy whenever he chose to work the corners, which was often. His fast ball and his curve were equally well controlled and he gave only one base on balls. He wasn't in the hole at all except the eighth inning, and when he was at his very best he burned the ball through on the corners and struck out such men as O'Keefe and Galloway, as if they were children.

Wilson of the Giants allowed Kemp to strike a soft one, after two balls had passed, who reached first. This was the first inning.

Three balls, it seems were often called on Wilson, as he wasn't in a position to work batters nearly as often as was Lopez at the final, who generally had the strategical better of the hitters. A low pitch which came on the inside fooled the Beavers not a little. Hitlin poled one out to centre and pilfered, Herrod nerved himself for an assault, skimped to the bat and struck the pill with considerable force. Hitlin came in safely. Reymeyer went Wilson to Rehle; and the first run was scored. Gooley soaked the first pitch for a single. Wilson also singled, Stratton went Hitlin to Reymeyer, Gooley and Wilson scored on Galloway's single. Galloway out stealing. Gotman hoisted one over centre for the circuit. Gambes ended by striking out three runs.

This was an interesting inning, so was the fifth:

Phillips doubled and got forced by Kemp. Wilson got his first strike out by whiffing Hitlin, Kemp stole, and came home on Reymeyer's double, who stole third and came home on one. Herrod bounced to centre, scoring Reymeyer. Herrod reached second on passed ball and tried to reach home on a long swat by Tuthil, but failed—2 runs. Reymeyer caught Yehle's fly. Gooley out Herrod to Reymeyer, and Lopez started to warm up; also Mason. Phillips could not find the plate for Wilson and Stratton went Phillips to Reymeyer—0 runs.

Those were the two most interesting innings

The Giants hit Phillips hardest in the midgame and final stage.

The playing was of a more natural gait on Sunday than when they played the last time. It was not over-careful as in their former grapple; it was without the constraint. The players opened out more, went at it in a systematic form.

The Giants shelved the sacrifice as a factor for intermediate advance and took up the run and hit. They tried stealing a bit, too, and one play involving work of that sort helped them to a number of runs. They had a more versatile, resourceful attack than the Beavers, who were rather clamped down by the excellent team work of their rivals.

Let us begin with the state of the weather—the day that was snappy and fair, with hundred of rooters all gathered together enjoying the sun and the air, and then let us say—it's a thing we should mention—a knowledge we are willing to share, a fact that is worthy of all your attention—the impossible has happened—the Giants have won again.

And when the game was over they were greeted with large and with joyous acclaim—and how that they're properly welcomed and seated we'll try to go on with this famous Giant v. Beaver game which took place at La Plata on Sunday.

Dame Fortune—who was kind when the Beavers scored a victory last game—was scant in her favours to-day for there were three pitchers this time on the Grant's squad named Wilson, Mason and Lopez, who persisted in keeping right in the way.

But they must hide in oblivion, and beg a hair of Phillips head for a legacy, in the future.

He hasn't a thing but nerves you can't rattle, quick thinking brain and soul that thrills with the ardour and fervour of battle—and, well, he has stuff and control.

An armour of confidence encases him, his twisters are slick as could be.

And that isn't all. It's just half of the story, for out of four chances at bat he walloped the sphere for three bingles, and glory! But they were real hummers at that. His pitching was flawless, and when he had done it he stood at the plate with a grin and went after hits in the contest. It's such a relief after watching the twirlers who sluggishly stand up and fan to find there is one of the classiest hurlers who wallops the pill like a man.

So great was the impression made by this classy player that the writer could not refrain to sing his fame in verse:—

All the other Giants aided, of course;

They hit the small pill with vim and with force;

They hammered the sphere with an echoing bang;

They fielded with pep and with vigour and tang.

With hand and with head and with bat and with glove,

They worried the young folks of Brotherly Love,

But the star and the bright and particular light,

Was young Mr. Phillips. Some pitcher is right.

B.A. V. LA PLATA

That which we feared to prophesy happened. The Cyclons have lost once more. The wonder is why and how this can be. Have they forgotten their old traditions?

Twelve to five. Their efforts to win sink but into insignificance. On Sunday they appeared at Talleres, framed to beat the Tigers, and they returned with another defeat attached to the long list.

We ought not to condemn them, for there is one predominating virtue which clings to them; their willingness "to be game." They do not possess the sterling team which they had last year, circumstances have altered their chances considerably, and as it is has been previously remarked, their propensity for changes is their ruination.

However, one thing has been noticed time and again; their grip in mustering their strength in final innings. A composite box score of the games which they have played will immediately show their frightful errors at the starting of a game, with gradual improvement as the game advances.

They have perhaps rightly claimed that the scorching sun on the La Plata grounds prevented them from seeing the ball. What can they say for Sunday's game?

The game was the usual thrills, the tightening moments when one gasps for air, succeeded by someone committing an error which ends in a prolonged stage of agony.

The Tigers, it may be safely said, however, do not quite live up to the reputation of such a formidable name. They are not exactly tiger-like in their movements. In fact, it may be said, that they are rather slow. At bat they show up very poorly, while the Cyclons, if there is anything they can do well, is getting a 'squat' at the pill.

There is a new discovery, this time on the side of the Tigers, and a real discovery. It is Cleveland, who caught his initial game for the Tigers. He improves the team considerably. This was his first game in three years, but it is stated that he has played professional ball in Chicago, and consequently it is not to be wondered at his professional way of handling the pitcher and the rest of the group.

The remainder of his team are placing feathers in their hats, congratulating themselves upon this pick, which they hope will rival in fame, Phillips of the Beavers.

Wright pitched for the Tigers, giving Schick a rest. He played fair. Cronin first started catching, but later shifted to third base.

Noonan and Houston played with their usual "forte," aided by the ever-confident Tuero and Volkening.

The game was well played.

FAMOUS U.S. NOVELIST

TO VISIT SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. Cyrus Brady, son of the distinguished American novelist Dr. Cyrus T. Brady, has arrived in Buenos Aires by the s.s. Voltaire.

This is his second visit to South America, and this time he has come to stay. His father, who is at present engaged in completing some important literary work, is expected to make a trip in a very short time to South America for the purpose of gathering writing material for a book on the "Gauche" of the South.

Dr. Brady can be classed as the founder of the comparatively new school of literature in the United States which deals with scenes of the primitive life in the West. He has also become popular in writing seafaring stories.

In his works he has, no doubt, been aided by his vast experiences as a traveller.

When he first commenced his literary labours, no one suspected the ability of the Doctor of Law. Few people noticed some stories about Western ranchmen, cowboys, gamblers, or miners which found their way in the Cosmopolitan and other American magazines.

It was not until "The Baby of the Frontier" appeared that the critics were suddenly aroused. From being totally obscure, Dr. Brady suddenly found himself the mouthpiece of the American public. The Brady stories of the true West were eagerly snatched as soon as they were published, and so strong was his influence over the minds of the public, as well as the critics, that he was styled "The writer of the real West."

He was, indeed, one of the very few authors who wrote realistic stories about the West, and he was consequently able to create a more genuine conception of the crude, honest cowboy of Texas and Arizona in the minds of the Easterners.

But Dr. Brady was not entirely satisfied in producing Western types. His versatility soon caused him to seek another direction—and he found that in relating adventures on the sea.

The "Quiberon Touch," a story of the English Navy, which was published in England under the title of "Little France," added new lustre to his fame.

His last work, "The Web of Steel," based on an engineering theme, is now in course of publication. It was written in collaboration with his son, Mr. Cyrus Brady, who, by the way, is a civil engineer. Mr. Cyrus Brady has contributed to this story most of the technical knowledge, and a good deal of modesty prevents him from admitting the active part he has taken in this production.

BULLION THEFT MYSTERY

No further mystery has been thrown upon the mysterious disappearance of £5,000 in gold during transit to the Republic on the R.H.L. s.s. Tubantia. The opinion is still held that the theft was committed at Falmouth during the shipment of the treasure boxes. The Royal Holland Lloyd have, in the meantime, in the handsomest manner resolved to reimburse the Caja de Conversion the amount, without prejudice to the investigation. In accordance with this intention, Mr. W. Allinson Bell, the Company's Agent, informed the Minister of Finance that the sum would be handed over at the offices in Reconquista yesterday at 11 a.m.

VENDETTA OR ROBBERY?

A MYSTERIOUS CRIME.

In a most laconic manner the police of Acebal yesterday announced the discovery of a savage crime, which is still enshrouded in mystery.

At 10.30 a.m. they discovered the body of an unknown man, who had met his death by strangling. Judging by the condition of his clothes and of other matters the motive was robbery. The police report that "in spite of every diligence we have been unable to identify the body, and we suppose that the thieves or criminals have tried to put the police off the track," and they leave the matter there. It is, however, firmly believed that the crime is one of a vendetta, and the reasons given for this theory are that, after strangling the man (in itself an unusual method for a thief) the criminals completely disfigured their victim and removed every letter or piece of paper that could identify. The affair is a most mysterious one, and special police have now been appointed to clear up the matter.

CORPSE EXHUMED

A CORDOBA TRAGEDY.

Some little time ago a sensational affair occurred at Sampacho in the Province of Cordoba in which a man named Carlos Miranda met his death. He was discovered by a police agent lying on the roadway with apparently two serious bullet wounds in the body. This was on Oct. 19. He died later in Hospital when it was discovered that there were three bullet wounds and it was apparently the one not previously noticed that was the cause of death. The case went before Doctor Castellano, the criminal judge, and after some evidence a subcommissioner of police one Julio Artiende was arrested.

A close examination of detail followed and Artiende was formerly charged and found guilty of the murder.

Yesterday afternoon information was received from Rio Cuarto stating that Dr. Castellano at the order of the Superior Tribunal had ordered an exhumation of the body and requested a further autopsy to be made by the Government Doctor Sebastian Palacio. It appears that the fatal bullet wound does not correspond to the other two. The matter is one with considerable mystery attached to it.

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN

NEW PREMISES AT INGENIERO WHITE.

It is hoped that the new church hall and reading room of the Missions to Seamen at Ingeniero White, F.C.S., will be opened during the first week of January. The cost of the building, approximately $8,500, has been entirely collected by the sailors visiting the port during the past three years.

The Southern Railway Company kindly gave the building site which lies between the Port of Galvan and Ingeniero White, and have also given other concessions. Shipmasters generally have also liberally helped, and it is believed that the new premises will materially help the Mission in its good work.

PAN AMERICAN EXPOSITION

To Be Held at Buenos Aires

PREPARATIONS FOR JULY 4, 1916

On the 4th of July, the day when fire-crackers resound throughout the United States like one huge echo, when politicians deliver patriotic addresses, when everybody, in fact, rejoices—on that memorable day a Pan-American Exposition will be formally opened in Buenos Aires next year.

Its aim is to bring about a closer commercial relationship; to exhibit each other's products and become better acquainted with each other from an educational as well as commercial sense.

The idea of holding such an Exposition originated in the minds of Sr. Eduardo Sauze, the celebrated architect, Mr. M. Ingres, of Ingres and Co., was formerly Professor at the Chicago University, and at McGill University in Montreal; Dr. A. Hale, Commercial Attaché at the American Embassy; and Mr. H. E. Finney, Gen. Manager of the Armour Frigorifico.

For a considerable time before any definite steps were taken, meetings were held, ideas were formulated, plans were drafted, messages were sent to both the Argentine and American Governments, and it was not until they received the most favourable answers from both that they decided to make this movement a reality.

On September 21, Dr. Gramajo, Buenos Aires Intendente, received Mr. Sauze at the Intendencia. Many matters appertaining to the Exposition were discussed, and it was finally agreed to concede 30,000 square metres at Palermo. This was the basis of the movement, and from that moment the Exposition was theoretically in being.

Since then, prominent Americans and Argentines have been hard at work developing the scheme.

To ensure its ultimate success it was decided that a company should be formed of influential persons.

A week ago, before a re-union of the Commercial Club, a number of those interested attended. Argentines as well as Americans participated in the discussion, and the result was that the following persons agreed to constitute the Company:—

Dr. Enrique Uriburu as President; Messrs. M. Black; H. E. Finney; W. C. Howe; A. Tuguiro; M. Ingres; Emilio Lahore; M. A. Reece; Eduardo Sauze; E. J. Sullivan, and J. W. Williams.

It is highly probable that the Constabulary Band of the Philippines Islands, which toured the world two years ago, and which figured in the St. Louis Exhibition, will play the opening march on July the Fourth.

The entrance fee will be nominal, as it will not reach beyond the "peso" mark.

The public opening of the Exposition will take place on September 1.

This afternoon the Board of Directors will be appointed.

All that progress and the human intellect can conceive will be demonstrated in one way or another at the Exposition. Monuments will be erected, pavilions of art, industry and commerce, will prevail.

Some attempt at a description of the Pan American Exposition, which, it is claimed, will be the greatest that South America has ever had, will not be out of place.

A huge pyramid named Tucuman will stand in front of the gates leading to the interior. The pavilions will be surrounded by a large wall, upon which will be engraved various devices representing the historical annals of both countries. This wall will be the outside facades of the pavilions. Upon the south facade a treatment of the "patensque period" of Spanish architecture will predominate.

The buildings of the Exposition will be fashioned by a Joint Commission composed of a number of notable architects from both countries who will work in collaboration with the colour staff, with the landscape engineers and with the lighting experts to produce a harmonious whole. Its members will labour in unison, and in its session each feature will be considered in its relation to the ensemble, yet each architect will have some definite detail.

Eduardo Sauze, the eminent Argentine architect who designed the celebrated Argentine Pavilion, which was exhibited at the San Francisco Exposition, will undertake to establish the buildings.

The Pan American Exposition will be situated in front of the Spanish monuments at Palermo, at the angle of the Alvear and Sarmiento Avenidas, and will face the Zoological Gardens.

The official pavilion, the "Union Pan American," will be surrounded by a group of monuments representing "Future."

A note of elegance will be attained by the impressive landscape and monuments. A "Tower of Argentine Independence," rising to a height of 140 metres, will enable the adventurous sightseer to reach the summit and admire from an elevation of four hundred feet, the panorama stretching before him.

No better idea could have been conceived to show the financial development of two great countries, who are comparatively young when contrasted with Europe.

It is impossible to classify or measure the wealth that will be involved. A million dollars gold is already available for the purpose, although the complete scheme has barely been in existence.

There will be scores of exhibits representing almost every phase of commercial and educational activities.

A summary of the notable exhibits include the improved methods of transportation, the motor truck, the aeroplane, improved methods in generation of power, modern-equipped engines and other internal combustion engines—the advanced methods of inter-communication, the transcontinental telephones, and the increased development of wireless.

And yet this list is in its very nature inadequate. It records but a few of the spectacular advances.

The development of the internal combustion engine records a triumph in the production of power and a relative advance in the development of transportation. The prodigious agricultural motor that will tremble and throb as it lays its own track over vast agricultural lands, and also the great motor trucks that feed the railroad branch lines and bring the far interior into direct touch with the markets of the world.

This will be illustrated by cinematograph, which, by the way, will be presented in a splendid building free of charge. This moving-picture palace will be expressly devoted to the purpose of exhibiting the developments of natural or manufactured products in South and North America.

The Exposition will also have exhibits containing models of children's playgrounds, improved factories, rooms, homes, schools, besides giant displays of manufactured steel products.

It is definitely ascertained that a live stock exhibition will be held, divided into many separate shows.

Cattle from all parts of Argentine and other sections of South America will be shown in the live stock pavilions, where the cattle from Iowa, Montana, Michigan, Nebraska, Texas, and other States will also figure prominently.

This particular pavilion, it is alleged, will cover immense space, and great prizes will be set aside for exhibitors.

Besides these exhibits mentioned there will be many Congresses and Conventions.

There will also be installed luxurious restaurants, cafés, an aquarium, and other means of entertainment. A huge amphitheatre will be one of the main features. It will have an enormous seating capacity, and plays and

PANAMA - PACIFIC EXHIBITION

ITS BEAUTY AND IMPORTANCE

INTERVIEW WITH MR A. DECK

Mr. Alfred J. Deck has just returned from a prolonged holiday in the United States. Mr. A. J. Deck is a "muy simpática" personality in the Anglo-American community of Buenos Aires, among whom it is pleasant to record there is a general feeling that, if we do owe allegiance to different governments, "we are a Jock Tamson's bairns," for, it would probably be difficult to name another city or community, outside the Parent Countries, where relations are more cordial, friendly and 'en famille' between British and Americans, than in Buenos Aires and the Argentine Republic. Mr. Deck, like many other men of ability, is modest and deprecates personal mention but it is no violation of confidence to say that his marked resemblance to the gentleman (Capital G, please) who fills the Presidential office in the Great Republic, has exposed him to malignant scowls from the Huns, who are quite unable to understand Dr. Wilson and his desire for even handed justice, even as they cannot understand his objection to indiscriminate murder.

In view of his official connection with the great San Francisco Exhibition, Mr. Deck's opinions are naturally of value. Had the war not intervened, there can be no doubt that the Great Exposition would have been a success almost beyond computation. Even as it is, it has been a financial success. All possible expenses are believed to comfortably more than covered. Although the numbers of visitors from Europe and the arrivals of eminent persons from European States has been necessarily greatly or altogether curtailed, a very large number of visitors have been noted from the Republics of South America. These were received with pleasure and special mention is due to the Argentine Vice-Consul in San Francisco, Dr. Bouttell Dunlop, for his untiring courtesy and consideration to all South American visitors.

The marvels of the great San Francisco Exhibition have been frequently dealt with before and it remains only to say that the beauty of the site, the magnificence of the buildings and the general effect as described, have not been exaggerated. The illuminations at night were veritable feats of colour; the Tower of Jewels, one of the features of the Exhibition, and an actual vision from the Arabian Nights is hung with gems costing over $100,000 (gold). The area of the Exhibition is so large that Electric and Steam cars have to be used by visitors to get about. About 75,000 have been the daily average of visitors although on state concerts will be produced there.

A pavilion devoted to "Styles" will occupy a conspicuous place, and should prove of considerable interest to adherents of the Fashion Plates.

The Armour's Pavilion will display their numerous products, and demonstrate by many scientific ways the superior system which they use in producing their wares.

In the Pavilion of Implements of Warfare will be found the new armoured motor-truck, now an important factor in the world's great war, in contrast with the heavier than air machine, which, too, is playing its deadly part in the European conflict.

Then the Steel Industry will probably be one of the most important exhibits. Every stage in the manufacture of steel will be shown in motion pictures.

This in short is a brief summary of the intentions of those now organising the great Pan American Exposition, which will open its doors to the public in September next year.

Red Cross Love Romance

ANOTHER SCANDAL IN THE AUSTRIAN COURT.

London, Nov. 25.

Details have been transmitted from Copenhagen of a love romance between Archduchess Isabella of Austria, attached to the Red Cross, and Dr. Paul Albrecht, chief of the institution.

The lady, who is 27 years of age, is the daughter of Archduke Frederick, Duke of Teschea, Silesia, and of Princess Isabel of Croye. She was divorced from Prince George of Bavaria in 1913.

The attachment of the Princess for Dr. Albrecht became known to the Austrian Imperial family, and attempts were made to persuade the Princess to break it off. The end was that the pair fled together, and were finally discovered by the police at a small place near Prague.

Requested to return to Vienna, they refused to do so until the Emperor consented to their marriage. This was given in order to avoid scandal, and, the marriage ceremony having been duly performed, the happy pair have now returned to the Austrian capital.

COMPENSATION FOR LIVES OF AMERICANS KILLED IN PANAMA

Washington, Nov. 29.

A protocol has been signed between the Governments of Panama and the United States appointing the Minister of the Netherlands at Washington to determine the amount of indemnity to be paid by Panama for the killing of several Americans in the riot which occurred at Panama on April 6, 1912.

days numbers were no doubt much higher.

On State days the Governor of the State to which the day was dedicated made an official visit; all the prominent people of the State who could do so, followed suit, and in the evening followed a grand reception and ball. The plan seems an excellent one.

Among other visitors came Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, who referred in the kindest terms to Argentina and to his visit there.

Colonel Roosevelt remarked that although he was prepared to see wonderful things and astonishing progress in Argentina, what he did see, nevertheless astounded him. The prosperity of the country and its solidity, the magnificence of the architecture and the genuineness of the prosperous conditions were all a revelation to him.

Referring to his own experiences, Mr. Deck said he had observed great changes since his last visit home. In San Francisco, for instance, all traces of the disastrous earthquake and fire had disappeared. The prosperity of California is remarkable but, indeed conditions of a similar nature prevail at present through the entire United States.

The Argentine Pavilion in the Exhibition was generally admired for its magnificent design and completeness of exhibits. The building, which cost over $200,000 for erection, will at the close of the Exhibition on Dec. 1 be made over to the U.S. Government as a Library for the use of the Army and Naval forces, a graceful gift much appreciated. The Canadian Pavilion rivalled the Argentine in magnificence. Its exhibits of products, animal life and every kind of Canadian activities, were wonderful including numerous cinemas and pictorial representations.

The general impression of the Exposition as a whole, was one of singular beauty, good taste finish and completeness.

Agricultural & Pastoral

Camp Notes

(By Our Agricultural Editor.)

In the Bahia Blanca district the commencement of the oat harvest is reported, and the crop is generally good, though some of the earlier sowings were somewhat damaged by the drought, while the later sowings had the advantage of rain just in time to foster the further growth of the plant. Oats are now more generally sown than formerly, but it is regrettable that in this climate the straw dries up too rapidly before the heads are properly filled, hence the light and inferior quality of oats produced in this Republic. It is a well-known fact that most of the oats used for the maintenance of racehorses here are imported from New Zealand, where the oats grow to perfection, the quality grown about Dunedin being equal to the best East Lothian oats in Scotland. Best quality imported oats from New Zealand are being sold at approximately three pounds sterling a bag, surely a payable price for the grower or seller.

The Direction of Statistics of the Ministry of Agriculture announces that from January 1 to November 21, the exportation of cereals from this Republic had reached the enormous quantity of 8,144,749 tons classified as follows: Wheat (and flour) 2,630,096 tons; maize 4,030,661; linseed 918,670, and oats 565,322 tons.

Very favourable reports have been received from the south of the Province of Buenos Aires regarding the forthcoming harvest, the prospects being considered very good for both wheat and oats.

Statistical returns show a considerable increase in the number of pigs being exported from this Republic. The interest lately shown by several of the freezing companies in acquiring all the suitable pigs they possibly can for export, will no doubt stimulate feeders here to cater more for the requirements of these buyers, and turn out pigs of a size and quality which will commend themselves to the home butchers, and maintain and increase the demand for Argentine pork. For the more general feeding of pigs in this country it is necessary that greater attention should be given to this most important and lucrative branch of the agriculturist's business. I say agriculturist's because it is necessary that a certain area must be cultivated and sown with the required feeding stuffs, for the successful and economical production of "porkers." The system of turning the pigs out on the alfalfa, without, in many cases, giving them any supplementary ration is simply wasting time and not utilising the capital to the best advantage. It has formerly been the more general custom to grow them big, then finish off with maize, and when heavy weights and great fatness had been attained the pigs were sold, and commanded good prices. This was because the class bred and reared was the most suitable to usage in this part of the world, where what little lean meat they had was destined for one purpose, while the great quantity of fat was carefully kept apart and was highly prized for other purposes. Such a carcass of pork would not be an acceptable one for the home trade where the animals best adapted for the family butchers' trade command far higher prices than big, heavy fatty carcasses which would be acquired by the sausage men at a much lower value. It is as necessary with the pig as with the calf or lamb, that the milk flesh should never be lost, or the same quality of a carcass animal will never be attained. When the pigs are parted from the sow they require to be carefully tended, with a good shelter and preferably dry boarding to lie upon, while they are also very partial to a mud bath in summer should such be available. The proper attention to the young pigs from the time they are weaned will ensure their being marketed at an earlier date and give more satisfaction alike to buyer and shipper. The latter will be able to pay a firmer price, knowing that the quality of his goods commend them to purchasers on any meat market in the United Kingdom.

There are generally some conditional clauses to the success of any industry, and one about the pig business is if the pigs in this Republic were more free from "tuberculosis" higher prices could also be paid by the buyer who runs a great risk and corresponding loss to the numbers seized under the strict veterinary inspection ruling here. Some effort ought to be made by owners of large herds of pigs to ascertain the health of their stock, or they should take means for reducing the abnormally high percentage of pigs affected with tuberculosis and only discovered when the animals are slaughtered, with an attendant heavy loss to the purchaser.

This season's wool trade opened under most favourable conditions, a firm demand being experienced for all classes of wool on offer, but the initial enthusiasm has now disappeared, and buyers are now not operating at all. The enormous quantity of over ten million kilos of wool is at present deposited in the Central markets awaiting sale, but with the unfavourable prospects this quantity is likely to be considerably augmented in the near future as more of this season's shearing comes to hand. This market only has a storage capacity for sixteen million kilos, so it is predicted that the management of the market may order its being closed for the reception of further consignments of wool, so unfavourable are the present conditions for effecting sales, at anything near the former high values ruling earlier in the season. This is another notable example of the advantage of selling when values are high, and of letting the next man take his risk of the market fluctuations, which buyers of such commodities ought to understand better than the camp man, who when his produce realises a good price, can utilise his increased capital to better advantage than if he refuses a sound price for his goods and takes the chance of the market. I have found this a sound policy in the past, and it would appear to be still more applicable to the precarious position of markets in such times as the present.

Writing about the advantage of accepting a sound price for goods or animals, more than one estanciero is now regretting not having accepted the price offered for lots of fat steers, some few weeks ago, and would consider themselves fortunate if they could now sell their cattle at anything near the previous offer, as the price of beef for export is also receding, though lighter weighted animals for the city trade, in this warm weather have not suffered so much of a decline from former quotations. Sheep of all classes have also been selling at lower values than last week.

The best sale in the history of Shire horse breeding was held lately at Tring Park, in Herts. when the late Lord Rothschild's stud was dispersed. The sale realised £26,538 5s. for 47 head, an average of £560 8s. 7d.

PORTS CLOSED IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

This much-debated question will now be settled by the recent order in Britain, absolutely prohibiting the exportation of any class of stock. This will cause no little concern to the numerous firms engaged in the importing of pedigree farm stock from Britain and also to many estancieros here who had placed important commissions for the acquisition of specially high-class sires for competing at the forthcoming International Show next year, and for service at their stud farms. The cable announcing this decision on the part of the home authorities does not specify whether these measures have been found necessary through a fresh outbreak of disease or as a preventive measure for the conservation of the live stock in Britain.

The closing of the ports for the exportation of live stock will have the effect of hardening values here for the sale of camp bulls, which are not now so easily picked up. For those estancieros in the Northern zones, The Forestal, Limited, offer a very good class of well bred and hardy bulls, well adapted for other camps in the "garripata" zone, if supplied from their Northern camps, while the bulls bred at Santa Catalina are descended from cows acquired from some of the best known and oldest cabanas in the Province of Santa Fé, for many years well known for the excellence of their stock, which has now passed into the ownership of The Forestal, where their reputation has been further enhanced, through the high quality of the sires purchased and the careful and expert handling of same.

PALM KERNEL CAKE.

The results of the experiments carried out by the West of Scotland College at Crichton Farm, Dumfries, supply further testimony to the economic value of palm kernel cake as a concentrated food for fattening cattle. It was tested in comparison with decorticated cotton cake, crushed oats, and bran, and gave a good account of itself as part of the concentrated ration. The cattle employed in the experiment were Ayrshire bullocks, and liberal returns were, therefore, not to be expected; but the average weekly gain in live weight per animal of the palm kernel cake lot was 3lb., compared with 11lb. from cotton cake and crushed oats, and 7.2lb. from bran, which, like the palm kernel cake, was given in conjunction with smaller mixtures of cotton cake and crushed oats. The lower price of the palm kernel cake improved its position from a financial aspect, the cost per lb. of the increased weight in its case being 4 3/4d., compared with 4d. and 6 1/2d. respectively. Professor Paterson, after remarking that 3lb. of palm nut cake give a better return than 4lb. of bran, affirms that the result on the whole proves palm nut cake to be a valuable addition to our list of feeding stuffs. The cattle did not take readily to it at first, and he suggests that if it could be made more appetising by the inclusion of molasses or some such substance, its value would be enhanced.

The Garden and Orchard

HINTS TO AMATEURS.

(By The Rustic.)

Garden.—Having nurseries prepared for them, the following seeds may be sown now, and during next month: Anemone, Asther, Balsamine, Convolvulus, Centaurea, Cyclamen, Carnation, Chrysanthemum, Gypsophila, Pelargonium, Primulus, Wallflower, and Stock, Mignonette, Violet, Verbena, etc. If grafts have been made, these should be watched carefully, and where they have taken, the binding should be removed, and labels put on with the name of the variety grafted. Also all plants destined for seed should be selected and marked. All bulbs which have finished flowering must be removed, stored and classified. The most practical and economical labels for plants and flowers are the wooden yellow slips found at any seed store, and which if marked with ordinary pencil, will last quite a long time without rubbing off. A general digging up of beds, and the other operations indicated in our last issue should be continued.

Orchard.—Should the ploughing of the orchard not have been effected yet, this must be done at once, and in the case of small plantations, where artificial irrigation is possible, the ground round the trees should be arranged so as to water them. The object of ploughing or digging up round plantations is, of course, to put down the weeds, to turn over the soil and favour its oxygenation and to destroy the insects living in the soil. This operation should be commenced in the Spring and continued during the whole of the summer. In the nine districts of this country as many as four distinct ploughings are made, three of them between the months of October and February, and one in the winter, after the fall of the leaves. The necessity of thinning the fruit trees of excessive vegetation cannot be too much recommended here, specially where the winter pruning has not been properly done. This operation must be carefully carried out, the idea being to remove all unfruitful branches where these are excessive, without destroying those on which the winter pruning is to be made, and with the object of giving ventilation and light to the plant and fruit on same.

Plagues and Insects.—The present hot and damp weather is very favourable to the development of cryptogams. We notice the daily and rapid development of these plagues, so cannot recommend too strongly the spraying with Bouillie Bordalaise, as described in our last issue. For the destruction of insect plagues a very simple method can be employed, and which consists in placing in different parts of the garden or orchard at night tubs or barrels or any other vessels with a large open surface containing water to which has been added some poison, such as a little kerosene, or disinfectant, and suspending over same a lighted lamp. The light will attract all flying insects, and these will fly round the lamp and eventually fall into the liquid and get drowned. Those cheap acetylene lamps sold in the market, protected by a suitable tube, would do admirably for the purpose.

GENERAL INFORMATION.

Though the weather does not so far promise a scarcity of rain, it is not amiss to give a few hints on the irrigation of trees or vegetables on a more or less extensive scale. Referring to the work of cultivation, under the Orchard heading, when ploughing the ground it can be prepared for irrigating the trees by leaving furrows between each row and which can afterwards be finished off with the hoe. This is of course for irrigation where the land is flat and has a certain fall to allow the water to run, and also where large deposits of water such as Australian tanks are available. As the plantations of trees are generally too wide apart for one furrow to give sufficient water to reach the roots, two furrows could be made between each row, or what would be more effective though perhaps more expensive, would be to make one furrow by hand at the foot of each row of trees. The water should be run off into these furrows from distributing canals leading from the water source and run down until the limit is reached, then cut off, and a dam thrown across at a certain distance from the end, the water let in again and so on. As economy of water is the first consideration where regular supply is not obtainable, irrigation should be carried on at night, because during the day the amount of water which is evaporated by the sun is very considerable and besides, as the water is not running continually over the ground, there is the danger of the roots getting scalded. Of course the looser the soil is the more effective will be the irrigation. About the quantity of water required it is difficult to say, as it depends on many causes. If there has been a good rainfall during the winter, less water will be needed, as the subsoil will be damp. The class of soil is another factor; sandy soils absorb large amounts of water, whereas compact soils do not require so much. In high parts of the country the evaporation is greater than in lands which are nearer the level of the sea. The fall in the ground carries the water quicker, and therefore more is required to soak the earth than in ground where it can run at a gentle speed.

Another means of irrigation, less elaborate, and suitable for small plantations of trees is the employment of watering carts. These can be obtained on the market, and are generally sold with the thresher sets. They consist of a cylindrical tank mounted on a couple of wheels, and can be drawn by one horse. But a watering tank can easily be made by mounting a barrel of, say 400 litres capacity, on wheels. These watering carts are often seen in use on estancias for carting drinking water. The trees should be prepared first for watering, by making a hollow round each plant well dug up and with a border to contain the water. Each cart should be provided with two cans, such as empty kerosene tins, with handles to them. The cart runs down the row, and two men or boys pour the water on each tree at either side. This system has been carried out in the vineyards of the north of Entre Rios, during seasons of drought, and although an expensive process, has saved the crops. The irrigation, of course, should be done systematically, by dividing up the plantations into sections, extending in accordance with the quantity of water available, so that each section gets its turn at least every fifteen days.

BRITISH JOBS FOR GERMANS

A TRELEW PROTEST

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—I wish to put on record in your widely read paper the following facts:—

The Ferrocarril Central del Chubut, an English concern, has recently opened up the new extension from Gaiman to the Upper Valley. To deal with cargo at the new terminus a galpon is required. The manager of said Company is the British Vice-Consul in Madryn, who was prominently noticed in your columns about twelve months ago on account of his connection with German shipping interests.

There is no lack of skilled carpenters in Chubut: British, Italian, Russian, Spanish and others, many of these being established in Trelew, and all within reach of the F.C.C.C., but none have been called upon to tender for the new galpon.

The man who is actually erecting the galpon is a German.

Why is this?

As a British subject I challenge our Vice-Consul to reply through your columns.

Yours, etc.

PACKING FOR EXPORT

How the American Government Aids Shippers

OUTSIDE STRENGTH AND INSIDE BEAUTY

In a recent number of the "Exporters' and Importers' Journal," there is an article dealing with the question of packing goods for export that is as interesting as it is instructive. Writing naturally from the American point of view, it states that it is not too much to say that the Yankees have in recent years brought home to many a retail merchant in foreign parts a new conception of the importance of inside packing. Naturally, your average foreign merchant has, from time out of mind, realised the importance of packing that would insure the arrival at his warehouse of goods in good condition. But he has not in many instances had any conception of the extent to which attractive inside packing would aid him in the sale of goods. That is where twentieth century Yankee practice has proven a revelation. Neck-wear, gloves, hosiery and a hundred and one American specialties have been put out in decorative boxes, edged with lace paper or embossed paper, and neatly tied with silk ribbons. Naturally women purchasers, the world over, have been attracted to the goods. The Americans have by the same method gained the lead in fancy boxed stationery and in the beautiful silk-lined cases in which American safety razors are delivered to purchasers.

Along with this appeal to the eye in the case of many classes of inside packing, has gone an appeal to the palate in the packing of other articles, notably food products. Chocolates and other confections are, in quantities as small as one pound, going out from American factories in tin boxes, and all the American biscuits and crackers which bid fair to quite crowd the English article out of the market are obtainable in the small-size tins that conserve all the flavour for the ultimate consumer.

Government Standard Cases.

In addition to the efforts for self-improvement on the part of almost every firm in the United States charged with the responsibility for packing goods for trans-oceanic transit, there are in the republic a number of public or governmental agencies that are conscientiously labouring in the cause of better packing. For example, the United States Government Forest Service, which is concerned with the proper utilisation of wood and wood products, is constantly conducting exhaustive tests as to the relative strength of packing cases of various sizes and forms. The United States Interstate Commerce Commission, which has supervisory control over traffic on the railroads and inland waterways of the United States (and thus has temporary jurisdiction over shipments en route to foreign countries), has also devoted, of late, much attention to ways and means of packing, and has recently framed what are accounted ideal specifications for various classes of packing boxes, and especially has prescribed proper containers for ammunition and explosives, which have latterly come to form such an important item in international trade.

Potatoes for South America.

One of the recent discoveries of the experts on packing is that for the shipment of potatoes, etc., to countries, such as those in South America, a crate is a type of container that is preferable to a barrel, such as has been extensively employed in the past. Export crates, such as are coming into extensive use, are octagonal in shape and consequently easy to handle. There are two standard sizes, one holding 66 pounds or 30 kilos net, and the other 110 pounds or 50 kilos net. Such crates are, as a rule constructed of one-half-inch slats of yellow pine of similar material, and the ends of the crate are strapped with bands of soft hoop iron. Not the least of the virtues of this style of crate is that proper ventilation is assured, no matter in what form the crates may be stacked.

Ingenious Fruit Receptacles.

A recent, rather notable, event in the progress of packing methods was the invention of an ingenious new type of container that is especially adapted to use as a receptacle for fruit intended for shipment. This innovation is designed to get around the disadvantages of the ordinary barrel, and at the same time to dodge the rather high cost of boxing for certain farm and orchard products. It is, in effect, a partitioned barrel, so divided into equal parts by partitions as to permit it being sawed in two, thus making two barrels. This new style container has the advantage that it can be made of cheap lumber, shipped in "knock down" form and readily assembled at the packing house. Furthermore the firmness imparted by the central partitions permits the fruit to be shipped without wrapping, if that is deemed desirable. Finally, purchasers may be supplied with two varieties of fruit in the one container.

In short, the whole question of packing for export is now receiving scientific study, and it is safe to assume that the results will be surprisingly satisfactory.

Annual General Meeting

MR. SIMSON'S ADDRESS

On Wednesday, October 27, the Ordinary General Meeting of the Buenos Aires Great Southern Railway, Ltd., was held at River Plate House, Finsbury Circus, London, E.C., Mr. David Simson, M.Inst.C.E., the Chairman of the Company, presiding. The Secretary having read the Notice and the Auditor's Report, the Chairman addressed the meeting.

He made feeling reference to the absence of Mr. J. Percy Clarke under medical advice. He had lately suffered double bereavement by the death of two sons in the trenches. The Hon. Windham Baring was also absent, serving his country in the field.

In the course of his report, the Chairman said he thought it was no exaggeration to say that the financial year under review had been the most eventful one in the history of the Company, and though the results made but a poor showing, they are much better than could have been expected had they been told, say, eighteen months ago, that the country was soon to be involved in the greatest war the world had ever known. Many a time in years gone by when he resided in Argentina, they used to speculate on the effect of a European war, in which England was involved, on that country and the railway industry there, and the conclusion invariably came to was rather a pessimistic one, bearing in mind the fact that practically all its fuel had to be brought from over the seas, that its wealth depends principally on the export of its products to Europe, and that the capital to develop it comes from there also, for they never dreamt that our Navy would so quickly sweep the seas of the enemy cruisers as it has done. (Hear, hear.) Had it not been for the wonderful work of the British Navy, they would have had to go without a dividend on this occasion, for the simple reason that there would have been extreme difficulty in getting fuel, and the exports from Argentina would have been so reduced that they would barely have covered working expenses, because the British Mercantile Marine would have had the greatest difficulty in keeping the seas. As it was, the working had been a source of great anxiety.

Notwithstanding these drawbacks, the results for the year would have been better than they are had it not been that the war came on the top of nearly two very bad financial years for Argentina, with the result that the country had become impoverished, and the sudden stoppage of credit made the strictest economy the order of the day, and in consequence people imported much less foreign goods than usual. Indeed, in any case, they could hardly be expected to import goods to more than a minimum extent when they are so difficult to get, and cost 30 to 40 per cent. more than usual. They also travelled less, especially first class, so that in these two items of General Goods—for a reduction in imports means less general goods traffic—and Passengers alone they had a decrease of £436,500 over the previous year and £781,300 over the year ended June 30, 1913. This notwithstanding the fact that they had an increase in the receipts from wheat and oats of some 20 per cent., and always previously an increase in these cereal crops has been accompanied by an increase in general goods and passengers as is natural, for when the farmers have good crops they order more agricultural machinery and other general goods, and they travel more, but on this occasion they preferred to economise.

Another source of loss was that they had carried 73,000 tons less of potatoes a decrease of £55,000.

Coal is another article which shows a decrease of some 78,000 tons in weight and £29,000 in receipts, due to the absolutely prohibitive cost of this fuel to the general public out there just now. It is interesting to note in this connection that in place of coal they carried some 15,000 tons of crude petroleum, partly from the Argentine Government Oil Field at Comodoro Rivadavia, but principally from Mexico, as the Anglo-Mexican Oil Company have during the year under review opened deposits for their oil at the Buenos Aires South Dock, and began to import their oil in October, 1914. This traffic, though no doubt hampered at present by want of shipping, is bound to grow, especially if the price of oil can be kept low relative to the present high price of coal, but it is in its infancy so far.

He had now dealt with the principal decreases in their traffic. With regard to the increases, it was pleasant to note an increase of £43,700 from loose wool, and he hoped they would have a similar increase for the current year, as the prices of wool are so high at present that every pound of it will be sent to market.

Turning now to the important item of working expenses, unflinching efforts have been made by the Manager and his officers to cut down expenditure to the lowest limits, and not only did they effect a reduction of £213,355 during the year under review, but this followed on the top of a reduction of £498,903 in the previous year, or a total reduction of £712,258 in two years. (Hear, hear.) Now there are certain limits beyond which it is difficult to go in cutting down railway working expenses in proportion to the decrease in receipts. For example, every wayside station requires a stationmaster and a pointsman, whether there be only two trains a week or ten trains a day, also the law requires that a certain minimum number of passenger and goods trains must run to all parts of the system, whether there be much traffic or little. Also the headquarters expenses of a railway hardly vary at all whether there be 50 per cent. increase or 50 per cent. decrease in the volume of traffic from one year to another, as it would be utterly impracticable to reduce or increase highly trained officials at a moment's notice, especially in a new country like we are operating in, in which they are so scarce and difficult to come by.

Stone ballasted track was enormously superior and cheaper to maintain than a track ballasted with earth, and to this has to be added less wear and tear to rolling stock, which is no inconsiderable item, for a bad track not only gets damaged by the trains passing over it, but also causes considerable extra wear and tear to both locomotives and vehicles. Apart from track damage the torrential rains caused great flooding, with the result that the line was cut in no less than the year no less than £165,453 to the year no less than £165,453 to repair, and adding this to the £138,112 incurred in the previous year from the same source, makes £303,565, or rather over 1 per cent. on their Ordinary Stock, spent in repairing the damage done by abnormal floods, and, as mentioned in the Report on page 8, a further £34,500 has had to be spent with the same object in the current year to date. As an example of the tremendous rainfalls, between 20th and 22nd February no less than 15 in., or more than half the whole average rainfall in Great Britain in a year, fell at Coronel Suarez in some forty-eight hours. He hoped they had seen the end of these floods for some time, for they have afflicted their zone to a far greater extent than any other part of the country during the past two years.

In referring to the vexed question of the Pension Fund, the Chairman referred to the benefits accruing to employees under the Company's own scheme and to the sudden passing of the Government Pension Scheme into law. He said that with other companies interested they were going to take steps to test the legality of the Pension Law.

They had recently, in conjunction with other railways, appealed to Congress to make clear that its intention in passing the Mitre Law was to free them entirely from all contributions of every kind to the Municipalities, as some of these in recent times have been trying to collect from the Railway payments for street lighting and cleaning in the towns they pass through, on the ground that these are not taxes.

It was with reluctance the Board again decided to reduce the dividend, but it was the only prudent course to follow. The results of the year's working had been such as to justify payment of 4 per cent. for the full year without touching the Reserve Fund for the £59,113 charged to that Fund, were for Flood expenses only. Future prospects were always difficult to predict but if crops were good as they hoped, the general goods and passenger traffic would improve and gross receipts would be better. Working expenses constitute the principal element of uncertainty. Fuel was very dear. In normal times freights were $14 to $15 per ton from Cardiff, for coal to Buenos Aires now 40 shillings is asked and lately 45/- that was an increase of 25/- on freight alone. If this continued, the coal bill would be double what it was a year ago.

Mr. Simson added, "It may be asked why we don't try to burn wood. Well, our Manager says he is burning all he can get; but, unfortunately, that is very little, for the part of the Argentine in which we operate has little or no hardwood, which is the only kind suitable for the purpose; in fact, we have little wood in our districts of any kind except one considerable forest near Juancho."

"With regard to oil, the visible supply is not sufficient; moreover, it would probably take us in these times more than a year to convert a sufficient number of locomotives to make it worth while—there would be such delay in getting the necessary tankage. This fuel question is a very serious one, and may increase working expenses greatly. To help to meet this and other increases in our working expenses, we have increased our tariffs by 10 per cent. as from 1st October, except on suburban and second-class passenger fares, maize, and stone. I may say that these tariffs are still well below the maximum we have a right to charge, and as the value of the principal products we carry has been greatly increased—doubled in some instances—by the war, we consider the increase quite reasonable. Given normal times, they would soon get back to larger dividends."

Mr. Simson paid a tribute to the fine rally of Anglo-Argentines to the Flag. He said that it has been stated that the total English and Anglo-Argentine population is some 40,000, counting men, women and children. "Well, 5000 of them are fighting for the old country—(hear, hear)—which means almost every single man of military age. It ought to be an example to many of our young men here at home—(hear, hear)—that these men who had every reason for remaining where they were, seeing they were so far from home, should have thrown up their work to come thousands of miles to fight. The list of our own men, including those from our London office, is attached to the Report, and you will regret to know that several of them have already lost their lives, as also the Second Officer of our steamer, sunk by submarine, to which I have already referred. I am sure you will all wish to join with us in sympathy to the relatives of these gallant men. (Hear, hear.)"

The Hon. Windham Baring, Mr. David Simson were re-elected Directors. A balance dividend of 2 per cent. (less income tax) was declared for the half-year ended June 30, 1915. Messrs. Weeton Jones and Co. and Messrs. Deloitte, Plender and Griffiths were reappointed auditors, and, after a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman proposed by Mr. W. F. Hamilton K.C., and a speech by Mr. G. L. Moore, who confessed himself converted by the report from mild pessimism to cheerful optimism, the meeting concluded.

CENTRAL ARGENTINE RESULTS

COMMENTS BY THE "FINANCIAL TIMES."

In its issue of October 22, the "Financial Times" states that:

With the exception of the Buenos Aires Western, the Central Argentine Railway stood the strain of the depression in the La Plata region during the past financial year better than any other big system. The earnings of most lines fell off anywhere between 7 and 13 per cent., but the Central Argentine escaped with a drop of barely 5 per cent. The annual report makes therefore agreeable reading, especially as the decreased revenue has meant no reduction in either the Deferred or the Ordinary dividend. The railway, in common with every other, suffered severely during the first part of the year, but latterly it was able to take full advantage of the improvement which ensued in consequence of the demand for food-stuffs, due to the European war. The crops of wheat, maize, linseed, and sugar, in which the Central Argentine is mostly interested, showed substantial increases, and the quantities handled consequently exhibited a satisfactory advance. Particularly is this true of wheat, the gain in which almost wiped out the decline in 1913-14. The live stock returns were about equal to those of the preceding season and the receipts from this source actually rose nearly 5 per cent. In spite of a drop in general merchandise, the total freight moved increased 37,600 tons, or ½ per cent., and the takings were only £66,000, or less than 2 per cent., down. The unsatisfactory feature of the situation was the great falling off in passenger traffic, for which there were no compensations. The number decreased nearly 10 per cent., and the revenue 13½ per cent. The latter represents £252,100, and accounts for over 83 per cent. of the decline in all earnings. Every branch of traffic contracted, and was due entirely to the strict economy people were obliged to practise, and of which one symptom was the limitation of travel.

The total gross receipts amounted to £5,755,300, as against £6,058,100, a drop of £302,900, which was £27,800 more than the published returns indicated. In working costs, however, there was relatively a still greater decrease, with the result that the ratio declined from 58.54 to 58.43 per cent. In the circumstances this was a most creditable achievement, for it was evidently brought about without impairing the physical efficiency of the property. The ravages of flood had to be made good in certain districts, and the various reserve funds incorporated in working expenses, so far from getting smaller appropriations, received £70,500 additional, making £439,800 in all. Fuel continued an expensive item, but the charge was much lessened by resorting to wood whenever possible. Both the average train mile earnings and the average train load were higher, an excellent enough proof of the carefulness of the management. Thanks to the saving in operating costs the net revenue at £2,392,200 is only £119,200 lower, while net revenue credits at £184,700 are £6,500 up. As a much bigger sum is brought into the accounts than was the case twelve months ago the available balance is £100,700 larger. Fixed charges have risen £95,100 through heavier Debenture service and interest on the Three and Five Year notes now ranking for the first time. An appropriation of £100,000 has also to be made to the contingencies fund, whereas there was no such transfer last time. As previously stated, the Ordinary and Deferred dividends are maintained at the former 5 per cent. rate, and after allowing for these and the Preference interest £345,800 goes forward, or within £94,500 of the sum brought into the accounts.

FANCY FAIR

At Colegiales

A BRILLIANT SUCCESS

It would be difficult to conceive a prettier or more attractive sight than the grounds of Mrs. Webster's quinta in Colegiales when darkness fell last night. The sight was not superficial in these qualities either, for beneath it all there was a purpose, there was something strenuous, there was a whole hearted abandonment to a good cause.

All the afternoon and evening a Fancy Fair was in progress on behalf of the Belgrano Children's Homes. Postponed from Saturday, due to the unfriendliness of the weather, nothing could have been more favourable than its behaviour yesterday. "All the world" was there and it would be difficult to describe how delightful "all the world" was. It was a fairyland full of fairy ladies in the daintiest of dress and costume replete with delightful surprise, the fortune teller the several "aunt sally's" and "cocoa nut shies." The shooting gallery, the market and flowers stalls, the Lilac cottage and not a dozen but a hundred and one other things. For its organisation, its effect, its show and its success there has been nothing to equal, this fairyland of pleasure.

There were shooting galleries and sports, there were palmistry and flowers, there was a market stall and a Christmas tree and so every possible variety and every contrast.

And who was responsible for it all? It was through Mrs. Brookes that the large grounds of Mrs. Webster's quinta were lent, it was through the Minister of Marine that the Deposito de Marinerías Band played. It was through dozens of ladies that the great success was due.

There was never such a charming, more entertaining even bewildering example of everything effective, successful and perfect in Buenos Aires.

These were prizes of all kinds, amber cigarettes holders, enamelled wrist watches, pipes, fine sovereigns and all such beauties as prizes for the shooting. For the Fish Pond the sports and other delights there were many variations.

The grounds of the quinta were truly a fairy garden when dark fell and the dozens of lights amongst the trees could be seen.

These lights had been given and arranged by the Central Argentine Railway, through the kindness of Mr. C. H. Pearson, who also arranged that restaurant cars should be placed on the railway sidings close by, where dinner was served.

It would be impossible to praise too highly, the arrangements and the work that must have been performed to have such a delectable and successful an effect.

Mrs. E. P. Thompson as Hon. Sec. did wonders and not only to her but to all the other ladies are the congratulations of those who were there to enjoy themselves.

One thing and only one thing can be criticised. For all the immense

Mr. G. E. Morton and Miss Florence Morton are expected back from their trip to Buenos Aires and Montevideo at the latter part of the current week.

Mr. Roland Hunt arrived in town on Saturday last from the Capital, and left the same night for his estancia.

Mr. C. Redman and baby, who have been away from town for the past few weeks, are expected back on next Sunday.

Mr. Blair from La Cumbre is spending a few days in Cordoba.

amount of work, for all the beauty and pleasure of the scene to be destroyed and to be over in one brief day! What a pity. The scene, the attractions would have charmed for many days.

The success was due to the following ladies and to Mrs. Thompson who worked so hard at the various stalls and attractions.

LAND RATS AND WATER RATS

THIEVES OF THE WHARFAGE

Thieves in the Port are as plentiful as fleas and there is no lack of "Pulex Irritans" goodness knows. Sneak thieves, beggars, sturdy rogues, "Abraham" men, vagabonds of all sorts, pillars of all sorts, swarm in the mass of criminality that daily festers along the Port lands and the Boca. The Police are in constant conflict with them and make periodical battles but, no sooner is one of these fellows released than he returns to his old haunts and his old practices, which is perhaps less singular as employment is scarce and not much in his line. Late on Tuesday a marinero of Prefectura Maritima seized an individual who was furtively hurrying across the Avenida Rosales with a large bundle. He resisted but the powerful sailor reduced him to reason and haled him to the North Prefecture Station. He is Luis Parodi, 25 years of age, Italian, and a well known ratero. He had just, thanks to the darkness, paid a profitable visit to the s.s. Luisiana in Dock 4; had entered an officer's cabin and helped himself to a razor, a purse and an envelope containing a silk handkerchief, which he fondly imagined to be bills. He is put in ward. Two others were stopped opposite Cangallo yesterday. Each one had a bulky prize, a sack of barley, of 80 kilos bearing the initials of Bunge and Born. The police refused to credit that these were tokens of personal regard from that eminent cereal firm and likewise put the grain carriers, both Spaniards, into the abode of sorrow. These are daily incidents and the waterside scum presents a serious problem which is found difficult to deal with.

Our Point of View: "Herald" Leading Articles of the Week

DEVELOPMENTS OF THE GREAT WAR

FRIDAY, November 26, 1915.

We are disposed to accept as official and accurate—though the two words are not necessarily always allied—the communication from Paris published in our issue of yesterday, revealing to a certain extent the plans of the Allies for the future conduct of the war. It is perhaps not correct to speak of the "retreat" from the Dardanelles, for as we pointed out in a recent issue, such a retirement is not only undesirable; it is impossible. It is only correct to speak of the abandonment of the Dardanelles campaign, and the withdrawal of the expeditionary forces in the sense that the main objective—the forcing of a passage to Constantinople by way of the Peninsula of Gallipoli—is to be abandoned. In other words the task is an impossible one, and it would be futile to persevere with it. The forces, British and French, have done their utmost, under skilful generalship. The navy and the army have cooperated splendidly, and tremendous sacrifices have been made readily, but nevertheless success has been denied. It would be useless to waste further effort and throw away thousands of valuable lives without any prospect of the objective being obtained.

Months ago "The Herald" described as impossible the attempt then being spoken of, of attempting to force the passage of the Dardanelles. We may have been wrong, but we think not. However, and despite our opinion, whatever chances of success did exist were lost through causes which there is now no need to discuss. The attempt has failed—gloriously perhaps, but still it has failed. Upon that failure likewise we need not dwell. We have asserted that a bigger disaster than anything that might be made out of the failure to force the Dardanelles, would attend the attempt to withdraw the forces entirely from Gallipoli, and to abandon the ground won at such frightful cost. This we do not believe is contemplated. What is in contemplation doubtless is the strengthening of all positions won, and the holding of them with as few men as are absolutely necessary for the purpose.

This plan is apparently already in process of execution. As many men as can be spared have been withdrawn, because they can do more valuable work elsewhere. Therefore we may expect to hear that the Allies have simply left a garrison on Gallipoli to hold that which has been won, and keep the Turks occupied. That is good military policy. If the Allies have established a stone wall on the Peninsula, and can keep a huge Turkish force there butting its head against the stone wall, so much the better for chances of success elsewhere.

Marshal Joffre is reported to have stated that it is impossible, or impracticable to break through the German lines in Flanders and Northern France. This opinion coincides with a commonsense understanding of the situation in this theatre of war. The enemy has had the advantage—and it is one of inestimable value—of time in which to prepare strong and practically impregnable positions. In the big offensive movement of last month it was demonstrated that the Allies could force the first and second lines, but they were brought to a stop at the third line. Flesh and blood, exhausted by the effort already made, could do no more. Long ago we pointed out that the Germans, having had the advantage of time and lengthy warning, must necessarily have prepared many lines of defence. If driven from one, after months of fighting, they would retire to the other, and so on, the process of clearing them right back to their own country being almost interminable.

We are inclined to think the same situation obtains in Russia. Our gallant allies may now be in full strength and possessed of unlimited supplies of ammunition. The Germans have, however, been able to establish strong lines which it will require a lot of effort to break. The Italians are facing a similar problem. The only open field is in the Balkans. There, according to Joffre, the supreme effort must be made. The Germans can succeed nowhere, except in establishing strong lines of defence. If they can do that in the Balkans, they will undoubtedly have completely "ringed" themselves in. They may be circumvented in Serbia, by swift and decisive movements on the part of the Allies. It is for this purpose that the troops are being withdrawn from the Dardanelles, because they are so near the scene of what the French generalissimo considers the field of decisive action.

The Allies have scored decisively by vigorous action against Greece. Having eliminated all danger of a treacherous attack, they have a big chance of striking boldly at Bulgaria and Turkey, and of bringing Rumania in. Russia has available a reasonable number of troops to bring decisive pressure to bear. If the Teutonic forces cannot be driven out of the Balkans and their lines cannot be pierced, then we must settle down to the process of besieging the enemy on all fronts—a long process calling for much determination and patience. Germany's last chance of victory lies in the Balkans. There also lies the last chance of the Allies for speedily terminating the war. If the Allies cannot avail themselves of the chance, they can still secure victory by "the long route," to use an Americanism. If Germany cannot win there, she will never win. She must face exhaustion and inevitable capitulation.

THE SITUATION IN THE "NEAR EAST"

SATURDAY, November 27, 1915.

The ultra-patriotic, non-critical people of the "all-is-well-and-could-not-be-better," brigade; the people who have described criticism of the Government as the most venial and treasonable of crimes, have placed themselves in an awkward situation in their endeavours to follow the kaleidoscopic changes in the general war situation. We actually find them criticising the Government for taking any notice of German propaganda, and denouncing Sir John French for exposing German canards regarding the position in Flanders. They now find the Government doing many things recommended by the critics, and their only course is to turn critics themselves. Of course their criticism is now valueless, because long ago they disarmed themselves of any critical force by telling us that the Government was beyond criticism. We may expect them to cavil strongly at the lengthy official statement published in our columns this morning which consists of a frank and clear exposition of the situation in what is known as the "Near East," and a categorical denial of much that has lately emanated from the German press bureau.

As rather keen critics of the old policy of mystery and silence we are pleased to see such official statements which tend to enlighten the people at large not only as to what is actually happening, but as to how those events are viewed by the Government. We do not see very much in the statement actually under review, but we do see in its publication a recognition on the part of the Government of the value of keeping the British people closely in touch with what is happening, and not leaving them continually in a state of anxiety and suspense, in the face of uncontradicted stories the origin of which on many occasions cannot clearly be traced to tainted sources. Instead of the Government, or the Commander-in-Chief being condemned for this sane policy, they should, in our opinion, be complimented. To say, at this stage of the war, that the Government should take no notice of German propaganda, and alarming rumours, is simply madness, an unfortunate affliction of which we have long suspected our anti-criticism friends to be the victims.

Coming back to the statement issued by the Foreign Office, it is one which is clearly intended to be reassuring, and so it is to a large extent. The argument employed to minimise the evil effects of any success which the Teutonic alliance has had in the Balkans is fairly sound, and provided that success is, as the statement asserts, only temporary, then we believe the situation will develop as the Foreign Office hopes it will. To revert to our critical mood for a moment, we might add that the Foreign Office cannot fairly be held responsible if things do turn out well, for it appeared a week or two ago that it was doing its best to allow the situation to develop into disaster. Vigorous action on the part of Lord Kitchener has really averted the serious results which are spoken of as having been contingencies, and once more we can say that if there is one thing for which the Government deserves credit it is that it despatched Kitchener to the scene at a critical moment, and gave him unrestricted power to handle the situation as he thought best.

The emphatic assertions that there is no trouble either in Egypt or India, in both of which the Germans pictured revolt and chaos, are highly satisfactory. When we read that through German influence British officials in Persia have been unceremoniously thrown into prison we get some idea of the mischievous activity of the enemy in the most remote spheres, and there always was, and still may be, a danger that trouble might be stirred up by Germany in Egypt, if not in India. Those who know and understand the two countries are always anxious, and consequently they attach immense importance to prompt and emphatic denials by the British Government of the existence of any cause for uneasiness. The purely military aspect of the Balkans situation is fairly accurately outlined in the Foreign Office statement. That it does not go into the real problem which faces our strategists is understandable, and no one is foolish enough to ask the Foreign Office or any department of the Government to debate the many possible solutions of the campaign.

The Foreign Office implies that the issue entirely depends upon the rapidity with which each side can muster its maximum forces in the Balkans, and with good reason it is pointed out that on this score the odds are all in favour of the Allies. They are undoubtedly, but in our opinion the vital question is whether the Allies can keep open the field for manoeuvre, which is necessary if the Teutonic powers are to be seriously menaced throughout the whole war area. All danger of the Austro-German and other forces achieving any decisive success in pitched battle may be over, but upon the rapidity with which the Allies can move depends the important result of whether or not the enemy can bring about another deadlock, similar to those which appear to exist on all other fronts. If the enemy gets the time to establish himself strongly along a carefully chosen line through the Balkans, then as we pointed out recently, we shall have just another military situation as now exists in Flanders—a deadlock. That is not desirable, because it would not permit of an early settlement of the war.

DEADLOCKS ON THE FIGHTING FRONTS

SUNDAY, November 28, 1915.

A correspondent, whose letter is published to-day, throws doubt on the genuineness of the statement attributed to General Joffre that it is impossible to break through the German lines in Flanders and Northern France. For our part we have already expressed the view that the statement is genuine for the reason that it coincides with the conclusion that must be arrived at after a close study of the situation and an understanding of the efforts already put forth to force a way, and the results attendant on those efforts. Of course it is difficult to say specifically what cabled news is genuine. The news published in this country filters through many sources, and there is more than a suspicion that some of them are tainted. It is for this reason that we believe the British Government has taken a very wise course in examining closely all news issued in countries where the jurisdiction of the Censor does not obtain, and then counteracting in all cases where the hand of the German fakir is visible.

Nevertheless it is not exactly material in this particular instance to decide whether or not the statement attributed to the French generalissimo was actually made by him. The facts speak for themselves. It may not be strictly accurate to say that it is impossible to break through the German front, because it is always unwise to say that anything is impossible. What is meant by the term in a military sense, and what Joffre undoubtedly meant if he made the statement attributed to him, is that except at enormous sacrifice the line cannot be crushed in, and that it is unwise to make the sacrifice, especially in view of the recent demonstration of the formidable nature of the German defences, and the small gains resulting from a heavy expenditure in lives and material. That the German resistance must be, and will be, crushed at some time nobody doubts, but there is a big difference between crushing it by a long-sustained and steady pressure, and attempting to force it by wild onslaughts which entail frightful losses without corresponding gains.

We interpret the statement attributed to General Joffre to mean that he realises this position, and like a wise general he says: "We must cease our forcing tactics in this particular zone, and concentrate our efforts somewhere else. Here progress is only possible at a cost that is unreasonable. We can progress elsewhere if we make the effort, without paying too great a price for any success we achieve." That this idea really exists in the minds of the master strategists of the Allied forces is fairly demonstrated by the vigorous efforts being made to control the situation in the Balkans. There, as we pointed out yesterday, the intention seems to be to keep the field open, and checkmate any effort on the part of the Teutonic forces to create another deadlock. It is impossible to say exactly what are the intentions of the Allies, but it is reasonable to assume that they will do their best to prevent the enemy constructing an entrenched and impregnable line across Serbia, Bulgaria and Turkey.

Reverting to the subject of the deadlocks on the Western front, it is, we believe, fairly obvious, that the Germans are well prepared to resist progress. They cannot advance, because everything points to the fact that the Allies' lines are enormously strong, and that the Allied forces outnumber those of the enemy. To make any advance this must necessarily be so, but it need not be so once the idea of advancing is abandoned. If there are one hundred men behind one stone wall, it will take many more than a hundred men to drive them from that position. If the Allies propose to drive the Germans from behind their stone wall they must employ men in greater numbers than the enemy require for the holding of their position. Similarly the Germans must mass superior forces if their intention be to essay an advance beyond the position now held by the Allies. We do not think this is the German intention, and believing this we have an easy explanation of how the enemy finds sufficient men to open up new campaigns such as that in the Balkans

If the Allies have decided that the attempt to force the German positions in Flanders and France would be too costly, it is clear that they can hold their present positions and employ their surplus forces above the requirements of a defensive campaign, for active operations elsewhere. The Allies should outnumber the enemy, and if they can force the enemy to extend his lines they necessarily weaken him especially for a lengthy campaign, during which they can augment their forces while he finds great difficulty in maintaining his forces at their old strength. It is not a confession of weakness to desist from violent and costly attacks on the German lines in Flanders. It is good policy if the numbers of the Teutonic alliance are limited, and cannot be augmented, while those of the Allies can, then it is sound generalship that induces the enemy to extend his lines, so that the preponderance of numbers can be thrown suddenly on to one section of them, with every chance of breaking through and consequently crumpling up the whole line.

THE CASE OF THE "PRESIDENTE MITRE"

WEDNESDAY, December 1, 1916.

No incident or occurrence of the great war has aroused so much local interest and concern as the seizure by a British warship of the German-owned steamer "Presidente Mitre." No incident or occurrence requires so much care and tact in its handling as does this affair, if perfect friendliness is to be observed between two nations and two peoples who have always entertained for one another the highest respect and goodwill. We want to impress this point on our readers, that the capture of the "Presidente Mitre" is an exceedingly delicate affair, which may develop serious consequences unless it is most carefully handled, not alone by the responsible British authorities, but by the whole of the local British community, collectively and individually. In all such affairs there are two sides, and two view-points. In order to reconcile both, and to secure a proper settlement of any disputed question, it is essential that calmness should prevail and that due respect should be paid to the feelings and opinions of other people.

Our enemy, the Germans, have every intention of magnifying this incident to enormous proportions, and they are already busily at work endeavouring to stir up bitter feeling against Britain. In the principal streets of the city yesterday, papers, known to be strongly pro-German, and reasonably suspected of being inspired by Germany, if not actually financed by her, were being sold almost entirely on the strength of their sensational assertions. The news-vendors were shouting in chorus about the "breaches of Argentina's neutrality by the British Squadrons." By these papers the case has already been judged, and an endeavour is being made to stir up the anger of the Argentines against Britain and her Allies. Fortunately in contrast to this wild haranguing of the multitude the sober and responsible Argentine journals are counselling an attitude of calm deliberation of the questions involved in the seizure of the ship. While the Germans and the irresponsibles are endeavouring to create mischief, we on our side should rest content to leave the matter to the calm judgment of the diplomatists on both sides, and allow the responsible Argentine newspapers to influence public opinion accordingly.

In accordance with our own advice, we are not prepared to discuss the legal aspects of the case. In another article the main points for consideration by the legal and diplomatic authorities are set out without unnecessary comment. The decision upon them may be left with every confidence to those authorities. It is permissible to say, however, that Britain has a reputation, well known to Argentina, for uprightness in her international relationships. No action taken by the British Government in such a case as the seizure of the "Presidente Mitre" can fairly be attributed to a desire to exercise her naval strength arbitrarily and brutally. It is generally recognised that Britain has always used her undoubted naval superiority mildly, and frequently—even in this war—with almost Quixotic benevolence. The action taken by the Government through the Admiralty in the case of the ship in question was no doubt carefully considered with due regard to all possible consequences, and it may be accepted as certain that sight was not lost of the possibility of Argentina feeling aggrieved.

For the Germans to talk of a deliberate breach of Argentine neutrality and of a studied insult to the flag of this nation, is simply absurd. Britain is more concerned with the maintenance of the century-old friendship of this country than she is with the fate of a solitary ship, but she is also jealous of her own rights, and if after close investigation of all facts pertaining to the character of the "Presidente Mitre," she has decided to exercise those rights, she is doubtless well prepared to debate her action in a proper spirit with Argentina, should that country feel that her rights have in any way suffered. To say that Britain had no right to act as she has done does not lie within the province of the German newspapers of this country. It is entirely a question for the Argentine Government to handle with the British Government. We are not out to commit the same mistake as the Germans have committed and prejudice the case, though we have the better right. The mainstay of the German case is that the "Presidente Mitre" is not a German ship, but in law is an Argentine vessel. If this be admitted then the Germans have nothing to do with the case. Again we repeat it is entirely a matter for deliberation between Britain and Argentina. In that deliberation we have no doubt reason, and justice will predominate over every other consideration, and those who are busily endeavouring to stir up bad blood and disturb the calmness of the judicial or diplomatic proceedings will simply be snubbed and turned out of court.

NORTH AMERICA'S GREAT MAN

THURSDAY, December 2, 1915.

Every subject of any of the allied nations at war in Europe will read Colonel Theodore Roosevelt's message to the Armenian Relief Committee this morning with feelings of profound respect and deep gratitude. The ex-President's manifesto is a document that could only have been penned by a humane and righteous man.

We do not propose to discuss in detail the reasons which have led President Woodrow Wilson to determine that the United States shall remain neutral in the great conflict which is enveloping the greatest portion of the civilised world; we do not desire to criticise that large body of American opinion which believes that peace is the most desirable of all things. President Wilson has had a difficult task; he has had at heart what he thought to be the real interests of the nation which elected him to the Presidency; and whatever adverse view may be taken of his policy, it cannot be denied that he has succeeded where a weaker man would have failed. Nevertheless, the Allies must render homage to Colonel Roosevelt. His opinions are entirely opposed to those of Woodrow Wilson and William Jennings Bryan. He believes that peace may be purchased at too great a price, and that the honour of the United States demands the unsheathing of the sword on the side of the Allies and humanity. His views on the subject are never left in doubt; he does not indulge in verbal fencing; and his every utterance is a tribute to his honesty, his humane spirit, and his desire to see justice triumph even at the cost of blood and treasure.

It is well that the Allies should have in the United States so distinguished and so courageous a partisan. If Colonel Roosevelt's political influence is not sufficiently great to enable him to carry the nation with him, the man himself is respected throughout the Republic, and his opinions are regarded as the considered utterances of an upright soldier-statesman.

Was it not Theodore Roosevelt who, in the early days of the war, brought home vividly to the people the crime of Germany's invasion of Belgium? Has he not, on innumerable occasions, pointed out the naked ghastliness of Berlin's policy of murder on the high seas and in defenceless towns? And now Roosevelt comes forward again to denounce the German-inspired massacres of Armenian men, women, and children.

It may be that his strictures on United States foreign policy will not meet with general approval. To urge his case, the ex-President has not hesitated to write in a strain that would not be tolerated were it to come from a lesser man. Nevertheless, whether the manifesto meets with approval or disapproval, it says much for Colonel Roosevelt that at a time when a wave of prosperity—brought about largely by the war in Europe—should be sweeping over the United States, he should possess sufficient courage to ask the people to cast aside that prosperity and exchange the ploughshare for the sword.

The majority of Britons can only feel regret that strong action was not taken by Dr. Woodrow Wilson and his advisers to enforce the carrying out of the provisions of international law. They believe that a firm policy would have permitted the war to be conducted in a cleaner and less severe manner; but the President of the great Northern Republic obviously intended to steer the nation through the dangerous shoals which lay in its track, to maintain strict neutrality, and to preserve peace for the benefit of his people. All that he has accomplished.

From our point of view, it is desirable that every civilised nation should be engaged in the great war against militarism and murder; and for that reason alone we might have been disposed to have welcomed the advent of the United States into the arena during the earlier days of the war. But the shortage of men is rapidly being overcome, and, apart from the great moral value of United States intervention, the steady supply of ammunition and materials of war from North America may be of greater value to the cause of the Allies than would be the active aid on the battlefield of the North American people.

It should not be too readily assumed that the United States have—as some critics suggest—been more eager for dollars than for honour. A strong pro-German feeling in North America might have led to obstacles being placed in the way of the Allies procuring materials of war and money. As it is, northern sympathies have been almost solely with the Entente. The feeling of friendship has increased rather than diminished and the manner in which Wall-street responded to the request for a loan will not be readily forgotten by British subjects.

Even so, this does not detract from the value of Colonel Roosevelt's grand attitude. The most striking personality produced by either the United States or Britain during the last quarter of a century, he is maintaining his already great reputation. The English-speaking world may well be proud of one of the finest of her sons.

CROP REPORTS

A correspondent, writing on the crop prospects for the region of San Genaro, Casalegno, Diaz and Irigoyen, R.C.C.A., says that generally the outlook is good. There is a lot of "desove," however. The linseed and wheat are heavy in grain, but the crop is not thick. The estimated fields are: Wheat: 21 quintals per square; linseed 16 quintals; both are very healthy. Harvesting commences in another eight days (from November 28), and should be in full swing about December 10. The maize is a good deep green. The plants are strong, but a great quantity of locusts have been hatched lately, and may injure the growth. Prices are on the downgrade. Some linseed crops standing have been sold at $9.80 in the stack. There have been no wheat deals, but the yield should run above the 80 mark per hectolitre.

Public Opinion as expressed in the Argentine Press.

DUTIES ON IMMIGRANT BAGGAGE

(La Prensa.—November 25).

A case has recently been decided dealing with the personal effects of immigrants to this country when such effects were new, and says La Prensa although the general trend of the existing law was evidently in favour of abolishing all dues on furniture and tools, the actual question of new clothing was not specifically mentioned. It appears that on various occasions of late young women have arrived here from Italy, engaged to be married to persons resident in this country. They have brought with them linen for household use, in fairly considerable quantities, and in every case they are going to make their homes up country.

In one case the customs authorities collected duty to the extent of $170, but the Director of Immigration having drawn attention to this evidently mistaken rendering of the law, it being quite clear that the goods charged were for purely personal use, the administrator consented to treat this as a test case, letting the remainder of the women bring their things in free of duty. It has now been decided in favour of the immigrant, and the money unduly collected has been returned, which is as it should be, remarks La Prensa. In the past the general rule has been for the fiancé to go to Europe and bring his bride back with him, but the abnormal circumstances of the present time have caused the process to be reversed, and the arrival of young women who are engaged to be married and who will eventually fix their homes here is an event that calls for specially sympathetic attention on the part of the Government. The only thing to be regretted, concludes La Prensa, is that five or six days were necessary to decide the case, and it hopes that measures will henceforward be taken to arrange for the immediate despatch of such baggage should further instances of the same kind come forward.

LAND SALES ON THE AVENUES

(La Nación.—Nov. 26.)

The straitened circumstances attendant on the Municipal finances at the present time have led the Intendente to think of selling off the surplus plots of land along the diagonal avenues. As La Nación remarks, the scheme is not new, one of the chief sources of revenue which was to carry out the work being in theory derivable from the demand that these lots were certain to create. Circumstances have changed, and the sale by public auction of this land at the present time would be an unprofitable business for the Municipality, whilst for the buyers, even at low prices, these sites would prove extremely costly owing to the class of buildings that they would be compelled to erect. It all hangs on rentable values, and the class of shops that would perforce have to be installed on the ground floor, a class for which there is at present no demand.

Hence, looking at the Intendente's plan in a cold commercial light, La Nación sees plainly that the Municipal finances can expect no help from that quarter. The case of the Avenida de Mayo ought to have given the authorities pause. For many years there were unsightly blocks of waste land unsold, land that was only disposed of as the city gradually expanded and progressed, whilst something of the same sort characterised the sale of land in the Plaza Congreso. A false value was created by the certainty of expropriation, and now that it is clear that expensive buildings that must call for high rents are not in demand, the plan of the Intendente may be tried, but is not likely to relieve the sorrowful situation of the Municipal treasuries.

THE MISSING BOX OF GOLD

(La Nación.—November 25).

In accordance with the expressed intention to bring here, little by little, the gold deposited abroad in accordance with the provisions of Law 9480, the Minister of Finance arranged for the shipment of £250,000 in the s.s. Tubantia. This shipment, La Nación declares to have been made under very favourable conditions, since insurance against all risks, including war risk, was 0.94 per cent, i.e. £2,350, much less in proportion than the cost of the Frisia shipment. The special, packed in fifty boxes, was put on board at Falmouth, each box containing five thousand sovereigns. On Monday night the Tubantia reached Buenos Aires and next day the Caja de Conversión were advised that the shipment was ready for delivery.

Two employes, with the usual guard, were sent down to take over the precious freight, but on landing the boxes at the North Darsena it was found that instead of there being fifty, there were only forty-nine. Look as they might, no trace could be found of the missing box. There was nothing for it but to take the short quantity, giving the customary receipt with a saving clause to that effect. At once the Port Prefecture was advised and began their investigations, which up to Wednesday night had proved fruitless. No one can explain, remarks La Nación, how the money has gone, since the Captain, and officers of the Tubantia distinctly recollect having received fifty boxes, the same being stated in the ship's manifest. Moreover the money was placed in the ship's strong-room, the keys of which are in a safe under the charge of the second officer. It may be that the remarkable disappearance is due to the wrong delivery of a box of bank notes shipped at Bahia and landed at Santos. At any rate this is the only time the strong room was opened. The Minister of Finance whilst surprised by the affair, states that the Caja suffers no loss, the position of the shipping company concerned being amply sufficient to rectify the remarkable error, which they for their part are doing their best to elucidate.

MENDOZA GRAPES

(La Prensa.—Nov. 26.)

The Superintendent of Markets is at the present time busy, says La Prensa, with arranging for a cheap and satisfactory method of distributing Mendoza grapes to the consumer, a method that shall at once consult the interests of buyer and producer. Direct consignment to the Municipal office of Markets is projected, and this department will see to the collection of the goods at the various railway stations, using its own means of transport and delivering the packages in the markets. One of the chief difficulties to be overcome was the manner in which the grapes were to be packed, and this point has been solved by using special cases which will be supplied by the Municipality to the producers on loan.

Various types of packing have been tried. Cardboard was too fragile for anything above a couple of kilos, besides which it cost too much, say, 9 cents a box. Moreover, it could only be used once. White pine or poplar boxes will probably be employed, since yellow pine flavours the fruit with resin. Experiments are still being made to see whether ventilated or entirely closed boxes are the best. As for the size of the boxes, 25 kilos has been judged most convenient, whilst the cost will not be more than 25 cents. The Municipality intends to charge 10 per cent. on the fixed price of 20 cents a kilo, and as the boxes will be utilisable many times, their cost will soon be wiped out. A preliminary lot of 100,000 is on order. Moreover, a special agreement with the railway companies provides for the shipping

GAMBLING AND THE PROVINCIAL POLICE

(La Prensa.—November 29).

The widespread nature of the gambling in Juarez, Province of Buenos Aires, and its open tolerance by the provincial police ought to call for special attention by the Government, especially in view of the electoral situation. This is not, says La Prensa, a case of ordinary tolerance, but is rather one of frank complicity on the part of the authorities. The matter has got to such a pitch that the professional gamblers who organise the clubs travel with official passes given to them by the police, and more than once disagreeable incidents have been observed in the trains.

This increase of gambling under police protection shows a moral decomposition which La Prensa declares ought to be checked by the Government without loss of time. If it is true that certain prohibited forms of gambling are vicious, it is disgraceful that they should still be carried on either through the tolerance or the complicity of the authorities. Among factors that go to establish the greatness of a democratic country must be reckoned the republican virtues, and when education has succeeded in implanting them in every citizen a grand step forward in the sense of perfecting existing institutions will have been taken. It is axiomatic that the authorities should not favour corruption, and the case of Juarez calls for special and minute investigation. No other course is open, remarks La Prensa, since silence spells complicity.

MONTE CARLO

(La Nación.—November 29).

To the repeated list of accusations lodged against the existence of gambling dens in the neighbouring city of Avellaneda, La Nación states that it has to add yet another item. According to their information a new establishment, styled the "Centro Gallego," has been opened in close proximity to the local Branch of the Banco de la Nación, with very thorough organisation. It has a double time-table, namely from 4.30 to 7.30 of the afternoon, and from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m. In addition to various prohibited games, there are also three roulette wheels kept going. Given the easy conditions under which entry to this association is obtained, namely $10 for a permanent card of admission as a member, the den is largely frequented by young people, mostly students and employes. And as if this was not enough, adds La Nación, the place appears to be regularly advertised among the clubs and at the race course.

Some weeks ago, thanks to the denunciations of La Nación, a representative of the La Plata government announced with much pomp that he would personally investigate the conditions of the local Monte Carlo. The warning did not have the effect that he expected, for on the day he visited Avellaneda the three roulettes were running as usual. Hence no-one can accuse the provincial police of being unduly harsh in their measures. Nor can they fairly be accused of short-sightedness, since it appears that on the occasion of his visit the governmental representative saw nothing. Hence the situation remains as before. Before the Government can take action it must have legal proof of the offence, and, concludes La Nación, it appears to be a foregone conclusion that it will never have such proof.

of returned empties at a special rate, notwithstanding that they are sent to various producers. In the city of San Juan the provincial Government will put up storage accommodation for the reception of the fruit, and this will be under the charge of an employé of the Buenos Aires Municipality. Grapes will, therefore, be sold in the free fairs and in the markets at 20 cents a kilo for finest fruit and 15 cents for second quality.

THE TYRANNY OF FREIGHTS

(La Prensa.—November 27).

One of the clearest revelations of the war has been, says La Prensa, the demonstration of the value of sea power. Off the Banco Inglés at this very moment it has been shown in a way that would have been judged incredible and fantastic prior to August 1914. The war is running on two parallel lines; one essentially military, the other purely economic. In the first instance the adversary is slaughtered; in the second case his resources are cut off throughout the entire universe. This country, argues La Prensa, though neutral, is affected in almost every class of trade by the blockade decreed by the Allies and carried out by the naval power of Great Britain. If the powers of the "entente" were not in a position to buy all our produce, reduced production would be urgently necessary.

Admitting that the high freights on cereals are paid by the European consumer, Argentina must perforce suffer the high cost of coal cargoes outward, as well as the heavy freights on general imports. In many industrial establishments the effect of these quintupled freights has been severely felt, and although nations stronger and wealthier than Argentina have been unable to remedy this state of things, they at least try to do what they can to protect their interests. This is all that La Prensa asks of the powers that be. There is the exploitation of petroleum for one thing, and there is also the proposal of Sr. A. J. Coelho relative to the establishment of an Argentine mercantile marine which might well be turned to practical account. This country is learning that at any given moment the seas may be dominated by a fleet sufficiently powerful to change all the currents of trade. England, with armies that are inferior and insufficient, says La Prensa, owns a commercial hegemony without precedent in history that acts as a military influence affecting all the fronts of the colossal war. In plain language this Republic has trade enough to warrant the maintenance of a merchant marine which, if not sufficient for the transport of all its produce, would nevertheless be a protection against the tyranny of freights, and the speculation of outsiders. Combustible is here in abundance, and once more La Prensa recommends the theme to the careful study of the powers that rule the destinies of the nation.

CATTLE STEALING AND POLITICS

(La Nación.—November 27).

Cattle lifting in the Province of Buenos Aires will, says La Nación be counteracted by the cattle census; the cattle owner is to be provided with a pass-book in which all operations are to be registered. Hence there will be no more falsification of certificates or other fraudulent acts. Officially this is to put an end to cattle-stealing, but La Nación makes some observations that tend to prove the contrary. Long distance raids, such as were carried out in the old days, have been ended by the telegraph, the railway, and enclosed camps. The evil then became local; the work of wandering peons who counted on the protection of certain political influences, men whose haunts were well known to the police. Their freedom from arrest did not therefore depend on any lack of documentation, nor will cattle stealing be suppressed in future by such means, seeing that it is in reality a political crime, dependent on the will of the local "boss" or caudillo, who uses his influence as a political supporter of the Government to shield his followers.

This class of character is not going to be extirpated by a simple pass-book, which, however much it may safeguard the owner in theory, in practice will give no better results than previous documentary safeguards. Exemplary punishment on conviction, and complete repudiation of this political camaraderie between thieves and politicians is the only course to pursue. But characters vote officially on the understanding that they shall be protected during their career of idleness, vice, and pillage. Complete eradication of this element is the only real cure, concludes La Nación, and all other attempts to end it by rigid vigilance or exemplary control are futile.

THE CAPTURE OF THE PRESIDENTE MITRE

(La Prensa.—November 30).

Profound impression, says La Prensa, will be caused by the news of the capture by a British war-ship, of the Presidente Mitre. The gravity of the episode, continues that paper, imposes as a line of conduct, the most serious reflection before arriving at a definite conclusion, and in this opinion it is at one with the Chancellery, which according to the information at hand has abstained from making any declaration until it is in possession of all the evidence necessary to judge the matter from all points.

In emergencies like the present, La Prensa points out that it has always been its policy to recommend the public to preserve its usual calm, and to have complete confidence in the prudence of the Governments and in the discretion with which diplomacy will view complications affecting the rights and friendly relations of the two countries.

THE CAPTURE OF THE PRESIDENTE MITRE

The Conference of London, held in 1908, and called at the initiative of the British Government in order to place the rules of maritime warfare on a uniform base, was, says La Nación, a great step forward. If one cannot exactly say that the rights of neutrals were entirely protected by the Declaration of London, signed by six of the thirteen Powers represented, on the whole the results were satisfactory, given that the term "belligerent" was clearly defined, as well as the definition of contraband, the rights of nations at war to operate without damaging the interests of non-belligerents, and the question of the violation of neutrality.

During the course of the present war all this legal erection came to pieces bit by bit, like many other matters established by rule, such as the neutrality of Belgium, or the findings of the second Hague Conference relative to the use of aerial engines for the dropping of explosives on undefended cities. As La Nación points out, the use of submarines made all the resolutions regarding blockades valueless, whilst the interminable list of additions and corrections to the number of articles considered as contraband, and the procedure adopted to prevent merchandise entering or leaving Germany via neutral ports utterly disregarded all neutral trading rights. One thing alone remained, namely, the right of a vessel's nationality to be determined by the flag that she flew, provided that her registry was legally established. This last survival of the Declaration of London has disappeared before the famous "Order in Council" of the British Government dated 20th Oct., as also by the decree of the French Government dated on the twenty-third of the same month; measures that have been the motive, if not the justification of the unfortunate arrest of the s.s. Presidente Mitre.

La Nación points out further that it was with the greatest difficulty that this ruling had been introduced into the Declaration of London. Great Britain stood out for the principle that nationality of ownership determined the nationality of the ship, little or no heed being had to the flag under which she sailed, and it took close on a century to bring the conservative English character to realise that conditions had changed, and that the coming of the limited liability company, with its thousands of shareholders, made the old ruling untenable. At last, says La Nación, England, ever obstinate and absolutely unmanageable when her interests are at stake, was forced to yield, and the decision of 1908 established a principle that all recognised as just and in accordance with the world's economic development.

Why has she now gone back on her previous ruling? asks La Nación. Is it due to the incorrect use of neutral flags by her own shipping that one must attribute her change of front? Is it a question of interest that has led one of the most level-headed Governments of the world to lose its serenity, in company with her faithful ally, the chivalrous nation that but yesterday sustained the principle of the nationality of the flag, and now turns to the view of her old opponent, holding by the test of owners' nationality and refusing to recognise all rights attaching to the vessel's domicile?

What can the Argentine Government do?, asks La Nación. The answer may lie in collective action by other neutral nations, equally affected by this change of attitude. In any case, the capture of a steamer engaged in the Argentine coastal trade, carrying the mails, on a route specially reserved to vessels manned by Argentines and registered in Argentina, wounds to the quick a nation closely bound to Great Britain by many ties, and compels reconsideration of this attitude on the part of the British Government. The means whereby every nation seeks to foment its own mercantile marine, and its rules and regulations relative to the flying of its ensign are too private and particular for it to be admitted that a close inquiry may at any time be held into the question of ownership, subject as it must be to the hazards of the stock exchange whereby determined nationalities may own a whole or a millionth part of shipping property.

NAVIGATION IN THE SOUTH

(La Prensa.—December 1).

Owing to the capture of the s.s. Presidente Mitre, and the consequent withdrawal from service of the two other steamers belonging to the same owners, La Prensa states that the Minister of Marine has decided to take various measures designed to prevent the inhabitants of the southern territories from suffering too acutely the shortage of tonnage. A shortage all the more felt owing to the fact that now is the season for shipment to Buenos Aires, to say nothing of the heavy increases in the freight for wool and hides, increases that in the case of the first named commodity amount to 50 per cent and in the case of the hides to 25 per cent.

It is to counteract this damage to the interests of the Southern colonists that one must attribute the intention of the Minister of Marine to put a couple of government transports, the "Guardia Nacional" and the "10. de Mayo," on the South Coast service for the carriage of goods and mails. According to information published by the Minister aforementioned, the "Guardia Nacional" will run between Buenos Aires and Rio Gallegos, calling at intermediate ports and taking general cargo, returning from the same ports with local freight. The "10. de Mayo" is to ply between Buenos Aires and Deseado, taking only official cargo on the outward passage and general goods when homeward bound. She is to leave towards the end of December, whilst the "Guardia Nacional" is expected to be ready to

(La Nación.—December 1).

The more or less complete interruption of the South Coast service calls for more comment than a mere passing event of the day, says La Nación, proceeding forthwith to analyse still further the case of the capture of the s.s. Presidente Mitre, which occurred, it states, almost within Argentine territorial waters, and which is traceable to the sudden change of front as regards international law on the part of the British naval authorities. Whatever attitude the governments of the belligerent nations might have seen fit to assume towards neutrals, one would have thought, La Nación continues, that Argentina would have been the last country to be affected thereby. It has no oversea shipping companies of importance, and as a general rule, with but few exceptions, Argentine shipping is engaged in the coasting trade, working under a law that practically assures a monopoly to those steamers that fly the national flag. How is it possible that all these elements together should be affected by the famous "order in Council" of October 20?

All the jurists, all historic antecedents, from the ancient Consolato della Mare down to the most recent precedents, agree in stating that a belligerent nation has no interest—La Nación expressly states that it does not use the word "right"—in perturbing the affairs of a neutral nation save when such affairs are immediately of benefit to an enemy. Could Argentina ever have dreamt that ships under her flag, engaged in the coastal trade, beyond any suspicion of dealing in contraband of war, would have been treated as the "Presidente Mitre" has been? Yet the unexpected has happened. Acting apparently upon information supplied here dealing with economic matters that one would have thought beyond their interest, the British government, learning that ships which have for years been legally working under the Argentine flag belong to enemy subjects, have dealt a blow that through repercussion directly affects its sincere and tried friends, the Argentines.

La Nación declares that the arrest of the "Presidente Mitre" has every appearance of an ambushade, and it blames rather the local interests upon whose information the British Government has acted, than the Government itself. It may have been right or it may have been wrong to abrogate the Declaration of London in so far as Clause 57 is concerned, but in any case what good is to be got by applying the new ruling in a part of the world where its only effect is to wound the feelings of a friendly country. La Nación hopes that when the British Government is better informed it will reconsider its action in so far as this nation is concerned, since its coastal navigation neither favours nor could favour the interests of its adversary. Perhaps, concludes La Nación, those who were the cause of the harm, whether consciously or unconsciously committed, may even see fit to correct their mistake frankly and loyally by pointing out that in the present case the first to be affected by the partial paralization of the South Coast trade are the thousands of British subjects spread abroad in the territories of Tierra del Fuego, Chubut, and Santa Cruz.

sail on or about the first of January. It is noteworthy, says La Prensa, that the freight charges for this service will be on the old level ruling prior to the announced increase of 50 o/o, an increase made by the shipping companies at the cost of their privileges as postal packets. The Port Prefecture is advising the southern colonists of the resolution adopted by the Minister of Marine in defence of their interests.

Diplomacy and Espionage.

Not very long ago, in fact immediately before the advent of Graf von Luxburg to Buenos Aires, a Minister represented Germany here, the Baron von dem Busch Haddenhausen.

He departed for Bucharest in a cloud of society politenesses and regrets. Since his arrival in the Rumanian capital, he has, no doubt, had a strenuous time, but as he evidently holds the opinion that he is the best patriot who is prepared to do the most miscellaneous work for his country, including the necessary dirty work, he has indulged in a little spying, and, according to the Daily Telegraph, has had the bad taste to be caught in the act. He was arrested while making photographs of recently erected military works, very interesting to the Generalstab of Berlin. As his explanation was lame, he was taken by a Staff Officer to the nearest Police Commissary, where his Ministerial identity transpired, and he was released with sardonic apologies. An Ambassador from Germany not only has to lie, but to spy for his country; however the arts are somewhat akin.

Activities in the Cemeteries.

A very great contemporary mentioned yesterday that the French Government "has called the 1717 class to the colours, but without fixing the date of enrolment. When this class appears, if it ever does, it will probably create a sensation, attired as it will be in ancient three-cocked hats and gaiters, looped coats, and carrying venerable flint locks. As there are a good many grave-yards behind the German lines, the latter must be prepared for an attack on their rear by a peculiarly grisly foe, or else the Contemporary has an incorrect date.

A patriotic lead.

Amid all the loud bratings of patriotic resolve and sacrifice, it may be doubted whether ten per cent. of us are really patriotic in small things. Yet these things count; even lead pencils count. Britons of rambunctious Britonism are to be found wielding German pencils and Austrian pencils daily. The enemy-made brands of L. C. Hardtmuth, Johann Faber, A. W. Faber, have a tremendous hold on the pencil trade, rubbers and small stationery generally, and they are said to stay in general use simply because people are too lazy or too indifferent to ask for an article of British manufacture and refuse, as they should do, anything "Made in Germany." There are good British pencil makes, Winsor and Newton, Reeves and Sons, Wolf's (an excellent make), George Rowney and Son, and some of these have suffered very heavily because of the criminal fatheaded indifference aforesaid. Do not buy German pencils even if they are 40 cents a dozen. Do you value your country's interests at 10 cents or 20 cents? Away, then, with the German or Austrian Koh-i-noor Castell, etc. pencils, and if you can't really get a British pencil, buy them from our cousins of the U.S. Plenty of good American leads about; but heave the Huns out anyway.

Refuse German pencils
And all Hun utensils;
The track of their lead
Is the blood of the dead.
Do not give to a child
What the Hun has defiled.

In short, A bas! Conspuez! and down with all things German, big and little "Touch not the unclean thing."

BOVRIL SUPERSEDES BEER

INNOVATION IN LONDON PUBLIC HOUSES.

London, Nov. 30.

The surprise of the first day's sale of restricted alcoholic drinks has been the excellent results. Most licensed houses had made admirable preparations to deal with changed conditions. The bar has become a buffet where soup and Bovril are served from 9 until noon. In many cases more money than usual has actually been taken.

VOLUNTEERS FROM URUGUAY

THE BAN OF THE CENSOR.

The following letter has been received by Mr. C. W. Bayné, Administración, F.C.C., Montevideo:—

Dear Sir,

No doubt you heard from Mr. Cable that Parfit and I had joined the Railway Operating Division of the Royal Engineers. We were attested on the 23rd July, and after a little training in England were sent over to France on the 4th of this month. During our period of training we came across several men from the Argentine Railways, but up to the present have not been fortunate enough to see any of the Central Uruguay Railway men, although I believe Captain Sharpe was quite close to our camp in Hampshire. Our corps as a whole is composed of very decent chaps, and at our camp in England there were men who had come from different railways in all parts of the world, such as South America, Australia, South Africa, and Siam. We were exceedingly well treated whilst in training, having ample sleeping accommodation in asbestos lined wooden huts built for the purpose, and the food, although a bit rough, was of good quality—a lot of it was from the Frigorifico in Montevideo and far exceeded my expectations. We are prohibited from stating the exact place where we are at.

We are also prohibited from saying what we are doing, etc., so you can tell letter writing is something of a difficulty, and at times it is quite amusing to hear the chaps arguing about what they can put in their letters. We have had splendid weather since leaving Uruguay, and although it is now getting a bit cold, it is nice and dry, and as we are well supplied with blankets (including one in the style of a South American "poncho") we can keep ourselves nice and warm at night time.

I must now draw to a close, hoping things in the Uruguay are prospering.

Faithfully yours,

(Signed) J. H. FISH.

SALE OF LINCOLN RAMS

Messrs Bullrich and Co. sold within their yard yesterday afternoon a very superior lot of imported Lincoln rams, the property of Messrs. F. Ward and Son. These sheep were shown in good bloom and were a remarkably even lot, though not as strong as many imported sheep; their were very compact animals and specially good over their loins. There was a considerable attendance of interested spectators, and a very satisfactory selling trade was experienced. Several individual specimens of outstanding merit crossed the two thousand dollar mark, the Messrs. Alberti Hnos, acquiring three very good rams at $2000, $2050, and $2000. The thirty rams sold gave the satisfactory average of $666. Several more drafts of Mr. Ward's sheep will soon be offered to the public, when their merits are sure to favourably commend them to Argentine breeders.

Last night's Concert at the Barker Memorial Hall last night was highly successful from every point of view. The Hall was well filled, and the audience was very appreciative of the good music submitted to them. Mr. Chevallier Boutell was present to watch over the interests of the Red Cross, for the benefit of which the function was held, and in which he takes so keen an interest.

The programme was as follows:

Part I.

1. Trio, Berceuse (Jocelyn); piano, Miss Hogg; violin, Miss B. Anderson; cello Miss Menzies.
2. Song, "Are we Downhearted? No!" Mr. Ernest Gough.
3. Song, "In the Great Unknown" (Guy d'Hardelet), Mrs. Roland E. Henry.
4. Recitation, Dickens' Monologue (George Phillips), Mr. Charles J. Baker, accompanied by Mrs. John M. Rodger.
5. Cello solo (a) "Last Rose of Summer"; (b) "Caprice," (Arnold Trowell), Miss Mendes.
6. Song, "Jack Briton," (W. H. Squire), Mr. Bevan.
7. Song, "Twinkle," (The Follies), Mr. G. Ellis Griffin.
8. Dance "The Gypsy," Miss G. Andrews.
9. Song, "When the Boys come Home," Mrs. H. R. K. Richards.

Part II.

1. Trio, Sitt: Piano, Miss Hogg; violin, Miss B. Anderson; cello, Miss Menzies.
2. Recitation, "The Green Eye of the Yellow God," (J. Milton Hayes), Mr. Chas. J. Baker, accompanied by Mrs. John M. Rodger.
3. Song, "The Bell," (Teresa del Riego), Mrs. Roland E. Henry.
4. Song, "I once was a Poet," (The Grotesques), Mr. G. Ellis Griffin.
5. Dance, Miss G. Andrews.
6. Cello solo, Serenade (W. H. Squire), Miss Menzies.
7. "Stick to your Guns," (Herman Finck), Mr. Bevan.
8. Song, "Same sort of girl, same sort of Boy," Mrs. H. R. K. Richards.
9. Violin solo, (a) Feuille d'album (Maurage); (b) Caprice Mazurka (Maurage); (c) Zapateado (Sarasate), Prof. A. Maurage, accompanied by Prof. Domingo Rodriguez.
10. Song, "La La," Mr. Ernest Gough.

God Save the King.

Accompanists, Mrs. John M. Rodger and Miss Lucy Gordon.

Among the specialties of the Concert, were the fine violin playing of Professor A. Maurage, whose fine execution and sympathetic renderings were a delight. Mr. Bevan and Mr. Gough were encored, and as usual Mrs. H. R. K. Richards was exceedingly popular. Mr. G. Ellis Griffin, with the light and airy assurance of the Grotesques, was also in great demand. In "I once was a poet" he was particularly good. Mr. Roland Henry's songs "The Great Unknown," "The Bell" were finely given and well received, and the trios of piano, violin and cello by the Misses Hogg, B. Anderson and Menzies were as delightful as such trios are when the playing is sympathetic and the tiempo good. The accompanists, who were excellent were Mrs. John M. Rodger and Mrs. Lucy Gordon.

Mr. Boutell did not make any speech but mentioned afterwards his wish to thank the artistes and the public also, who had contributed to make the affair so conspicuous a success.

CONCORDIA NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Nov. 23, 1915.

Weather.

After the heat of last week a spell of cool weather set in which lasted for a couple of days. A little rain fell at the end of last week. At present it has become extremely warm again and signs are not wanting to indicate a storm.

Railway Club.

The Club rooms of the Railway Institute will be changed at the end of the month. Members are requested to take notice that the new address is 338 Calle 1° de Mayo, at the corner of Calle Rivadavia.

Cricket.

The team that will travel from Concordia to M. Caseros on Nov. 24, will be picked from the following: Messrs. Petty, Williams, Todd, W. Walton, A. Spencer, C. Castle, A. Cardoso, C. Dickinson, P. Kingsbury. The number is not quite complete as several not named are not certain of going. According to reports the M. Caseros team is a very strong one, all the old Corrientes Camp players coming in for it. On paper Concordia will have a hard time of it to win.

News in Brief.

Mr. and Mrs. Paterson left for Jamaica last week, after selling all their household effects and renting their house and grounds. Mr. Paterson expects to be back again in about four years time. Mrs. Paterson will be missed very much from the British community. Although she had not been about much during the last few months, not being in the best of health, a change has been undertaken by doctor's orders.

Now and again Britishers ask themselves why there is no British Vice-Consulate here, especially since the British community has been so much increased by the railways taking up their headquarters here. The Germans only a few weeks ago raised their flag, and their number is very small. The matter is worthy of consideration and attention and it could not cause much trouble to those in authority to allow the gentleman who previously was the official head of the British community here again to assume the corresponding duties.

OPERA AT PALERMO

AL FRESCO ENTERTAINMENTS.

The success which has attended the open air representations of "Aida" at the Club de Gimnasia y Esgrima at Palermo where over 15,000 persons can be accommodated, has decided the Italian War Committee and the impresarios Salvati and Bracale to give two more entertainments with "Carmen" the third and fourth acts of which lend themselves to a grand display of artistic scenery abounding in colour.

The functions will therefore take place on Saturday and Sunday next, December 4 and 5, commencing at 9 p.m. at reduced prices.

The representation will consist of the second act of "Aida," with the imposing triumphal entry of Rhadames wherein a thousand persons will take part; to be followed by the two last acts of "Carmen," in which the scenic effect is equally striking. In these are illustrated the smugglers among the picturesque ranges of the Pyrenees, and a great bull baiting, with the bullfighters, the picadores on horseback, the banderilleros, the espadas and other concomitants of a Spanish bull-fight at Seville.

The contralto Regina Alvarez, one of the cleverest interpreters of the heroine Merimé, will appear, together with the tenor Andreina.

NEW LIGHTSHIP

IN THE RIVER.

On November 26 in the river, a few miles distant from Recalada, the new lightship "Intermedio" was installed, in place of the old ship of the same name, which has done service for 11 years, being first used on October 14, 1904.

The new lightship is painted in broad black and red stripes, with her name in large white lettering. She displays a strong white light each minute arranged as to 42 seconds exposure and 18 seconds eclipsed. The light is visible at a distance of 12 miles. She also possesses a siren which sounds for 10 seconds in every 25 minutes.

INCREASE IN SAILINGS.

Owing to the increase of passenger traffic between Buenos Aires and the Uruguayan capital, it was found advisable a few days ago to increase the number of sailings.

It was announced yesterday that the line of Messrs. Lambruschini Ltd., also intend to run two vessels and reopen their service to Montevideo. The "Rio de la Plata" and "Rio Uruguay" will therefore commence regular sailings from their usual point of departure at the South Basin on December 1, leaving at 10.15 p.m.

CLEVER SALVAGE

THE HESPERIDES SAVES THE MELDESKIN.

A smart piece of seamanship has been accomplished by Captain Lee and the ship's company of the Houston liner Hesperides, which arrived in Bs. Aires yesterday. She rescued the Norwegian s.s. Melderskin from a decidedly unpleasant predicament. The facts briefly are these: The Melderskin had lost her propeller, and had a fractured main shaft. She had been ten days alone when the Hesperides hove in sight. The crippled plight of the Melderskin was evident from the bridge of the Houston boat, and she stood by while Captain Jacobsohn of the Melderskin came on board. He explained his helpless position, which in case of really bad weather would quickly become also a very dangerous one, and asked Captain Lee of the Hesperides for a tow as far as Savannah, the nearest port, which was about 800 miles distant. An agreement was quickly concluded, and hawsers were passed to the disabled steamer. Slowly her head was brought round and the Hesperides poked her nose into the heavy swells with the Melderskin wallowing astern of her, throwing half an acre of foam from her bows and quarter. Such an operation is not the simple affair it sounds of towing something astern on a piece of string. The seas became very heavy, and constant nursing and manoeuvring was necessary to keep the head of the tow right, and at the same time to prevent the hawsers from parting. Captain Lee displayed brilliant seamanship. Three times in nine days the tow-ropes parted; three times with patient pertinacity the Hesperides halted and re-fastened her grip defiantly on her crippled consort. After a long and anxious spell of hard work, during which Captain Lee actually lived on the bridge day and night, he brought the Melderskin safely into Savannah. The sea does get beaten sometimes, even when it does its nastiest and meanest. The facts will be duly appreciated here, where both ships are known as regular frequenters of the port.

DAMAGED DOCK

THE GREAT GRAVING DOCK AT PUERTO MILITAR.

Serious concern is expressed at the reported fractures which have appeared in the floor of the Great Graving Dock at Puerto Militar, which was constructed primarily for the use of Dreadnoughts and the larger armoured vessels of the Navy.

Enquiries have tended to somewhat quiet the apprehension felt at first. When the Dock was emptied a few days ago it was noted that a small crack had formed near the centre. Ingeniero Grieben has stated that the breakage affects only the superficial flooring and does not extend to the lower coating which is about 12 feet thick and has suffered no perforation or damage whatever.

The repairs necessary to make the bottom of the dock absolutely solid and waterproof will probably take about four months, during which time of course the great units of the Navy must remain homeless as far as docking facilities are concerned. This however, say the authorities, will not signify as the Dock will be fully repaired by the end of March and, unless accidents supervene, the Rivadavia will not require docking until July.

The cost of repairs, some $80,000 gold will fall exclusively on the Contracting Firm of Constructors who are liable for all risks until the Government take it over formally.

BRITISH CONSUL FOR CONCORDIA

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—Your special correspondent in this part of the Republic is not very well up in local history.

In the letter published in your issue of 26th inst. the following remarks are made concerning the fact that we have no British Vice-Consul here:—

"It would not cause much trouble to those in authority to allow the gentleman who was previously the official head of the British community here again to assume the corresponding duties."

We have had only two British Vice-Consuls in Concordia, first Mr. Oliver Budge, and then Mr. Herbert Robinson.

As both gentlemen are deceased, the pious wish of your correspondent is neither possible nor desirable.

Mr. Robinson resigned the Vice-Consulate about a year ago on account of ill-health, and the post was then abolished by the British authorities.

Yours, etc.

GABRIEL.

ALLIES' FINE FIGHT IN SERBIA

Bulgarian Army Essays a Turning Movement.

MORE MEN, GUNS, AND MATERIAL REACH SALONICA.

French Forces Retire from Krivolak

London, Dec. 8.

The British, however, completely repulsed the enemy. The battle is still raging.

BRITISH ARMY'S GALLANT RESISTANCE.

London, Dec. 8.

Despatches from Athens state that the Bulgarians suffered heavy losses in their attack on the British at Strumitza. The latter have been reinforced and are in a position to offer a stout resistance.

The battle is continuing with great violence in several sectors. The Bulgarians are believed to be trying to fight a decisive engagement under the impression that the British are not strong enough to hold out against them.

BULGARIA SUMMONS MORE MEN TO THE COLOURS.

London, Dec. 8.

It is reported from Salonica that, according to information from Sofia, a new Bulgarian army is being raised, to include all men of military age, even those who were not passed at the commencement of the operations. It is believed that the Bulgarians have undertaken to second the plans of the Germans, not only in the Balkans, but on other fronts.

THE SOFIA VERSION.

New York, Dec. 8.

An official despatch from Sofia reports:—

"A Bulgarian division destined to cut off the retreat of the Serbian forces defending Monastir was sent by way of Smiloway towards the Monastir-Resna road. The division, advancing, compelled the Serbians to evacuate the town on the 3rd instant. To-day we occupied the town.

"Other divisions are advancing towards Ochrida and Dibra, and to the west of Prisrend.

"The advance towards Djakova has proceeded. About noon on the evening of the 4th, a division of our troops crossed the White Drina and occupied Djakova.

"According to the latest advices from our troops operating near Prisrend, it is stated that the defeat of the Serbians near Tulaluma had the character of a catastrophe. During the fight from Prisrend to Tulaluma, the Serbians lost all their artillery, automobiles, the royal carriage, 320 omnibuses, and a considerable quantity of munitions of all sorts. At every step we came upon guns abandoned on the road and in a position which showed the state of panic which had seized the Serbians.

"The Albanians, who were oppressed for two or three years by the Serbians are revolting and fighting against the Serbian bands wandering in the Albanian mountains."

ALLIES HEAVILY REINFORCED.

London, Dec. 8.

A British naval brigade commanded by Admiral Troubridge has accompanied the Serbians in their retreat, and will continue to keep in touch with them as long as its services are of use to them.

Rush to the Colours

MEN FOR GERMAN EAST AND EUROPE

London, Dec. 7.

General Smuts, Minister of War in the South African Union, has announced in Parliament that the result of the recruiting which was ordered by the Government has exceeded the most sanguine expectations. Sufficient men have already been enrolled to form a far larger army than would be necessary to carry out with success the campaign in German East Africa.

As there is a large surplus, and as the men have expressed a wish for active service, the South African Government will organise several regiments with them and despatch them to any point indicated by the British War Office.

THE FAILURE IN MESOPOTAMIA

Statements in the House of Lords

TOWNSHEND'S ARMY TO BE IMMEDIATELY REINFORCED.

Australians and New Zealanders to Leave for Mesopotamia.

London, Dec. 8.

In a discussion in the House of Lords on the situation of the British troops in Mesopotamia, Lord Sydenham said that the aspect of affairs in that region was a gloomy one.

He then read a Turkish official despatch received via Berlin which was as follows:—

"On the Irak front we continue the attack on the British whom we defeated on December 2. In a single day our troops covered a distance of 15 miles."

"The Turkish troops occupied Baghera, west of Kutelmara."

"In the course of the week we have captured 8 officers and 520 rank and file."

His Lordship said that the news of Turkish origin was clear and left no doubt as to the importance of the reverse suffered by the British.

In the Dardanelles the storms of winter have begun, causing much suffering to the Allies at Gallipoli. The Allies are in difficulties over supplying the troops, which are said to be suffering for want of water.

Lord Crewe, replying to various questions, said that the taking of Bagdad had been considered a matter of great importance from the political and military point of view. Unfortunately it had not been achieved although General Townshend had over a division under his command. Experts held that such a force was sufficient for the purpose.

It is now known that General Townshend had had to make efforts much greater than had been considered requisite to achieve the end aimed at.

The attack on Bagdad had been studied for several months, and the whole operation was directed by the Commander-in-Chief. Notwithstanding the reverse, General Townshend still has the full confidence of his superior officers.

Lord Sydenham then stated that in the gloomy picture presented by Lord Crewe there was one very brilliant spark of light, and that was the manner in which the British troops fought at Ctesiphon against numerically superior forces. Despite the reverse, they captured 1600 prisoners.

It was not to be forgotten that almost all the British troops were Hindus. The fact that General Townshend had been able to save his army from a complete disaster when everything was against him was an honour to him.

BRITISH ARMY REPORTED TO HAVE LOST ITS TRANSPORT WAGONS.

New York, Dec. 8.

A telegram from Athens says that a large proportion of the transport wagons of the British expeditionary forces in Mesopotamia have been unable to reach the Kutelmara base.

The losses of the transport wagons will not only prevent renewed advances upon Bagdad, but will also endanger the retreat of the British.

For Mesopotamia

The feverish anxiety with which Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg's pronouncements are awaited demonstrate the true state of the public mind.

Interest is mainly concentrated to a review which the Chancellor is expected to give of the general situation in the Balkans and the possibilities existing of making peace, with an outline of the conditions under which Germany is disposed to enter into negotiations. In this matter the terms announced by the Chancellor will be those reached in conference with the Kaiser, after consultation with the Secretaries of State and the party leaders.

The conference lasted from 2.30 to 6 p.m., the Ministers returning the same night to Paris and London respectively.

The papers say that the object of the conference was to discuss the means whereby to effect unity of action in all operations against the enemy and to promote increased efficacy of co-operation among the Allies. It appears to have been agreed that the best method for carrying out these proposals will be to establish a Grand Council of War over all the Allied Powers.

JOFFRE AS PRESIDENT.

New York, Dec. 6.

Telegrams from London report that the newspapers of that city deal at length with the Conference of Calais. They all accept as a foregone conclusion that General Joffre will be selected as President of the Grand Council of War which will be in perpetual session so long as the war lasts. APPEAL FOR ADDITIONAL REINFORCEMENTS

Tsar's Military Experts Undismayed by Teuton Threats

New York, Dec. 8.

Despatches from Petrograd state that information has been received from private sources that Marshal von Hindenburg is awaiting reinforcements in order to commence fresh operations against the Russians.

Russian military men believe that in the existing condition of the German Empire General von Hindenburg's hopes are doomed to failure.

It is certainly that troops are required on other German fronts, and therefore von Hindenburg who, in spite of the masses of troops already under his command, is constantly asking for more, is unlikely to have his requests granted.

RUMANIA MAY AWAIT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE BALKANS

Amsterdam, Dec. 7.

M. Bratiano, brother of the Rumanian Premier, is reported from Bucharest to have stated in a speech that while the belligerents were exhausting their strength, Rumania ought to be adding to her own and holding herself ready to join the side which is triumphant at the proper moment. He maintained that in no case should Rumania ally herself to a group of Powers which showed weakness and therefore had little hope of success.

The co-operation of Rumania in any case would be offered to that group of Powers which had the greatest chance of proving the victors. The fate of her neighbour Serbia must be a lesson to Rumania not to run the risk of sacrifice without the certainty of success.

CONSTANTINE COMPLAINS

Unfairly Treated by Opponents

IS ENTIRELY FRIENDLY TO ENTENTE

London, Dec. 8.

The report has been received and published of an interview which a newspaper correspondent has had with King Constantine of Greece.

His Majesty on receiving the correspondent said that before speaking about the political situation he wished to make a personal declaration.

He proceeded to state that he greatly regretted to find that he was being attacked by the British Press and that suspicions existed regarding his proposals. He declared that he had always been a friend of England where he had been in the habit of spending much of his leisure time. On all occasions he had shown how greatly he appreciated the English and English life. He was also bound to England by ties of parentage more than to any other country.

THE DUTIES OF A KING.

However it appeared that England had forgotten that he was King of Greece and born in that country; that he had to fulfil duties which were perfectly definite, and that upon him lay responsibilities which at times were weighty.

It was his duty to keep Greece aloof from the general conflagration, and therefore he had to adopt a policy of neutrality. The lamentable state of Belgium was always before him and he had no desire that Greece should share her fate.

It was further necessary to bear in mind that Greece had just gone through two wars, which, although victorious, had left scars that required a long time to heal. He was therefore determined to prevent his country from incurring the danger and disasters of a great campaign.

He could not consent to Greece partaking in the war except in the case of her existence being threatened, or of there being an absolute certainty of a victory so great as to compensate for her sacrifices.

THE FRIEND OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

King Constantine then continued: "I have given my solemn word that Greece does not and cannot entertain hostile intentions towards the Allies. The nation, from the beginning of her modern history down to the present, has been the friend of England and France; and it is an insult to the country and to its sovereign even to suppose that it is capable of committing an act of treason. Despite all this I am treated in a way which causes me much grief.

"There is in Greece a party which is always anxious to intervene in the war; but those of whom the party is formed do not understand the situation nor take account of the dangers which would ensue from the realisation of their desire.

"The intervention of Greece would bring with it an immediate attack on the Dardanelles. Such an undertaking would be a game of chance in which we might or might not be successful; but in our position we cannot afford to run such risks.

THE LESSON OF BELGIUM.

"Let us assume that after Greece intervened in favour of the Allies the latter resolved to restrict their field of action in the Balkans or withdraw completely. What would be the situation of Greece in such a case? She would become a second Belgium, delivered over to the mercy of her enemies. Under such circumstances can refusal to make common cause with the Allies be construed as an unfriendly act?

"Greece has given proofs of her friendly feelings for the Allies by placing her railways and telegraph lines at the disposal of the Allied troops which have been landed at Salonica. Did she not by so doing exceed her rights as a neutral country, and has it not been made possible that the Austro-Germans and Bulgarians may ask similar facilities?

"There is no doubt that mistakes have been made by all parties concerned. Thus for example, let me ask, was the confidence of the Allies in Bulgaria justified? Would it not have been better for the Allies to repose more trust in Greece?

"It seems as though we have to suffer for the small amount of success gained by the policy of the Allies elsewhere.

GREECE'S TREATY WITH SERBIA

"In regard to the treaty between Greece and Serbia, this referred exclusively to the possibility of a war in the Balkans. The two States agreed upon mutual assistance in the case of either of them being attacked by Bulgaria; but the possibility of an attack on Serbia by two great military Powers of Europe in addition to Bulgaria was never considered. What possible assistance could have Greece been to Serbia? Her interference could have had only one result—the ruin of two Balkan states instead of one.

"As for the rumours about a secret treaty with Bulgaria, these are absolutely destitute of foundation. Bulgaria has always been the hereditary foe of Greece.

"Returning to the situation in Macedonia, the Allies made certain requests to Greece regarding the employment of their forces in our territory there, besides other things.

MUST KNOW THE ALLIES' PLANS

"In reply we gave our solemn promise to do nothing that might be prejudicial to the interests of the Allies. But before entirely committing ourselves and adopting a programme from which there would be no drawing back we required to know what was the programme of action drawn up by the Allies. The answer we received was that England and her Allies were considering the matter; but up to the present they have adopted no definite programme.

"Can it justly be claimed under these conditions that Greece shall take measures of the utmost political and strategic importance? Can we justly be called upon to withdraw our troops to other parts of the country so long as the Allies themselves have not decided whether to occupy or evacuate certain regions?

"It is necessary for Greece to know what the plans of the Allies are, although whatever those plans may be, Greece will not abandon her neutral attitude."

The King expressed pleasure at the visits to Greece of Lord Kitchener and M. Denys Cochin, with both of whom he had fully gone into the situation. He hoped that the visit would help to dissipate many of the clouds that hung upon the horizon. His Majesty again declared his entire sincerity, saying that the suspicion with which his political proposals and aspirations had been regarded was as unjust as it was cruel.

"In the region south of Khorassan, on the Araxes river and in some of the mountainous sectors, the snow is 18 feet deep."

New York, Dec. 4.

In the trial of the Manager and some of his subordinates of the Hamburg American line of steamships for supplying coal and provisions to German warships in the Atlantic, thereby violating the neutrality of the United States, it was shown that the Naval Attaché to the German embassy, Captain Boy-Ed, had received from Germany $750,000 for fitting out vessels using American merchant ships, and had given American passports to German agents to enable them to carry on espionage in the countries of the Allied nations.

Four of the accused whose names were Karl Buenz, Adolph Achmeister, Georg Boter and Joseph Bolpinhaus, were sentenced to imprisonment for two years and a fine of $10,000.

SIMON'S LITTLE JOKE

ATTACK ON LORD NORTHCLEFFE.

London, Dec. 2.

The Home Secretary, Sir John Simon, stated yesterday in the House of Commons that unless the newspapers "The Times," "The Daily Mail" and others belonging to Lord Northcliffe took due regard of the mild warnings uttered by the Government, sterner measures would be adopted.

Sir John Simon compared Lord Northcliffe to "an ill bird that fouls its own nest," and dubbed him a "Halfpenny Marshal." He read numerous extracts from Lord Northcliffe's papers to prove that the tone of them was injurious to the cheerful prosecution of the war, and were made much use of by the enemy.

The Minister referred particularly to a map published by the "Daily Mail" on October 11, announcing that Belgrade had fallen and that the route to Suez and India, shown in the map, were open to the advance of the enemy upon the most valuable of the British possessions. At the same time, the "Daily Mail" magnified the power of Germany and belittled that of the British fleet.

This map, Sir John Simon stated, had been reproduced in seven languages by the enemy and distributed at all points where it would have most beneficial effect from their point of view, and do most injury to the interests of Britain.

Mr. R. McNeill and Sir A. Markham defended Lord Northcliffe.

He says that the King has outraged popular liberty and usurped the rights of Parliament. He counsels his friends to abstain from recording their votes at the coming elections, as it would merely be going through a ridiculous farce in order to give a shadow of legality to spoliation of the most barefaced description.

GREAT BOMB-PLOT

TO DESTROY ITALIAN ARSENALS

Rome, Dec. 2.

As further details of the plot discovered by the Turin police to blow up the arsenals of Italy are brought to light it is possible to form a more accurate appreciation of the magnitude of the conspiracy.

The conspirators had arranged to blow up the arsenal at Turin, and for that purpose a large case full of explosives was to be sent from Lugano to the banks of the lake, conveyed by certain porters who had been instructed to handle it with great care.

On the very day these arrangements were made the Turin police advised their confreres in Switzerland of the conspiracy at Lugano; also that a former official in the German consulate at Milan had given money to an anarchist living at Zurich to blow up the arsenal or the railway tunnel on the line from Turin to Paris.

The German ex-official went to Lugano while the anarchist left for Italy, having been instructed that he would find the explosives at a certain point on the bank of the lake. On reaching Italy however the anarchist changed his mind and went to the Turin police to whom he confessed everything.

Information having been transmitted to the Swiss police at Lugano the case of explosives was discovered and seized. It was found to contain explosive substances more powerful than dynamite. The German also was arrested and confessed, stating that he was acting under orders.

The incident will result in diplomatic representations to Germany.

KILLED.

London, Dec. 6.

A MACHINE GUN ARMY

GERMANY'S REMEDY FOR LOSSES IN MEN.

Petrograd, Dec. 6.

In a letter to the "Russky Invalid," the organ of the War Office, Colonel Clerget refers to the enormous use of machine guns by the Germans and declares that the whole German army is transformed into one huge battery of machine guns. The German Government spares neither money nor labour in training every soldier in the ranks, including even the wagon drivers, in the use of these weapons.

The Germans are also introducing into the ranks an increasing number of automatic rifles, the German soldier as a rule being averse to engaging with the bayonet.

Colonel Clerget describes the new double-explosive shrapnel used by the Austrians. First the shells burst upon striking anything solid, and the smaller missile contained by the shell also explodes; but the second explosion is stated to have but slight effect.

The Colonel states that the quality of the Austro-Hungarian as a soldier has improved to the extent that there is now little to choose between him and the German.

GERMANY'S BATTLE BIPLANES

CARRY GUNS, WIRELESS, AND LARGE CREW.

London, Dec. 2.

A telegram by Reuter's Agency states that information has been received that the construction of aeroplanes in Germany is undergoing a revolution.

The works are now building large machines capable of carrying heavy loads including guns, wireless apparatus, petroleum bombs, etc.

A recently tested aeroplane was a gigantic battle biplane of improved model. Its dimensions were enormous, being three times as large as one of the Albatross type. It had great lifting power and stability as well as unequalled speed. It was protected by a thick belt of steel and carried guns and a numerous crew.

CONSTRUCTED BY GERMANS IN FLANDERS.

London, Dec. 6.

Despatches from Holland say that the German military engineers with the aid of many thousands of labourers are at work repairing the roads of access to the front in Flanders and in the north of France and improving the trenches.

For several days hundreds of truckloads of ballast broken by the prisoners in Germany have been brought up either for making new roads for supplying the trenches from the rear or for repairing those which have been cut up by the traffic. A thousand trucks loaded with ballast, planks, beams and strainers are at Roulers station.

The timber is for shoring up the sides of the trenches and flooring them. The trenches are being made as commodious as the present headquarters and have all necessary underground offices, etc., adjoining them.

In some industries operations are as active as before the war, these principally being metals, chemicals, and leather. Others continue depressed. Textile works have fallen off 11 per cent. below normal as compared with last year. Parisian dressmaking has shown an unexpected revival.

The total number of Canadian troops under arms for service in Europe is about 220,000 and will be raised to 250,000 by the beginning of next year. It is probable that another 50,000 will be enrolled later on.

A million and a half on travelling expenses, etc.

The secret service is excellently organised and has its headquarters in Broadway Avenue, as also are the German Consulate and the German Chamber of Commerce, all being able to communicate with each other.

Captain von Papen, the Military Attaché to the German Embassy, and Captain Boy-Ed, the Naval Attaché, were in the habit of making long journeys. They were frequently at Galveston, where they had interviews with Huerta and Felix Diaz, and lavished money freely.

FRESILENTE MITRE CASE

Britain and Neutral Shipping

AN OFFICIAL STATEMENT

The following cable, which must necessarily bear on the Presidente Mitre case, was received by THE HERALD last evening:

To-day's papers publish the following explanation given by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs relative to the seizure of neutral vessels by British warships:

"Certain vessels flying neutral colours have recently been seized by British cruisers. The seizure was based on the claim that those vessels were the property of the enemy; therefore, in accordance with the principles of the law applied in such cases by the British and United States Prize Courts, they are enemy ships and may be captured.

"Both the Hocking (?) and the Genesee will be brought to England; but that does not mean that they cannot be returned to their owners if the Prize Courts do not sanction their seizure."

CABO CORRIENTES PRONOUNCED IMMUNE.

There is a distinct fall in the excitement about the Mitre affair, and comment is almost exhausted for the present. The cruiser Orama and the prize are anchored about thirty miles from Montevideo, expecting orders regarding the Presidente Mitre's cargo.

The Chief of the Veterinary Port Inspection has been requested to examine the cattle and sheep on board, and it is probable that these have been disembarked by this time, together with such portions of the cargo as are the property of Montevideo merchants.

It is understood that the commander of the cruiser has notified the captain of the Cabo Corrientes that he may safely resume his runs between the Argentine and Uruguayan capitals, as no measures would be taken against his ship without further orders from the British Admiralty.

THE PRESIDENTE MITRE

ESSENTIALS AND NON ESSENTIALS

It is a generally admitted principle by all internationalists, says La Nación, that the duties imposed upon States may be divided into two classes clearly differentiated: perfect duties and absolute duties, founded on the supreme interests of the society of Nations; and imperfect duties, which derive themselves from the voluntary relations between peoples, and on which, according to juriconsults of the older school, more than on natural right, are founded contract rights either traditional or written.

Among the first are the duties of States to mutually respect each other's territories, sovereignty, legislation and jurisdiction.

Among the second are found those emanating from voluntary relations: rights of commerce or of courtesy, respect to the flag, to the extra-territorial treatment of ambassadors and diplomatic agents, the attentions which one nation owes towards another, to its chief of State, its representatives, armed forces, etc.

The first-named duties or rights are requisite, and any failing in these may produce the most serious conflicts between peoples.

Failings of the second class are ered nor honours paid, with the war standard as flown by warships and fortresses, which is saluted and regarded as the symbol of sovereignty.

But, even if there be no intention of the kind, it should be considered seriously whether or not, during the present war, we are to be masters of free communication at our good pleasure between Argentine ports and free to make regulations and arrangements whereof we should be the only judges as to right and convenience. Otherwise it seems that this is not the time to assign greater importance to the fulfilment of imperfect duties relatively to those which are absolute and imperative.

Both the science of Right and commonsense condemn such attitudes.

Proud and powerful nations, when faced only by weak peoples, may, abusing their superior strength, demand reparations by threats of bombardment. Such nations as are morally greater and more remarked for their peaceful activities than for their show of warlike power, only adopt extreme measures, warlike or otherwise, for diplomatic resources must not be confounded with resort to the sword when their rights are in peril or are not recognised.

On such occasions there are no pacifists, or the pacifists disappear; and if that does not happen always which does occur sometimes, it is because, happily for the nations, there are almost always among the weaker peoples men generous and disinterested en-been advised that they are in no danger, and if they do not choose to make the trip, it is not the fault of the British commanders.

With regard to the Camerones, her position short of coal and on a lee shore, is said to be critical, yet if she puts to sea she fears to be captured by the British cruisers.

PRESIDENTE MITRE PROTEST

DISCOURSE BY MANUEL UGARTE

A meeting of protest was held yesterday afternoon at Plaza Congreso, against the seizure of the Presidente Mitre by a British cruiser. To give effect to the occasion, the base of Moreno's statue had been selected as the place of meeting.

The proceedings were energetic, but whether they were altogether wise or calculated to promote a prompt settlement of the matter under dispute is a contestable point. Don Manuel Ugarte attacked the Government with acerbity for their attitude in merely making a protest. He raked up several events by no means recent, and having no bearing on the subject, but very well calculated to inflame the popular mind, referring to the British invasions of over a century ago, the annexation of the Falkland Islands, and other matters of a similar nature, while pointing out the tendencies of present British policy; which are, naturally, tyrannic and overbearing. A student, one of those profound and sagacious thinkers, who are remarked for precocious eloquence and moderation, also harangued the meeting with fiery eloquence and vehemence, and the ears of My Lords at Whitehall should be burning hot. Subsequently the protesters formed an irregular column and marched down the Avenida, breaking up on reaching Bolivar.

BELIEVED TO HAVE GONE TO THE FALKLANDS.

Since her departure from Montevideo, under the escort of the Orama on November 28, no news has been received concerning the s.s. Presidente Mitre. The two vessels were last seen off the Banco Inglés. The crews of vessels arriving in Montevideo from various parts, during this week state that no sign of either vessel has been seen.

It is believed that the Falkland Isles is the objective and that some news of the vessels' arrival on Dec. 11 or 12 may be expected from Port Stanley.

more easily corrected and less liable to hurry nations to the last extremities of international argument.

Public opinion has appeared forgetful of the principal aspects of the regrettable case of the Presidente Mitre, to fix themselves on merely secondary accessories which do not really possess the importance of the fundamental facts of this grave question; the setback to the rights of peoples implied in the denunciation of Article 57 of the Declaration of London.

It will be needful, undoubtedly, if this state of affairs is to be remedied, that the principal American nations shall unite, headed by the United States, as signatories to that Declaration, and state their entire disagreement with the reactionary and one-sided proceedings of the British Government.

Against the second, the more immediate and peremptory necessity is, as no doubt the Argentine Chancellery has found, to formulate a vigorous claim which, leaving on one side the undoubted right of a nation to give its protection to its merchant ships in the manner it may find most convenient, will go as far as is possible to safeguard the interests of our coasting trade, threatened by the attitude of Great Britain.

The Argentine flag has not been sailed. Nor was it ever intended as Great Britain's intention in lowering it was to remove it merely from a vessel which it was believed had no right to fly it.

Only gross ignorance could confuse the merchant flag, to which, according to the customs of all maritime nations of the world, no salutes are rendered enough to prefer that their country should suffer a diplomatic reverse to a reverse in war, whereby they fall under the irreflecting fury and aspersions of people, but will not hurry the country into a desperate adventure merely for the sake of an hour of cheers, acclamations and momentary popularity.

A call is therefore made to calmness and coolness, which at the same time does not exclude the most ardent patriotism.

CREW BEING ENGAGED IN THE PORT.

Conversations have been taking place between Dr. de la Plaza and the Minister of Agriculture regarding the case of the Presidente Mitre. The four hundred five stock animals on board the ship are said to have been disembarked by 4 p.m. on Sunday, after which the Presidente Mitre left probably to anchor off the Banco Inglés.

It is known that firemen and deck hands are being engaged in Buenos Aires, and are being despatched to man the ship and carry her to England.

As far as is known, of the other four ships of the same Coy. which are also in a doubtful position, two are at Buenos Aires, one at Montevideo, and another, the Camarones at Comodoro Rivadavia, where she is said to be running short of coal owing to the necessity of keeping steam in the boilers constantly, from the danger of seas setting in shore. The captains of the river steamers, Cabo Corrientes and Cabo Santa Maria, have already

UP THE TIGRE

Y. M. S. C. Picnic

A PLEASANT DAY. ENJOYMENT
RAINPROOF

Wednesday, Dec. 8

To have made excellent arrangements for an agreeable excursion in such a manner that the entire event from the moment of mobilisation moved with the smoothness of a well constructed machine, and kept moving in that manner throughout, is the achievement of the Young Men's Social Club Committee, in regard to yesterday's aquatic Picnic on the Tigre Delta.

The tale of those who descended from the train at Tigre and were duly delivered on the wharf, was five score and fifteen, and the accommodations of the magnificent Full Powered Steamship Pinta were required to their full extent, although everyone with a little contrivance manage to stow themselves away comfortably on that fine vessel which left the quayside punctually at 9.45 a.m., dressed rainbow fashion with flags of all sorts, shapes and colours (except the Austrian, German and Turkish).

A pleasant breezy, although hot morning, gave promise of a perfect day and, if that promise were not duly honoured later, the Committee cannot be blamed for the well known eccentricities of the Clerk of the Weather, whose unreliability has in this case been almost backed by malice. Heading right up the Lujan, the steamer proceeded some distance, and then by a series of snake-like contortions, succeeded in turning, which is a ticklish manoeuvre wherever the water is particularly low, and then went down again, and round into the Parana channels of the Delta. The wooded islands are at present looking their best, the brilliant green of the fresh leaves of the trees contrasting with the masses of reeds, the gorgeous flowers, and in some places, semi-tropical birds and sunlit water. The latter is to be sure muddier than usual and some bathers had a rich deposit of green slime in their hair. Passing these and other natural or incidental marvels, The Pinta hastened towards the Recreo Revetti, lemonade and biscuits beguiling the voyage. This desirable retreat was reached at about 11.30, the steamer being obliged by reason of scarcity of liquified mud to manoeuvre to a landing stage about 200 yards distant. The Recreo Revetti is all that can be expected in the way of cleanness and modest comfort. It had already a few benches and two long tables placed under the trees were ready set for lunch for the multitude.

It was at this point that a contretemps began to develop. In spite of the gentlemanly confidence placed in his good intentions the Clerk of the Weather or El Director del Tiempo had played a scurvy trick, and dark clouds appeared, with the flame, over the tree tops, while the wind grew colder and raised much dust, an evil presage. In fact a heavy storm broke on the lunchers, and broke them up "in most admired disorder." Everyone however, took the mishap philosophically, and after some rearranging a good lunch was obtained under shelter, after which the driest made a bolt for the steamer and went for another cruise, up across the Parana and some distance along the Rio Capitan. On returning, it was evident that much dancing had been in progress inside, but the ground was dry enough for the Sports which took place directly after tea. The programme and results being as appended:

2nd Race, "Members' Race."—1st,

F. Kelly (prize presented by Messrs. Picardo and Co.)

3rd Race, "Children's Race."—1st, F. Owen, (all other children who ran got a prize as well).

4th Race, "Ladies' Consolation Race."—1st, Miss B. Sanders; 2nd, Miss D. Cuff.

In the Tug-of-War, the rope broke, but the Committee, who were v. the rest of Created Beings, were adjudged winners. All secured a generous share of sawdust and mud upon their garments. While the successful contestants were gloating over their prizes, the imperious blast of the Pinta's fog horn called all to re-embark.

At 5.45 the party left for the Tigre, and reached it about 6.40, escaping sand banks, mines, and submarines en route, only saluting one British craft and dutifully shaking their fists at one Hun who went by. The return to town was made by the 6.50, and about 8, the hundred and odd separated at Retiro, justly convinced that they had had a really good time, and invoking blessings on the hard working officers and Committee, who are: Prof. G. H. Wellby, President; Mr. Sam Kirby, Vice-President; Mr. F. Martin, Secretary; Mr. G. H. Anderson, Treasurer; Mr. L. Nugent, Mr. E. Jacobs, Mr. S. Wright, and Mr. W. J. Burton, Committee.

Those who were present were as follow:

IMPROVEMENT AT LA PLATA

PROJECTED GENERAL MARKET.

At the present moment the authorities of La Plata are exercising their minds with a project whereby the populace will be able to obtain at reduced prices the necessary articles of life. It is proposed that a large central market shall be opened and foodstuffs sold therein which come direct from the producers. To assist the scheme, it is also intended to electrify the railway in the locality of the suppliers. There are, it is claimed, many quintas and vegetable growing places close to La Plata which find it well nigh impossible under present conditions to get the supplies to market owing to inaccessibility.

The scheme has received much public support and many eulogies as being one of vast benefit to the city and to the small producer.

The paving and proper construction of the roadways is also under consideration and will assist greatly in giving greater transport facilities.

DR. NAON

AMBASSADOR TO THE U.S.A.

ARRIVES IN THE CAPITAL

Expectation had placed the arrival of Dr. Romulo S. Naon yesterday on his return from the United States at as early an hour as 7 a.m. and at that time a few people had actually put in an appearance, their reward being a wait of five hours and a half as it was not until 12.30 that the Vauban was moored at the Quay. By that time the gathering had swelled to very large dimensions and the appearance of Dr. Naon was hailed with enthusiastic applause and "vivas!" On descending the gangway which he did briskly and with a pleasant smile of sly humour, the first to greet him with a hearty handshake was the Hon. Frederic Stimson, Ambassador of the United States. As he reached the quay the applause broke out afresh. One of the Sociedad de Juventud harangued Dr. Naon with great fervour assuring him that language was often inadequate to express great emotions and that such was the case with the young men met to honour him and in whose name he spoke. He was also assured of the pride felt in his conduct in his high office by his compatriots and their admiration of his character and example.

Dr. Naon replied in a few words to the effect that he had merely carried out his duties and discharged the mission confided to him and that there was no occasion to magnify so greatly the fact that he had fulfilled his obligations as a diplomatist and as an Argentine. Accompanied by members of his family and personal friends, the Ambassador then succeeded in making his way through the applauding throng. Among those present to receive him were the President's Aide-de-Camp representing him, the Minister of Interior, the Sub-Secretary Dr. Cantilo, and Dr. Barilari Master of Ceremonies.

A constant stream of visitors besieged Dr. Naon's residence during the afternoon. It is understood that he intends to call on the Foreign Minister, Dr. Murature, to-day and to request audience of the President.

To a few questions which were put to him at odd moments of his transit regarding foreign policy, Dr. Naon replied, as might be supposed, with the utmost politeness that he did not speak of such matters until he had discussed them with the Chancellery on his ambassadorial character.

THE CENSORSHIP

TO BE APPLIED TO LETTERS FROM THE STATES.

London, Dec. 2.

The British Government has decided to re-establish the censorship of correspondence from America. Some thousands of women have been sent from London to Liverpool to revise the correspondence from the New World.

THE NEXT PRESIDENT

Prospects of the Parties

RADICALS V. DEMOCRATS

During March or April of the coming year the electorate of the Republic will be called upon to select a President and a Vice-President for the 1916-1922 term.

Several causes combine to make the forthcoming campaign most interesting as well as extremely difficult on which to indulge in forecasts. For the first time voting will be really secret and the electors will be under no pressure, direct or otherwise, from the actual occupant of the Chair. Also this will be the first occasion in Argentine political history in which two large, well organized parties stand face to face all over the country. When, about the end of the present year, the definite candidates to be put forward by each party are made known individual merits can be discussed. Until then the final selections are only subjects of speculation. Each side has a large number of probables and the aspirants for honours are numerous, but with one or two notable exceptions none stand out prominently.

The Radical Party claim to possess the best chance of victory, and the results of late elections certainly have been favourable to them. Always strong in the Federal Capital they had on the occasion of the last General Election to play second to the Socialists, but, due to the split in the latter party, the former are now confident of their ability to capture the majority. In the Province of Buenos Aires, the Ugarte faction have their stronghold, but taking into consideration that National elections are run on pure lines, and that the Democrats are at present against Ugarte, a majority for the Radicals in the Queen Province would surprise nobody. The elections for Governor in the Provinces of Santa Fé, Cordoba, and Entre Rios have been carried fairly easily by the Radicals, and there is no reason to suppose that a change of front is liable to take place. These three provinces together with Buenos Aires and the Federal Capital are the most densely populated and consequently the ones which will send most electors to the polls. Therefore, in the event of the Radicals carrying these, together with the minority in some of the other smaller states, the majority in Electoral College would be assured. The Democrats on the other hand claim that the Socialists will again triumph in the Capital, leaving the Radicals only the minority; they also hope to come to some arrangement with the Ugarte faction which will enable them to count on the Buenos Aires electors (40). The northern Provinces, as well as the minority in Santa Fé, Cordoba and Entre Rios, they regard as certainly theirs, thus making up the number necessary to ensure their candidate's nomination by the College.

There is no doubt that in Argentina the personality of the candidate, as well as that of his friends and supporters, counts for much; for this reason it is advisable to wait until the respective tickets are made public before venturing on any prophecy as to the chances of each party. Each has good names to put forward, each is strong and well-organized, each is confident of victory; what can be done except to wait and see?

HEALTHY HOUSING

Overcrowding in Buenos Aires

IMMEDIATE NEEDS AND FUTURE DANGERS

(Exclusive to THE HERALD)

There is something so parochial, so eminently suburban, in the daily round of life among the British community in Buenos Aires, that a stranger, coming into the midst of any of the hundred odd "sets" which go to make up the whole, would certainly never realise from the conversation of those about him that these people formed part and parcel of a great urban centre with a population estimated at anything from one and a quarter to one and a half million souls. We Britishers live in a world apart wherever we go. Consciously or unconsciously, the race as a whole has followed the old Hebraic precept against the intermingling of nationalities, and no-one can gainsay the fact that much of the present strength of the Empire is due to this very fact, however much the exceptional cases among us may deplore our lack of cosmopolitanism.

Yet there are certain subjects of enquiry and discussion in the social life around us which deserve closer investigation than they usually receive at the hands of strangers. Municipal matters are allowed to go by default, and the result is that very few people realise how rapidly Buenos Aires is developing some of the worst features of the old European cities, together with a few special drawbacks, to put it politely, of its own. It is not supposed for a moment that Britishers resident here are able to take up the intricacies of Municipal Government in Argentina, make up an electoral party, and vote for their representatives right away. That time may come, perhaps a generation or so hence, but meanwhile the weight of their opinion should be on the side of development and reform whenever its expression is asked for or in any way made possible.

Slums Cloaked with Respectability.

It is the general impression that slum property is unknown in Buenos Aires. In the sense in which the word "slum" is understood in London, this may be true, but any student of social conditions who cares to visit some of the more crowded conventillos in the centre of the city will find that, as regards air-space and general arrangement of living rooms, some of the newest buildings in Buenos Aires fall lamentably short of what is in Europe looked upon as the minimum of hygienic construction. Elsewhere in this issue is paraphrased an article taken from La Prensa, one of many whereby that powerful journal has sought to rouse public and official opinion on this matter. It cannot be too often repeated that lack of ventilation and absence of all direct light brings about ill effects just as much in the Avenida de Mayo as in a human rabbit warren situated round about Plaza Constitucion. Let anyone who cares to investigate for himself go into the back patio of one of the huge department houses at so-called moderate rentals that are to be found not ten squares from THE HERALD office, in streets such as Cangallo, Corrientes, or Lavalle. Hundreds of tiny departments all opening out on to a narrow air shaft running up for some five or six stories, absolutely airless save in the top flats. Theoretically hygienic, with drains duly ventilated by pipes to the upper air, sufficient bathing accommodation, and gas cookers in the kitchens; the superficial observer may scout the idea that such houses are more deadly to human health than the old tumble-down wooden houses of the Boca. Yet doctors agree that the absence of all breeze, all direct light, all outlook—even the sky is scarce visible from the ground floor—is prejudicial in the extreme to human vi-talities. The residents in such buildings, shop assistants, small clerks, indoor workers generally, are not able to counteract their surroundings by frequent excursions in the open air. They live their lives in the vitiated atmosphere about them, and the scourge of tubercular infection is not only ever-present, but is also actually germinated by the hot-bed of humanity whereof they form a part. Respectable attire—there are many shop girls in Buenos Aires who systematically starve themselves in order to follow the modes—is not a true guide to the existence of slums in Buenos Aires.

Is Reform Probable?

The steady spread of sound ideas may help to check the unnecessary crowding to the centre that is so marked a feature of modern life in Buenos Aires, but unless the Municipality take early and stringent measures, it may very well be that the close of the European war will bring about heavy immigration such as may then render physically impossible all reform. Two things should be done, and done at once: firstly the existing building regulations must be radically modified in order to give more cubic air space in patios and in inside rooms; secondly, existing buildings must be brought into line with the common precepts of modern hygiene, even at the expense of partial reconstruction. This may appear a counsel of perfection, but it has been done elsewhere and can well be done here. The great gamble in land, and the absurd mania for running up urban lots to figures on a par with those paid in London or New York, is directly responsible for the bad building—bad from a hygienic standpoint—that is lowering the city's vitality. Now or never is the time to react against this state of affairs. There is no reason why Buenos Aires should not expand freely in every direction, save along the river front, whilst there is every reason, hygienic, economic and moral, for moving to the outskirts. The process must perforce be gradual, but the Municipality should do its part now. Tax the unhealthy building out of existence, and at the same time facilitate rapid suburban communication and establish ample suburban facilities in the shape of schools, markets, recreative centres and other social amenities. If something of the sort is not done ere long, either as a result of direct official initiative or through the commonsense of the people themselves, the health returns of Buenos Aires, which are none too good in comparison with other great cities to-day, will in the next decade show such a marked depreciation as to be alarming. No-one says that Buenos Aires is unhealthy. Everyone who knows anything about the subject is agreed that it might be, given its many advantages, very much healthier than it is to-day, and the solution of the housing question would undoubtedly tend to that result.

THE ELECTIONS IN CATAMARCA

SCRUTINY TO FINISH ON SATURDAY.

Catamarca elections have finished in complete quiet and order and it is believed that the same good report can be made of the electoral results in all parts of the Province. Both parties report an absence of regrettable incidents, although more than three-fourths of the voters on the lists have recorded their votes at 95 different tables in the various polling stations of the Province.

It is expected that the scrutiny will be concluded by Saturday with the arrival of results from Santa Maria, a safe Radical stronghold. These are said to expect to return 15 to 17 electors. The Democrats speak confidently of 19. The correct and excellent attitude of the authorities is the subject of laudatory comment from both sides.

THE NEW IDEALISTS

Ford's Pacific Mission

THE SPIRIT AND THE SUBSTANCE

No-one who has the least spark of imagination in him can have read the account of the departure of Mr. Ford and his band of pacific missionaries without feeling that somewhere behind the ridiculous touches which stood out so prominently in the cabled reports there lay a distinct reflection of the old Puritan spirit that has counted for so much in the up-building of the Anglo-Saxon race, and that will, in all human probability, continue to count for much so long as the race endures. Behind the crowded quay, with its photographers, its cinema operators, its preachers, and all the other components of the strangely constituted gathering who came to see the party off, there lies something fine, something inspiring, however much one may deplore the absolute absurdity of the actual event. Mr. Ford, in the midst of a group of women chanting "America" as the ship drew away from the quay, may have been posturing, but one doubts it.

It is a forlorn hope; a ridiculous piece of personal interference with the decrees of an inscrutable Providence; a new and particularly impudent form of advertisement; all these and many other charges have been levelled at the man who has dared to take such a direct departure from all precedent. Now it is not the purpose of the present article to support either the idea or the execution of Mr. Ford's mission. That is apparently doomed to failure and ridicule from the outset. What one would desire to do is to emphasise the fact that a man, an American, an Anglo-Saxon and therefore to that extent one of ourselves, has had the courage to face the world in favour of what he holds to be a cardinal principle of existence. Not content with publishing his opinion through the Press, he has gone to vast trouble and expense to put his opinions into practice, and, knowing what lay before him, he has gone himself to bear whatever obloquy and ridicule there may be to bear. This, one submits, is courage, and courage of a very high order.

It is difficult to avoid discussing the hopelessness of the mission itself, but one may safely leave that to others. One is safe in saying that the Allied Press as a whole will show Mr. Ford wherein he has erred, and erred greatly. The thing to hold in view is the striking proof that his conduct gives one of the vast chasm between German materialism and Anglo-Saxon idealism; the unbridgeable nature of the gulf that separates their several conceptions of the human race. Mr. Ford's mission stands out because it is bizarre in the extreme, but there have been other instances of a sacrifice for principle during the course of the war. Burns in the British Cabinet, Bryan in the United States, both threw away position and honours at the call of conscience. They may have been utterly wrong; in the opinion of the writer they were utterly wrong. Yet in the face of popular opinion they set their course against the stream; not traitors, not siding with the enemy, but standing apart, giants amid a world of mental Lilliputians.

Their strength in regard to their personal attitude towards the war may be weakness, but as symbolical of the Anglo-Saxon spirit and its ultimate effect on the destinies of the world the value of such examples is beyond measure. No machine made discipline sways a nation that can produce men of such a mould; there can be no stifling of the public conscience with specious lies, no drugging its mind with tales of successes lightly won, of vast profits ready to be spent for the gathering. Germany, for all her erudition, has not produced in her latter days the man who thinks, and believes in what he thinks to the end. Her later philosophic systems have been purely academic, subjects for theses in the lecture hall rather than workable theories of life. Again and again in the course of the present war it has been proved that the individual German, great or small, is not true to himself. The extracts from the innumerable diaries found on the battlefield prove it; those strangely heart-stirring revelations of the inner souls of the men who sustain the Prussian power with their flesh and blood show up the writers as moral cowards. Again and again do they lament the material and moral degradation of their race, the senseless barbarities, the puerile vice, the utter brutishness of those about them. But throughout the whole length and breadth of the German Empire no man has yet arisen and declared that he would not be a party to the steady degradation of the race that is consequent upon the war. The iron hand of the Prussian taskmaster is hard, the penalties swift and severe. True the death penalty does not await men like Ford or Bryan, but world wide obloquy and ridicule is no light burden to face. Hence whilst the mobs may shout, and with some reason, against the folly and interference of the pacifists, the thinkers of humanity ought not to join in the hue and cry, remembering that these men have been true to their convictions, that they are of one blood with Anglo-Saxons all the world over, and that the grand old words of the poet still hold good:—

"To thine own self be true, and it shall follow, as the night the day, Thou shalt not then be false to any man."

MINERAL OIL IN MENDOZA

Petroleum workings in the district of San Rafael, Mendoza, are at the moment attracting government attention and the projected tour of inspection of a Government inspector is being looked forward to with appreciation.

Locally the Mendoza petroleum fields are considered to be of importance and of late have been receiving the attention in exaggerated eulogies, of a section of the press of this city. As there has yet been no output from the wells, anything that suggests a mine of wealth in these fields is premature.

The discovery of oil was made over five years ago and a company was formed under one Elgin Scott to exploit the discovery.

Machinery for 6 wells was purchased in Europe and apparently there were many difficulties to contend with. Fires were frequent and progress slow. The coming visit of the government official will decide the question of further development. The field is situated some 150 miles from the railway.

Sulphur too has been discovered and it is computed that 80,000 tons of the mineral yielding 97 per cent. of pure sulphur is in view. Doctor José Antonio Salas, the Government official will inspect this mine at the same time that he makes his tour of the "El Sosneado" oilfields.

WATERSPOUT IN BRAZIL

PARTIAL DESTRUCTION OF A TOWN.

A most unpleasant phenomenon is reported from Campos, in the San Eduardo district, in the State of Rio Janeiro. The locality is on the river Parahyba, from which an immense waterspout formed and, advancing over the banks and riverside land, fell with destructive effect on the place, destroying many houses and producing general devastation. A number of families are said to be reduced to the greatest destitution by the accident.

The waters of the Parahyba, which had risen, have now fallen to their usual level.

GARDEN FETE AT QUILMES

IN AID OF PATRIOTIC FUNDS.

Throughout the grounds of Mr. and Mrs. Robinson's quinta at Quilmes on Dec. 4, pretty electric lights with Chinese shades, daintily decorated stalls, a house thrown open to all, for the benefit of the Patriotic Funds, were visible.

Quilmes residents have not the supposed riches of Hurlingham, but their patriotism is unchallenged, and to this was due the success of the garden party and fete which had been organised for the raising of funds. The particular branch to which these went was the Fund for Officers' Widows and Orphans.

Early afternoon saw many attractions, a cosy corner, dances and music, all free to the 200 or more people who were there. Mrs. Junius Rugeroni and Mr. Ellis Griffin were greatly appreciated and gave their delightful performance "The Collaborators."

The Art Gallery, Miss Maisie Mackintosh's dance and the children's play attracted many people. There were many "side shows" and details of amusement, and the perfect weather enabled much enjoyment to be got from the cosy corners and from the prettily decorated stalls. Mrs. Patterson, Mrs. Pott and Mrs. Cutler were chiefly responsible for these, and at the end an auction sale, at which everything was "given away" completed a most strenuous day's work.

It was successful, and highly so, and the arrangements made for the many present were highly appreciated.

The warm weather attracted hundreds to the refreshment house during the day and evening, and there was no question that Quilmes residents, once again through the initiation of Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, kept up their high standard of patriotic effort.

TOBACCO FOR THE TROOPS

GENEROUS GIFTS BY BRITISH SEAMEN.

Two records were reported at the meeting of the Seafarers' Tobacco Fund, held on Dec. 3 under the chairmanship of Mr. A. G. Pruden, at St. John's Hall. The first of these had been achieved by the men of the Houston liner Hyperia, who contributed $205 towards the fund; and the second was that of the Lamport and Holt vessel Voltaire, whose crew had given the splendid sum of $305.05. The Voltaire's contribution was the largest received since the inception of the fund, and to the Hyperia's men fell the honour of having given a greater sum than had the crew of any other cargo vessel.

The Rev. H. Westby Brady (Hon. Treasurer), intimated that despite the small number of vessels now in port the fund continued to progress. He had received $723 during the week, and the grand total contributed to the fund now amounted to $5654.82.

The Chairman announced that in accordance with the decision reached at last week's meeting, the sum of £100 had been cabled to England for the purpose of despatching tobacco to the British troops in the Balkans. Instructions had been given that the packages should contain cards stating that the tobacco was a gift to the troops from British seamen in the port of Buenos Aires.

Mr. Pruden, in announcing that Mr. F. H. Chevallier Boutell had remitted $100 to the fund, suggested that the thanks of the Committee were due to Mr. Boutell for his generous gift. This view was endorsed by everyone present. Thanks were also accorded to the officers and men of the vessels from which donations had been received during the past week — especially to the Hyperia and the Voltaire. It was pointed out that the crew of the latter vessel were also willing contributors to the Red Cross and other Funds.

On the Rev. H. W. Brady stating that less than $300 now remained for distribution, Capt. Lewin and other members of the Committee urged the necessity for bringing before shipmasters and their men the importance of the work now being done. It was realised that there were many difficulties in the way of collecting money from men quite willing to give, but the Committee expressed the hope that all Captains, on visiting the British Consulate-General, would ask for a collecting list and make the fullest endeavour to obtain donations.

After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the meeting ended.

Among those present were: Mr. A. G. Pruden (Chairman), the Rev. H. Westby Brady (hon. treasurer), Mr. F. E. Beatty (hon. secretary), Capt. Lewin (marine superintendent, Houston Line), Capt. R. Humphries (marine superintendent, Lamport and Holt Line), Capt. H. F. Harrison (marine superintendent, Houlder Line), Capt. Mills (s.s. Hawsker), Capt. Humphreys (s.s. Tregurno), Capt. Way (s.s. Hyperia), and Mr. W. Neilson (Deacon and Co.).

The following is the latest list of donations received by the honorary treasurer: Mr. A. G. Pruden $100; s.s. Tregurno, $27; Mrs. Martin N. Coa, $60 (proceeds of sale of lavender bags); Cinema Committee of the American Church, $10; H.L. $10; s.s. Bollington Grange, $68; s.s. El Uruguayo, $38.

BRAZILIAN RAILWAYS

REPORTED TRANSFER OF BRITISH INTERESTS.

New York, Dec. 7.

The newspapers of this city announce that an operation in Brazilian railways is contemplated whereby the British and French companies in Brazil will be transferred to Mr. J. G. White, Manager of the New York Corporation.

HAYDN'S PASSION MUSIC

RENDERED AT ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH.

To render the Passion music of Haydn is an ambitious subject for many music lovers of oratorio, but this ambition was consummated on Dec. 2 in St. Andrew's Scotch Church. The amount of work and rehearsing must have been considerable to produce the good effect obtained.

There was one thing noticeable and that was the large numbers of complete strangers to the Scotch Church singing in the choir. In fact only 3 or 4 members were singing last evening. From Lomas, Quilmes and the American Church there were many familiar faces.

The church was fairly well filled, but perhaps the intense heat affected the members.

The soloists were Miss E. W. Tyson, soprano; Mrs. Jessie Pamplin, contralto; Mr. A. F. Adie, tenor; Mr. J. W. Colquhoun, bass; and Mr. J. Llewellyn Hawes was at the organ, and upon him devolved much of the hard work and the credit of the success gained.

It was a highly creditable performance and well done, but it might be said that the chorus was not as strong as the one which interpreted the music of "a Daughter of Jairus."

As the burden of Haydn's work consists in the choral rendering, it can be conceived that in a rendering of this nature a vast amount of work must have been done. It was well done and occupied the whole of this first part of the programme.

The second part consisted of organ solos, cello solos and sacred songs.

Amongst the three solos by Mr. Llewellyn Hawes, Lemarc's "Andantino" was given perfectly and with delicacy. Finlandia, a highly technical work while rendered excellently is not composed entirely of pleasing qualities. The work is a massive one and of much constructive power.

Mr. A. F. Adie excels in oratorio and both in the Passion music and in his solo from the Messiah he was in very good voice.

Miss Mabel Gallacher in Allitsen's wonderful "song of Thanksgiving" seemed nervous and while singing richly was a shade lacking in power of expression. Miss Gallacher can do better, which in itself is high criticism because she sang very well.

"O Divine Redeemer" by Mrs. Pamplin in which she produced to perfection her beautiful voice, was without doubt the item in the second half which deserves most attention. It was beautifully sung and once more confirmed a conclusion that Mrs. Pamplin surpasses herself in music of this description, which is essentially oratorio. Miss E. Tyson in the soprano work of the Passion, shewed how careful her study had been and is to be congratulated upon it. With her sisters in the second half she sang the Stabat Mater (Rossini), but it is a work that needs almost the equal study of the Passion. It lacked this.

Every credit was earned by Mr. Hawes at the organ who at times "led" the choir, but there was on occasion just a note of strain in his playing, which could not be wondered at considering the amount of work. His "Passion" music was good and his conception of "stopping" a high one, while the "Andantino" was beautifully rendered.

Throughout the congregation were attentive and highly appreciative.

SAILORS' HOME CONCERT

Saturday night's Concert at the Sailor's Home, arranged by Miss Vera Shaw, was a marked success. There was a crowded house and plenty of enthusiasm. The following was the programme with its numerous encores:—

Part I.

Piano solo, "Marcha Noruega" (E. Grieg), Miss Vera Shaw.

Song, "Rolling down to Rio," Mr. Stanley Parker.

Song, "Meet me to-night in Dreamland," Mrs. A. Clarke.

Song at the Piano, "Sing Sing Sing," encores: "Black Moon," and "Old Folks at Home," Mr. J. Crawley.

Cello solo, "Traumerie" (Schumann), encore: "Gavotte," Miss M. Wilkinson.

Song, "Young Tom of Devon," encore: "Songs of Araby," Mr. Lynn Hazelton.

Song, "The Song that reached my Heart," encore: "Beautiful Garden of Roses," Mrs. J. Eccles.

Violin solo, "Le Cygne" (St. Saens) encore: "Danza," Miss Vera Shaw.

Comic Song, "Where are you going to Charlie," encore: "There are six of us," Mr. P. Scott.

Part II.

Song, "Thy voice is near," encore: "Thora," Mrs. J. Eccles.

Cello solo, "Slumber Song" (Schumann), Miss M. Wilkinson.

Song at the Piano, "The Spaniard that blighted my life," encore "Yorkshire," Mr. J. Crawley.

Piano solo, "Rustle of Spring," Miss Vera Shaw.

Song, "Up from Somerset," Mr. Hazelton.

Song, "I wonder if you will miss me sometimes," encore: "Marguerite," Mrs. Clarke.

Recitation, "Barker's Doormat," and No. 5 Collect St." Mr. P. W. Butler.

Violin solo, "Tarantella" (Raiff) and "Madrigale," Miss Vera Shaw.

Comic song, "Sleeping in the old backyard," Mr. P. Scott.

God Save the King.

Miss Vera Shaw made very good, both in her piano selection and her violin solos. Mr. J. Crawley made a success of his numbers as did Mrs. Eccles, who has an agreeable voice. Mrs. Clark who sang at the Home for the first time, was also heard to much advantage. Mr. Stanley Parker's robust style suits "Rolling down to Rio." The cello solos of Miss Wilkinson were greatly appreciated and her playing was responsible for the circumstance as well as the instrument. In his several songs Mr. Lynn Hazelton as usual acquitted himself well. The interludes of Mr. P. W. Butler enabled the piano to take breath, when not laughing, and Mr. P. Scott achieved some truly fearsome lighting effects in the way of illuminated neckties.

FIRE AT SAN FERNANDO

SAW MILL DESTROYED.

Yesterday morning a violent fire broke out at the saw mill in Calle Once de Setiembre (San Fernando), the property of Sres. Francisco, Vicente and Tomás Magalli.

Owing to the inflammable nature of the stock the fire spread with great rapidity in the interior of the building and even threatened to spread to neighbouring houses. The works which occupied about a third of a square were speedily reduced to ashes but the volunteer Fire Brigade under Sres. Bruna and Salgado were successful in preventing an extension of the fire. The property is understood to be insured and the loss is roughly assessed at about $50,000. The origin of the fire is unknown.

SOCIEDAD RURAL

ENTRIES FOR THE DONKEY SHOW.

A circular has been sent out by the Sociedad Rural Argentina to all breeders reminding them that entries for the exhibition of asses will close on December 31.

It is pointed out that if the need for entries is insisted on, it is because of the undoubted utility and value of the asinine race in the United States, France, Spain and other countries, and their increased possibilities here. On previous occasions many entries have been presented after the lists were closed and further many leave the making of necessary enquiries much too late; but the utility of the show is undoubted, and it is pointed out that sires and dams native to the country have a marked advantage.

Earl Durham was elected as the new President.

TE AGUILA ES EL MEJOR

EDITH CAVELL

BY G. K. CHESTERTON

There is not much that can be said, or said easily, about the highest aspects of the murder of Edith Cavell. When we have said, "Dear in the sight of God is the death of his saints," we have said as much as mere literature has ever been able to say in the matter. But there are many lessons in it concerning the living problem with which we are still engaged. And one of the most important was in the sublimely simple and direct demeanour of the victim herself; especially in her candour and contempt of legalism. She was especially the representative of a full and ripe civilisation, as against that powerful half-civilisation which is attempting to destroy it, in the fact that she hungered and thirsted after the whole truth: that she was impatient of anything less than what the French who are its great champions, call the vraie vérité. That spirit refuses to be defended by fallacies: it tears its way through sophistries like shrapnel through barbed wire, even when the barbed wire is erected as a defence for it. Like a far-seeing chess-player, it scorns to spin out a game that is already decided. In this, as in so many things, it is in marked contrast with that pedantry which has become a poison in the Prussian brain. In the trial of the English nurse, the culprit summed up like a judge. And it was the judges who have shuffled like culprits.

Modern Germany is great in wealth and long preparation; it is not great in anything else; it is not even really great in tyranny. On every occasion it has hidden itself in that hasty network of excuses which its greatest victim especially despised. The quality of meanness curiously marks all its merely intellectual activities. It was the same, for instance, in the case of Belgium. In answer to that ancient and awful question: "Hast thou slain and also taken possession?" the Prussian is obliged to answer "Yes; and I have libelled, also." He stooped to declaring that he had at last found an excuse for a crime—which, in any case, he had committed without excuse. He had nothing to say in defence of having murdered his neighbour except that he had also robbed him; and that robbing him of his papers had been the means of robbing him of his reputation. If everything he said against his unhappy victim had been as true as it was false, he would still have been much the more abject figure of the two. And exactly the same note of pettiness and posthumous malice marks all his attempts to excuse himself over the Cavell case. In one of his monkey tricks of vanity, he has even attempted to twist this tragedy into a very unsoldierly sneer about the accidents of the military campaign. He says that the Allies have not yet had occasion to murder any hospital nurses in hostile countries, because they do not hold so much conquered territory. This would appear to mean, by the operations of normal logic, that if we had violently annexed Denmark in order to seize the Kiel Canal and all the ships in it, we should by that deed of chivalry have earned the right to butcher good women for behaving as such. But as our record is devoid of any such acts of virtue, we cannot hope to partake of the purer pleasures of the Prussian paradise. Apparently only those who pay no respect to treaties are privileged to pay no respect to womanhood. Even more mentally inept, if possible, is the excuse attempted by the most responsible Prussian official involved; the suggestion that the shot was as inevitable as one which should kill a Russian woman fighting in the Russian lines as a man. The parallel is not only a pedantry; but it is, like most pedantries, obviously unphilosophical. Nobody would blame the Prussian soldier whose bullet pierced a woman in a Russian uniform; first, because he is only expected to see the uniform; and, second, because killing her is a very probably the only way of preventing her killing him. But Nurse Cavell was not wearing any uniform of war, but the universally recognised uniform of peace; and she was not trying to kill German soldiers, but, on the contrary, trying to cure them. That the same human compassion which led her to help Germans to health led her also to help Englishmen to home, was certainly a technical offence; and among any people who could be regarded as sane, would have received some technical punishment, and one answering all possible purposes of German self-protection, and still not come within a thousand miles of this extravagant act of vengeance. I need only allude here to that other network of small evasions which entangled the efforts of the American and Spanish intercessors: it is all of a piece. It is that smallness of Germany which has been so much more startling to us than the bigness of Germany. But what I have just said of the more obvious course of imprisonment, if the thing was done to protect the Prussian power, brings me to the last fact which is vital to us in this war.

The thing was not done to protect the Prussian power. It was done to satisfy a Prussian appetite. The mad disproportion between the possible need of restraining their enemy and the frantic needlessness of killing her, is simply the measure of the distance by which the distorted Prussian psychology has departed from the moral instincts of mankind. The key to the Prussian is in this extraordinary fact: that he does truly and in his heart believe that he is admired whenever he can manage to be dreaded. An indefensible act of public violence is to him what a poem is to a poet or a song to a bird. It at once relieves and expresses him; he feels more himself while he is doing it. His whole conception of the State is a series of such coups d'état. In Poland, in Alsace, in Lorraine, in the Danish provinces, he has wholly failed to govern; indeed, he has never really attempted to govern. For governing means making people at home. Wherever he goes, and whatever success he gains, he will always make it an occasion for sanguinary pantomimes of this kind. And awful as is the individual loss, it is well that now, at the very moment when men, wily or weak, are beginning to talk of conciliatory possibilities in this incurable criminal, he should himself have provided us with this appalling reply.

FIRE AT BERNAL

DAMAGE TO PAPER STORES OF CIA. DE FOSFOROS.

Fires have been numerous yesterday for in addition to those at Puerto Militar and San Fernando, another took place at Bernal where the paper works of the Compañía General de Fosforos had an outbreak which was extinguished after an hour and a half of hard work by the volunteer firemen of the establishment.

Although the fire itself has done no great damage, the water poured into the burning mass from the hoses has flooded the stores and ruined large quantities of paper.

PRESIDENTIAL EXCURSION

Dr. de la Plaza and a party of friends made a river excursion on Sunday in the Tigre Delta on the motor-yacht Empire, which, it is interesting to note, is said to be propelled by oil from the Comodoro Rivadavia wells, refined and purified. Among the passengers were Dr. Ortiz, Minister of Interior, Senator Tenreiro, Deputy Miguel Aguirre and Rafael Pastor, and Sres. Iriondo, Máximo Paz, and Belisario Montero.

WHEN YOU HAVEN'T GOT YOUR GUN

BY P. P. C.

The fat man flung his bag into the space at the back of the tram and flopped down, insinuating his bulk gently but irresistibly over a good two-thirds of my seat. I am a fairly small person, however, and by crossing my legs and sitting broadside on to him, as it were, with one elbow out of the window and my head well back, I managed to adapt myself to the new conditions without unduly crowding him. This manœuvre also had the effect of bringing us almost face to face, and I was the better able to appreciate his colossal proportions. He was the kind of man who would start a conversation. I was sure of it.

"Absolutely nothing in the papers this morning."

There it was. Just the voice I had expected. The kind of voice which makes half the occupants of a tram turn and crane their necks to get a sight of the speaker.

"Oh I don't know" I replied "there's a cable—"

"Nothing in 'um" he repeated with an air of finality. "Nothing good, that is. How can we expect to get good news with that set of muddlers we've got running affairs at home."

"But my dear Sir—"

"What's doing in Flanders? Eh? What does French mean sitting there all these months doing nothing instead of bringing up his—"

"But how can he—"

"Oh it's all very well for you to argue like that, but that talk won't go down with me. I tell you the thing's being botched, Sir, botched."

"Now look here" I said, trying to ease the pins and needles in my legs, "didn't Kitchener—"

"Kitchener! Don't talk to me about Kitchener. Why doesn't he bring in conscription at once, instead of shilly-shallying about like a—"

"But if Asquith—"

"Asquith! He's another of 'em. I tell you that crowd we've got in the War Office are a set of muddlers, a set of bunglers. Couldn't be trusted to lead a cow down a lane far less conduct a campaign like this. The whole thing's been mucked up from the start. It's been nothing but bungle, bungle, bungle all along."

It sounded like a refrain, and I was not surprised to hear a native in front explaining to a friend that it must be the new hymn which had taken the place of "Tipperary."

"Look at the Dardanelles" continued the fat man extending his arm, as if they were all on show up in front of the tram beside the driver, "What's happening there?"

"The papers—"

"Papers! Do you mean to say you believe all the papers try to ram down your throat. No, no, my dear Sir, you must look at things in the light of established facts. Now if—"

"If Winston Churchill" I ventured,

He slewed half round bringing us really and truly face to face this time. "Look here" he said pointing a warning fat finger, "don't mention that man's name to me, or I'll go on for an hour."

I carefully refrained from all mention of the name again. I didn't want him to go on for an hour. In fact I felt that if he went on for another five minutes I should collapse. It made no difference however, he went on just the same as if I had mentioned it. He wiped the floor with Asquith, polished off Lloyd George in a couple of rounds and had Kitchener down taking the count before we had gone half a dozen squares. I felt very much like the puppet which sits on the ventriloquist's knee and gets talked at, and contradicted and gagged and throttled and mauled about generally. I was limp, and sagged, and just about all in, when thank Heaven the conductor caused a diversion.

"Avenida Mayo" he announced. "Avenida WHAT?" yelled the fat man trying to look out of both sides of the tram at once. "D'you mean to tell me this isn't a number 12 tram?"

"No" I informed him quietly, "this is a number 9 tram. The number is usually to be found in a conspicuous place in front. In order that you may distinguish it at night it has a red and green—"

"Here let me out of this." He reached up and gave the cord such a jerk that the black driver who had been dozing on his feet, jammed on his brakes in a funk, throwing us all violently out of our seats. The fat man recovered his hat from a lady's lap, stepped heavily on the conductor's toes and flopped off the tram. I too dropped off. I needed air.

"What made you think that was a number 12 tram." I asked as we walked to the kerb, "Shortsighted?"

"Nothing of the kind" he contradicted hotly. "I was misled by that driver. That nigger has driven number 12 for years, and here the very day I want to get to the Boca in a hurry to catch a river boat, they switch him off on to a number 9. I tell you the way they do things out here is simply rotten. No system at all. They're nearly as bad as they are at home. Not quite though. Oh no. They'd have to go a mighty long way to compete with some of the muddlers we've got. That's my idea, I don't mind telling you. Still every man to his own opinions, that's what I say. You have your way of thinking. I've got mine, and it does us good now and them to exchange ideas and get both sides of the question. I'm always open to argument, but when it comes to the War Office, Oh! wouldn't I just like to drop in and tell 'um what I think of 'um." Wouldn't I just."

I grabbed him by the second button of his waistcoat. "After you've dropped into the War Office" I said, tapping him gently with my fore finger just below the fountain-pen, "after you've dropped into the War Office, perhaps you'd like to drop into the Tramway Office, and tell 'um—here I pointed with my umbrella to number 9 now disappearing in the distance—tell 'um that your bag is on that tram."

Then I left, before he could get in a word of thanks.

POSTPONEMENT OF BATTLE PRACTICE

THE REASON WHY.

As is known, the battle practice which was to have been carried out on Sunday off Puerto Militar by the fighting units of the fleet, was postponed on account of bad weather and high sea.

An officer of rank, questioned on the subject, has stated that it is entirely wrong to attribute the postponement to lack of previous preparation. The object of the tests was not for individual marksmen or gunlayers to signalise their skill, but to ascertain which ship of the fleet was best prepared for actual battle. It would not have been possible to obtain a fair comparison in rough weather between the shooting of ships differing so enormously in tonnage, as a sea which would cause wild rolling or heavy plunging to the San Martin, Belgrano or Pueyrredon would be merely a gentle undulation to the vast and massive bulk of the Rivadavia and Moreno, with their guns mounted high above water level. Between the two armoured leviathans a competition would have been quite possible and equal, but the other ships would be enormously handicapped under such conditions.

GERMAN FACTORY DESTROYED

THE PRESS AND THE WAR

Aid for the Enemy

A PLEA FOR COMMONSENSE

Fallacious beliefs as a rule die hard. Let a parrot, or a group of human parrots, repeat an untruth a sufficient number of times and a large section of the public will believe it through months and perhaps years. There have been instances in history of such strange twists in the public mind; to-day a small section of the British people fall into the same groove in attacking Lord Northcliffe and his newspapers. They forget that they are being urged to adopt this attitude by a place-hunting group of Liberal politicians; they ignore the fact that they are being sustained in their efforts by several less successful newspaper proprietors; and so they fall into error and pull chestnuts from the fire for the benefit of interested parties.

The deplorable thing about the whole business is that many estimable people have been drawn into the net—people who should have greater sense and better memories.

If our much-abused London newspapers are so unpatriotic as unthinking people suggest, how is it possible to account for their sudden change of front?

To the critics of the "yellow press" Daily Mail, I would put one or two questions. In the replies given will be found the answer to the charges made against Lord Northcliffe to-day.

Who first of all urged millions of Englishmen to prepare to meet the German menace?

Who published Robert Blatchford's then sensational declaration that Germany was preparing to attack the British Empire?

Who—in spite of Liberal and Labour opposition to the "isolation of Germany"—urged the nation to support with enthusiasm the policy of the late King Edward in forming an entente with the great military powers on the Continent?

Who called for the strengthening of the navy and—in face of allegations of collusion with militarists and armaments firms—denounced Liberal attempts to reduce the annual building programme?

Who credited Lord Roberts with being our most far-seeing soldier and our greatest patriot?

Who urged the country to support Lord Roberts' system of compulsory training for the youth of the nation?

Who demanded that the munitions industry should be organised and that no more men should be sacrificed on wire entanglements because of a lack of high explosive shells?

The foregoing are but a few of the queries which could be put to the amateur critics. Still, they will suffice. If any man has done anything to awaken the Empire, to prepare the Empire, and to assure the downfall of Germany it has been Lord Northcliffe. He demanded, with all the resources at his command, that Lord Kitchener should be called to Whitehall to prepare the British armies for France. His subsequent attack on Kitchener has been solely on points which called for criticism. Had that not been so, then why did the Government allow the "halfpenny marshal" to compel them to form a Munitions Ministry, to place Mr. Lloyd George in charge of the organisation, and to supersede Mr. Winston Churchill? Every attack made by mere professional politicians such as Sir John Simon is a confession of the Government's ineptitude. If Lord Northcliffe be a plotter against the security of the nation, why have the Government allowed him to force their hands? Are they so weak that a mere "halfpenny marshal" can compel them to do as he wishes?

The whole situation in which the Government now find themselves is absurd; and the pity of it is that so many well-meaning people—especially those overseas—should have allowed themselves to be deluded by the cheap witticisms of unimportant men like Sir John Simon. Of the lawyer-politician class, which, by the way, is the curse of England to-day, his sole contribution to the nation's welfare is to act as a "good party man" and, incidentally, draw £4,200 a year from the national exchequer. When the country becomes more enlightened than it is at the present time, men like Sir John Simon will be regarded as luxuries too expensive to employ. Still, he is only a type. There are many of his kind; and all of them, in their anxiety to attack a political opponent who forgets politics in an attempt to organise the nation for victory, realise that the cry of "traitor" is the most effective way of damning a man.

Imaginary cases of aiding the enemy are invented. Publicity given to the defects of the Ministry are exaggerated into attempts to destroy the Government and the security of the nation. Of course it is all hypocrisy of the worst kind, but many of the public do not realise that. They forget that the real danger to the country is the incompetence and blundering capacity of Cabinet Ministers; and it is really in order to divert public attention from mistakes in Downing street that Simon and his friends invent the traitor on the doorstep.

It is quite a mistake, however, to imagine that the mass of the British people regard the Northcliffe newspapers with either dislike or contempt. Were that the case, the circulation would fall to an alarming extent. In point of fact, Lord Northcliffe's journals are more widely circulated than ever before. His last venture—an illustrated Sunday journal—has, in less than a year, attained a sale of nearly One and Three Quarter Million copies a week! This is the truth, as it is in England to-day.

Only overseas is the absurd side of the question extensively believed, and for this the responsibility lies largely with the local press. Alleged "journalists" whose knowledge of London newspapers and London methods is considerably less than their acquaintance with country parish magazines tell their readers that every paper which attacks the Government is controlled by Lord Northcliffe. Cabled reports of Governmental statements in the House of Commons are commented upon with peculiar glee. The public, having no immediate means of verifying the assertions made, believe them; but in reality they are absorbing lies written by knowledgeable and incompetent men. The great need is to understand the beginnings, progress, and policy of the great London journals. When those points are made known to the man in the street, he may be disposed to adopt a broader view of things and to realise that he has been misled. All the newspapers engaged in criticising the Government are not controlled by Lord Northcliffe; in other times they are his great opponents. But the subject is one that cannot be gone into here; most of the big dailies demand separate treatment, and, for that reason, I propose in subsequent issues to deal individually with the important organs of public opinion published in the Metropolis.

THE ARRECIFES CRIME

GAOL FOR ALLEGED MURDERERS.

The assassination of the well-known journalist, Sr. Santiago Perez, in Arrecifes some months ago, has been again brought to mind by the making public of the accusation filed by the Public Prosecutor against the alleged murderer Sosa and the supposed instigators and accomplices Villagra, Romero and Rivero. Dr. Paulucci asks for a penalty of 25 years imprisonment for the criminal and 17 years for each of the accomplices.

THE WAR AND MUSIC

An Interesting Expert Opinion

ON WAR'S INFLUENCE ON ART

A year or two before the outbreak of the great war, a German professor of music, speaking possibly with a knowledge of what was coming, or yet again, possibly merely voicing the Prussian militarist view that war is a good thing, told an American journal that there would be no further great music until the world had another great war.

This professor argued, with some show of reason, that great wars stirred up great emotions, and that from great emotions the highest expression of the arts necessarily arose. He actually instanced the coincidence of great national upheavals with the production of the world's musical geniuses and their masterpieces.

The idea formed the subject of an interesting chat which a representative of "The Herald" had on Dec. 2 with Professor Alfred Mistowski, Examiner for Trinity College, London, who is now on his second visit to Argentina in connection with the local examinations of candidates for the certificates and diplomas issued by Trinity College.

"I am not prepared to endorse the Prussian view that war is good, or necessary," said the Professor. "If a terrible war does produce great art and fine music, then of course we accept that as one of its few virtues. It does not follow that we want it, however, at such a price. Nevertheless, there is reason in the argument. It is easy to trace and coincide the great periods of musical classics with great national crises. For instance, Beethoven represents the spirit of the French Revolution, and in Wagner we have the period of 1848, while Mozart represents the Whig period. Similarly we identify most of our national songs with stirring epochs in history. The reason is simply that the occasion produces a man, and the artist, be he musician or painter, is susceptible to his surroundings, and he echoes Society, and social conditions.

"I believe this war will vitally affect all art," continued Professor Mistowski. One result I anticipate is that it will put the cubists and futurists in their place, and generally it will revivify and impart a healthier tone to art. In recent times we have been passing through a transition stage, and fortunately evolving from the chaotic state into which all art appeared to have drifted. Composers have been seeking new regions in the domain of harmony, and while a great deal of their work is undoubtedly interesting, a good deal of it is still rather chaotic, not to say unhealthy, and no doubt the present upheaval will tend to a proper assessment of values in music."

Professor Mistowski was then asked for his views on the proposal made in England since the outbreak of the war to boycott German music. His reply was:

"While quite understanding the strong feeling against everything German, I feel that it is foolish to extend that feeling to the great classics. And after all, we are not waging war against the dead. In the domain of high art nationality ought not to enter into consideration. For my own part I hold Beethoven, Bach, Brahms, and the rest of the great galaxy of geniuses in just as great reverence to-day, despite my national feelings, as ever I did, and why should I not? It is quite a different thing with contemporary composers. One can quite understand a conductor refusing to perform a work of Richard Strauss, or any contemporary German, certainly when their music is identified with, or is representative of the spirit of Germany which we are fighting. Though even that, from an artistic point of view, is straining national feeling, or patriotism, it is, in view of the temper of the public, quite excusable. There is, of course, a certain personal element about it. Although I would be personally sorry to see Richard Strauss as an artist held in any less esteem than he has been held, I cannot blame those who feel that we should not cultivate contemporary German music, especially because there are other musicians to be cultivated, the Russian and the French, not to mention our younger school of British composers."

"So far as my own work is concerned," said the Professor in conclusion, "the war has had practically no inimical effect. I have just come from an extended examination tour of India, Ceylon, Burmah, Australia, and New Zealand, and I am only a week ahead of my last year's itinerary. I found no appreciable diminution in the numbers presented for examination in the various centres, but saw a consistent improvement in the music of the candidates."

THE THIEVING COLLECTOR

STEALING SOUTH AMERICA'S ANCIENT RELICS.

Among those who will steal (from the highest motives), collectors are facile princeps. A Bible, say, Coverdale's, or a Breeches Bible, they will appropriate sans cérémonie, and as to pictures—have we not recently the case of La Gioconda?

All over the earth these amiable monomaniacs and keen sleuth-hounds on curios (and cash) are questing. In distant Misiones, from the ancient church of San Ignacio some old pictures of more or less merit, painted during the period of Jesuit residence and long preserved there, have been stolen. Gradually all the relics and symbols of old South American culture are being carried away by greedy spoilers. A wealthy American has been carrying off metal work and silver vessels of the Incas wholesale from Peru. These collectors being wealthy often pay high prices for relics which the custodians have no right to sell.

Similar robberies have been common in Europe. For example: A fine barrel helmet which formerly hung in Folkingham church, Norfolk, a very rare specimen of the time of Edward I., has long been in the Earl of Londesborough's collection of armour. Marry how?—Purchase from the vicar, whose action in parting with it was that of a thief and an unfaithful shepherd. It is to be hoped, though with little chance of realisation, that the Misiones thieves will be caught, and that the systematic spoliation of the relics of Old Spanish America will be "caused to cease."

CONSCIENCE AND POCKET

GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL TO TOUCH BOTH.

In the United States there is a good deal of trouble and in Government circles indignation, against those citizens who at the outbreak of the war, finding themselves stranded in Europe without resources besought financial assistance from their Government, received it and now fail to refund.

A parallel number of cases exist in Argentina where it is stated that the National Contaduria has been unable by persuasion or any other means, to obtain repayment of the large sums spent upon repatriating Argentine citizens surprised in Europe by the war and by the interruption of Banking facilities placed in the position of being unable to return to the country or to meet their liabilities.

This conduct is causing the National Accountancy Department, to consider the advisability of taking severe measures, relatively that is, such as publishing in the Daily Press throughout the country, the names of those who have become so deficient in memory and so lamentably void of gratitude. Such a proceeding would undoubtedly cause some very red faces and a good deal of extreme discomfort among those concerned, who might not find immunity from payment cheap at such a price.

MOTHERHOOD WITHOUT FEAR

(By VANCE THOMPSON, in "The White Ribbon.")

The all-absorbing events of the last days of July, 1914, prevented the spread of the most joyful message ever sent from the scientist's laboratory to woman. It was that henceforth she will bear children not in pain and terror, but in gladness. Paris knew of it; the French Academy of Medicine had accepted it, but it got no further. Mr. Thompson was then in the city, and to him has fallen the wonderful opportunity of carrying the good news to the men and women of Britain. Here it is.

It was in Paris—ten days before the wild and unexpected war broke over Europe—this article was written; and at the time there seemed to be no subject in all the world of wider and deeper significance. It touched the very sources of life. It brought to the women of the world the wonder of a new certainty—that no longer need love be ransomed with pain and terror. And this is what women talked of. They talked of the wonder of painless birth-giving—that their children should be born into a world where there was neither pain nor screaming horror. And men talked of it. They talked of the new generation—born without pain into a humanity which should be better and gentler—redeemed from the ancient law of suffering. The birth-curse was broken. And I left Paris, and went to the sad hills of Alsace.

Then a week, ten days—

And what I saw was the foul pageant and festival of pain. Painless child-birth? In the ashes of villages, in the burning dust, children were born and died; and the mothers died. Painless birth? Oh, the ancient curse fell heavy and black on the women of France; and in agony and horror, in blood and a smother of unclean flies, they brought their children to sudden life and more sudden death. Civilisation was blotted out; humanity was sister to the dog.

What war cannot destroy is the mighty discovery whereof I have written here. And the glory of generals will pale in the splendour of this conquest of patient scientists.

THE GREAT DISCOVERY.

It was Georges Pauin, the distinguished French chemist, who found—after years of research—the miraculous drug which has saved woman-kind from the ancient curse. There is nothing new in the use of anodynes in childbirth; but heretofore the use of morphine and kindred drugs has been dangerous, and often served to prolong it. What Monsieur Paulin set out to find was an anodyne which should be harmless, and which should do away with all pain without interfering with the orderly and rhythmic process of birth. Professor Charles Richet and other scientists have long been studying the action of living ferments. It was along this line that Monsieur Paulin worked. He took a solution of chlorhydrate of morphine, and treated it with a living ferment. The morphine, thus treated, was transformed into a regularly crystallised substance. Officially it is known as morphine desintoxique—that is, the toxic qualities are removed—and is distinguished chiefly by its solubility.

It is over two years ago that this medicament was discovered. There followed a long series of experiments on animals, carried on by Monsieur Paulin and his collaborator, Dr. Pierre Laurent.

These two names should be written in every woman's heart—names of a dusty chemist and inconspicuous young physician.

Rabbit and cat, and hound, the grosser mammals of the farmyard—those experiments lasted a year. The two dusty scientists did no go, as usually the man of the laboratory goes, into the animal world—seeking for truth in fragments of skin and strips of quivering flesh, while round him everything wails and moans. What Monsieur Paulin took there was respite from pain. I should like to have word and speech with that first rabbit—bred for torture in a laboratory—who knew the amazement of painless rabbit-birth. Her story should go down the age.

Here was a medicine that did no harm, that did not check or hinder nature's way—that did, indeed, leave nature freer than it had otherwise been—and that did banish and abolish the hideous pain that clutched and tortured every female thing.

When the dusty men of the laboratory had tried their new medicine upon the animal world, they took it confidently to the greatest gynecologist in Europe, Dr. Ribemont-Dessaigne, accoucher of the Beaujon Hospital and of many others in Paris.

There have been so many attempts to use pain-deadeners in child-birth. Morphine, chloral, chloroform and the like will still the pains of child-birth, but they have the effect of checking the muscular contractions—or at least of diminishing them. It is only in exceptional cases that the sound practitioner resorts to these dangerous pain-deadening methods. Better the pangs, he will tell you, and a safe birth.

Without enthusiasm, without much confidence, Professor Ribemont-Dessaigne made his first experiment. I wish I could tell you the name of that brave woman who consented to the first trial, for she did consent.

The new drug was almost, but not absolutely, poisonless. It killed the pain—or made it merely a tolerable and curious sensation of discomfort. It did not delay or prolong the birth-process. And it laid no risk upon the child.

With clear eyes the woman looked at her attendants. She was not unconscious. Now and then she drifted away into a pleasant dream and smiled as though she were listening to a little voice very far off. Even at such times a word, a question would recall her. She would open her eyes—wide, astonished, happy eyes, with the mother-love in them.

And Professor Ribemont-Dessaigne discovered this: The drug does not act locally, as its inventors fancied from their experimentation that it did; it acts upon the nervous centres and upon the sympathetic nerve. And, above all, he ascertained that it did not in any way modify the rhythmic contractions by which nature sends into the world the little child.

That was one case; it was the first case; and then Professor Ribemont-Dessaigne went down into the hospitals in Paris.

Every bed was filled in the great hall of the Beaujon Hospital. And Professor Ribemont-Dessaigne walked there. With him went amazement. For in the great hall, where life battled that it might live there was silence. Not an outcry, not a wail.

And he will tell you that what impressed itself upon him most was the strange silence—and the smiling faces of women. He had touched the edge of a miracle.

One hundred and twelve experiments Professor Ribemont-Dessaigne made (with the aid of his colleague, Dr. Le Lovier), and every case was successful. Indeed, there was a sort of reiteration of success, for, though there were but one hundred and twelve mothers, there were one hundred and fifteen children—three happy, unterrified, unpaired mothers bearing twins. And these were chosen cases. They were chosen because they were difficult. All successful. In the long, beneficent history of medicine.

I do not see what discovery can rank with this one, which has given woman kind joy for sorrow, and laughter in place of bitter cries. I do not write of this discovery as being in an experimental stage. It has been accepted by the French Academy of Medicine—the date was the third week in July. Surgeons, gynecologists, chemists, doctors of all degrees, have examined, tested, approved. For once, scientific men have been unanimous.

Will you go back for a moment to that strangely silent room in the hospital?

You remember that over it brooded a great silence. No woman shrieked in agony. One and all, the women lay quiet, with drowsy, happy faces. To each the drug had been administered—an injection of a cubic centimetre and a half of the liquid miracle. It acted directly upon the nervous centres; for a minute or two the nerves would jump, and at last settle back into quiet. Then some of the women dozed lightly. Not all of them. Others of them were filled with a kind of ecstatic gaiety. In eighty-four out of the hundred and twelve cases studied by Dr. Ribemont-Dessaigne in the hospitals of Paris, the analgesia was complete; in twenty-four it was incomplete, but in these latter cases the birth pains were so slight that the women refused an additional injection, stating it was not worth while. A little pain they did feel, but it was so tolerable they did not wish it away. Thus, the drug does not act in exactly the same way upon each woman. In one case the normal dose produced an analgesia which lasted only for thirty minutes; other injections had to be given. But it was found that, on the average, the effect of one normal injection lasted for ten or twelve hours, which sufficed.

And what of the child?

How came he forth into that silent world?

No shrill cries welcomed him; but he lifted up his voice and announced his presence—howling. What he said was: "Hail, O silent, smiling woman! There's a new man in the world!" And cried a greeting to her—and to life. Not all of them.

In certain cases there is an effect upon the child. In certain cases he comes sleepily into the world. It does not occur in the majority of cases, and the somnolence lasts only a little while. A breath or two can blow it away. Parents, alarmed by the absence of respiration and of immediate cries, need have no real fear. The condition of quiet will not last long in their happy home.

A young mother with whom I had word had thought of something which had not occurred to me or to the men of science, it may be. She was looking at her new-born man with approbation.

"He did not suffer at all," she said, confidently and gladly.

It seemed a queer thing to say—only a mother would have thought of it—that she herself had not suffered seemed a negligible thing compared to the enormous fact that her man-child had been born without pain.

He was a rare historic man—one of the few men who have come painlessly into life. The next generation (it is curious to think of) will be men born (without suffering) of mothers who lay smiling in their narrow, white beds. Will it be a better world? Perhaps it will be a better world.

As succinctly as possible I shall state the case for the new medication as it was presented by Dr. Albin Ribemont-Dessaigne and accepted by the French Academy of Medicine. The words are weighed and measured with scrupulous exactitude. They represent precisely the opinion of official French science.

1. It is possible to-day, without causing the slightest danger to the mother, to produce an analgesia sufficient to ensure an entirely painless childbirth.

2. This treatment causes neither check nor delay; indeed, it seems rather, in the great number of cases, to accelerate the process of childbirth.

3. The infants born are, in the pro-

THE SUMMER SEASON

ITS PROSPECTS AND ATTRACTIONS.

Buenos Aires Society, both English and American, can scarcely be said to have been asleep and yet that it is waking up is certainly most evident.

Although there are many people who consider it highly unfashionable to spend one's time in town during the months when the sun is hottest, yet at this very season when one almost melts away, many society folk may be encountered within the city limits.

To be sure they wear the same apologetic air at being here, which is always to be noted at those times when society is booked to be elsewhere.

But the apologetic air this year is not nearly so fixed and severe as of former times, and is commingled with an air of amusement, as though the variety of interests that are to be found within a great city is sufficient apology for being still in town.

The time when the summer plans must be settled has arrived, and the question of whether it shall be a cottage with a lawn in the front or accepting the proffered visit to a near friend who has an estancia in Saladillo or Talpaqué or some other neighbourhood possessed of a fancy name, offers food for plenty discussion.

Of course, boarded up cottages are growing more in evidence, each day, and it may be noted that a good number of green shades are pulled down in the city producing the unmistakable sign of families intending to be "outing" soon, and the time is approaching, when spending a night in one's town house would be courting reproaches from all directions.

"Week-ending" is the fashionable life of the moment, and the man or woman who has not week-ends booked far in advance is distinctly unpopular. The week-end country party is a well established institution in this country, especially among the English speaking community and there are few exceptions to the rule that is more popular than the country party where guests are invited to spend from a week to a couple of months, (the latter very often to the secret displeasure of the hostess).

In the middle of the summer it is not extraordinary to see people making week-end outings from Buenos Aires, necessitating at times almost a day's journey.

The question of the hour is what will the summer bring forth in the way of amusement? This is an all absorbing thought for those who are to take a prominent part in social life.

Already there is some clashing of dates for various entertainments out of the city, and those individuals to whom is entrusted the sacred privilege of sending out invitations are going to be kept pretty busy.

And the social mentors are even harder at work trying to solve the puzzling question of what desirables or undesirables are to be placed on the list of those who will receive invitations.

Taken all in all, the summer season is to be one of interest; and although there will be the usual heart burnings, there will nevertheless be much entertainment for the fortunate few.

portion of one in three, voiceless—a condition which it is perfectly easy to put an end to, and which is, in fact, often advantageous.

4. It is a scientific certitude that hereafter women may bear children without pain.

So far science, speaking with the cold decisiveness of carefully acquired knowledge; and I have tried to look at the subject as the scientist would like to have one look at it. But whether I will or no, my thought goes toward the women who are sleeping to-night in the homes of the world. Their sleep must be soft and deep. For the fear is gone—that awful fear of the new life, which was also the fear of death.

Land of Lilliput.

Conducted by Egeria

My dear Lilliputians,

You must forgive me this week for not writing your usual letter; but I am sure you will all do so when I tell you that my Lilliputian is very ill, and I cannot spare one minute for any other Lilliputian.

But here is your usual story.

GEOFF'S LUCKY SHOT

THE TREASURE THE LEOPARD STOLE.

Geoff poked his head out from under the blanket and listened hard. Surely he heard the goats stirring as if something had frightened them!

The moon was up, he could see everything in the hut quite plainly, and, as he had lain down in his clothes, it was not more than about half a minute before he was out of the hut and running along past the mealie patch to the goat kraal out at the back of the village.

By rights he should have been on the watch with his rifle to-night, for a leopard had been working havoc among Oom Jartje's goats; but Major Simpson, who had just come to the station from German West Africa, had laid it down as law that no boy under fourteen was to carry firearms at Langton's Spruit, and Geoff had only just turned thirteen. But he was a dead shot, and had won the silver button at the last shooting match at Keepfontein.

He had his father's revolver, an ancient affair. Oom Jartje had taken his rifle away since the issuing of the order, for the old Boer had a whole some dread of getting into trouble. He would have taken the revolver also, only he did not happen to know anything about it.

When Geoff reached the goat kraal he found that the goats had only been settling some difference of opinion among themselves, and indeed they were still at it, nuzzling and butting vigorously; but that was all, and the night was quiet as if there were no such things as night-marauding leopards.

He was very tired, and not best pleased at having been roused from his slumber in such a fashion; but, seeing he was there, he decided that he might as well stay for a little while on the off-chance of getting a shot. He climbed into the fork of the old thorn tree, and spread himself along one branch, just as he had done for the last three nights, waiting for the wily thief which had not appeared.

It was rather dark down there under the thorn trees, but out beyond the kraal the land lay bathed in the silvery radiance of the moon. By craning his head, Geoff could see the tin roof of the major's hunkalow gleaming among the trees. Away on the other side of him showed the round top of an empty Kaffir house, and beyond that the veldt stretched to the edge of the horizon, and as far beyond it as the imagination would serve, for Langton's Spruit stood on the edge of the wilderness, and that was why they were so bothered with leopards and other nuisances of a like kind.

Ah! Geoff gave a startled plunge, and then clutched wildly at the branch to keep himself from falling, as a shriek of pure terror cut sharply through the dark. He had been so nearly asleep, that just at the first he was inclined to think that he had been dreaming.

Then he grabbed the revolver from his pocket and leaned forward, hanging from the branch at an almost impossible angle, for his sharp ears had caught the sound of swift feet bounding towards him. Soft padding feet they were, and he was frankly puzzled. What manner of animal was it that was bounding through the tangled grasses? It was coming straight towards him too, and if it held on its present track it should pass directly under the branch along which he was stretched.

There was a patch of bright moonlight just beyond the thorn tree, and Geoff was watching that with his nerves tensely strung. If the creature that was coming towards him was a leopard, the time to shoot would be when it bounded into the patch of moonlight.

Stiff and motionless as the branch on which he lay was Geoff; the beast must get no idea of his presence in the thorn tree, or even now it might swerve and be off through the tall grass, and his chance of a shot would be gone for that night.

Something hurried itself out into the moonlight, passing so close under Geoff that it seemed to him he could almost have leaned down and grabbed it. But he had not shot—there was a white bundle clutched in the mouth of the beast, and because he did not know what it was, he dared not fire.

Down from the tree he tumbled, coming to the ground all of a heap, yet, marvellous to relate, contriving to keep the revolver from going off. He was scrambling to his feet again almost as soon as he touched the ground; then he set off in pursuit, racing along as hard as he could pelt, yet not seeming to gain on the animal in the slightest. Indeed, it would have been out of sight long since but for the load it carried, that mysterious huddle of white, the sight of which had kept Geoff from shooting when the beast passed under the thorn tree.

How he ran! There was not an unnecessary ounce of flesh on his bones, he was as fit as a fiddle and not encumbered by his clothes, for he had very little on. Down into the hollow he ran, past the Hottentots' mealie patch, across the wide track that called itself the waggon road to Keepfontein, and then swerving sharply to the left out on to the open veldt.

Geoff was by this time pretty well winded, for the pace had been terrific. He had stumbled once, and had almost fallen with the revolver in his hand. If only he could get a chance to shoot! It would have to be now or never, he knew very well, for the veldt, stretching away to the horizon, held plenty of chances for the racing leopard, but few enough for Geoff, who might put his foot in a hole at any minute, or come a cropper over some of the big rocks and sandstone boulders sticking up here and there.

Ah! The racing animal suddenly plunged just as if he had caught its foot in something, recovered, blundered on a few steps, plunged again, and then turned sideways on to Geoff.

It was a desperate chance, but by this time Geoff was getting desperate, and, throwing up his arm, he fired, aiming as best he could at the creature's head, and dumbly praying that he might not hit that mysterious white bundle carried by the leopard.

What was that? An inarticulate cry broke from Geoff, as the sharp wail of an infant cut through the silence of the open veldt, that silence which had held no sound save his own throbbing breath. Then he had been right in his fears, and it was really a living child which formed the burden of the leopard! He sprang forward to shoot again. He was nearly done—there was a sharp pain in his side, his breath was coming in short gasps, and spots of flame were dancing before his eyes. But he must save the child, he must! It was bad enough when the leopard had raided the goat kraal, but to steal a living child was an unthinkable horror!

"Got him!" Geoff had fired again, daring greatly this time, for the animal had not turned, but only stumbled. It had apparently trodden on a hit of the infant's clothes which impeded its progress, and had given Geoff his chance of over-hauling the creature.

The leopard half stopped, staggered, and then lurched forward and lay still. The white burden dropped from its mouth, and the infant broke into frightened wailing again.

Geoff hurried up, his revolver held at an angle of extreme caution, for leopards are the most treacherous of beasts, and he was not taking any risks.

But the leopard was dead, as dead as a door nail. The infant had been thrown over the creature's head in its last staggering fall, and it now lay with its head pillowed against the leopard's back, yelling lustily.

"Poor little kid!" murmured Geoff compassionately, and although he was more afraid of babies than of wild animals, just because he was so unused to them, he stooped and lifted the child, chirping and whistling to it in the same fashion as that in which he beguiled Oom Jartje's colts.

He was wondering mightily all the time to whom the infant belonged. It was not a Dutch baby, he was sure of that, for its clothes were so white, so soft, and so fine. There was no English babies that he knew of at Langton's Spruit, but that he was away all day on the veldt, and a dozen babies might have been brought to the village and he be none the wiser.

It puzzled him not a little that a baby should have been left where it was possible for a leopard to steal it, and his lip curled scornfully as he thought of the carelessness of the child's mother. He would have to take the child to the house of the magistrate straight away, and while he was gone the jackals would swoop down on the carcass of the leopard and tear the skin so that it would not be worth selling. Oh, it was maddening!—for he wanted money so badly to buy himself a new suit of clothes. If only he had decent clothes he could get away from Langton's Spruit and the old Dutch farmer, Oom Jartje, who was such a hard taskmaster, and he would be able perhaps to get work with English people.

The baby had stopped yelling when Geoff picked it up, and after a few sleepy whimpers it had dropped asleep again, with its head on his shoulder.

He could skin the leopard in a quarter of an hour, he was sure of it; and if the baby was asleep it would not hurt to delay so long. Of course there might be trouble if the infant's friends missed it; but then, he told himself, they deserved to suffer a little for not having taken more care of the poor mite.

He laid the babe carefully on a lump of dried grass, and stripping off his ragged jacket, he laid it over the infant to keep off a chill. The jacket was very dirty, and the babe was so very clean that he felt rather bad; but it could not be helped, and with a shrug of his naked shoulders he whipped out a knife and fell upon the leopard. His last shirt had given out only the previous day, when a playful colt had fairly torn it from his back; but at that time of the year a shirt was not an actual necessity at Langton's Spruit, and Geoff would not have minded much if he had not been so proud. He was English born, and well born, and he hated to be down on the level of the natives.

The skin was off. He rolled it into a bundle and tucking it under one arm and the baby under the other, he was setting off to the village, when he heard the sound of many voices, and caught the flickering light of torches going along the track at a little distance.

"They are out to find the baby!" he said to himself, then shouted to attract their attention. He was a bit dismayed to be answered by Major Simpson himself, and a minute later the soldier had come striding up, and poor Geoff was caught as it were red-handed, the revolver sticking in his belt and the skin of the freshly killed leopard under his arm. He burst into a hurried and very incoherent explanation of the leopard carrying off the infant, when to his amazement the

It has been said that a person who takes a child at seven years of age can shape his point of view for the rest of his life. Ardent suffragists are beginning earlier than seven and are repeating Mother Goose rhymes with suffrage morals to their children. Some of the rhymes are as follows:—

Jack and Jill

Have equal will

And equal strength and mind.

But when it comes to equal rights

Poor Jill trails far behind.

Little Miss Horner

Stood in a corner

Making a suffrage speech.

"Her logic and brain,"

Said the women, "are plain."

But the men said, "Ain't she a peach!"

Ding, dong, bell, the woman's in the well.

Who put her there? Ignorance, I swear.

Who'll pull her out? The vote, without a doubt.

It was a naughty world, I know,

To try to hurt the lady so,

Who never did it any harm,

And only added to its charm.

Humpty Deputy sits on a wall.

Humpty Deputy's doomed to a fall.

For suffragist logic and women's intrusion

Are demolishing much of his former seclusion.

Miss Duncan, a native of Adelaide, but trained to public work in England, was the first lady inspector of factories appointed in New South Wales. She is also President of the Professional Women's Association, which brings all such workers together in the interests of women and children. It was started in 1912 by Dr. Grace Boelke and Mrs. Cooper Day.

A peasant woman called Jalina made it a practice to supply the fighting troops, both Russian and Austrian, with drinking water. At noon each day would appear her old decrepit horse, dragging a water cart with a Red Cross flag fastened to it. On its appearance each side stopped firing. Jalina mounted her cart and moved to both Russians and Austrians, who sent one soldier each at a time with a bucket. When the water cart was empty, Jalina bowed to both sides and drove away.

Some of the worst sufferers by the war have been the religious orders of Belgium, namely, the twenty establishments of holy women named the Beguinages distributed throughout Belgium, at Louvain, Liege, Antwerp, etc. In Bruges and Grènt, the Beguinages, or Houses of St. Begga, had existed since the middle of the thirteenth century, when a number of ladies whose husbands were at the wars assembled there for protection and to go on with good works. There is no vow of perpetual celibacy taken in these houses.

major grabbed the baby out of his arms, crying out:

"Is it hurt? Is it hurt?"

"Why, no; I don't believe it has a scratch," answered Geoff, and was just going on to say how the leopard must have taken the child by its clothes, when the major exclaimed:

"Thang God for such deliverance!"

Then he told Geoff that it was his daughter's baby, and it had been left by its English nurse asleep in its cot on the back verandah, whence the leopard carried it off, and it was the shriek of the nurse which Geoff must have heard.

So grateful was the major for Geoff's rescue of his grandchild that he took back the order about firearms, and gave him the very best rifle that could be bought. He also purchased the leopard's skin, but it was the infant's grateful mother who gave Geoff a new suit of clothes, and then paid for him to be article to an ostrich farmer on the high veldt where he would have a chance of doing well for himself.—Little Folks.

SALE OF WORK AT LOMAS

IN AID OF TEMPERLEY SCOTCH CHURCH

Dec. 3 saw the opening of the bazaar and sale of work at the Barker Institute, Lomas, which has been arranged and organised for the benefit of the Scotch Church at Talleres. The bazaar will continue throughout to-day.

The Hall was prettily decorated and the daintily draped and arranged stalls were most attractive. A glance round at the many nice things for sale struck one with wonder at the modest prices asked. With so many pretty things—things that in the city one could not obtain at the price—there should be little or nothing left when the close of the bazaar takes place.

It was owing to Mr. Harry, to whom thanks are due that the lighting was so excellent, even in the shooting gallery.

Mr. Begg, introduced by Mr. McCluskie opened the proceedings and pointed out that the members of the Scotch Church in Temperley had a number of good things; a good piece of land, a beautiful church, and a good committee represented by Mr. McCluskie as Chairman, Mr. Walker as Secretary and Mr. Leslie as Treasurer. The Church also had a bad thing, a debt.

The objects of the Bazaar were to lighten this debt and to provide two very necessary things a piano and a harmonium. Mr. Begg explained why there was this special appeal at such a time.

Some one had promised to contribute towards the reduction of the debt if something more were contributed for the same purpose before the end of the year, hence a sale of work during hot December.

Mr. Begg continued by a strong appeal for help and referred to the war and its cruelty and how necessary it was to develop the "higher life."

He concluded with the words "When ladies set out to do a thing they always accomplish it." The Bazaar was then declared open.

These few words were greeted with applause and the serious part of the evening commenced. Everything was brisk and well arranged and many a hard headed business man succumbed before the tender entreaties of lovely women to buy—buy—buy. Outside in the grounds was a rattle of musketry, nearly as brisk as a Gatling gun. The success of the undertaking is assured. Some kind friend came forward and promised a donation of $2 for every one dollar the bazaar made, up to $1000 and before a brief hour had flown the $1000 was realised and incidentally a cheque for another $2000 given as promised. Much was due to the ladies at the stalls, and to Mrs. McCluskie that the opening hours were so successful. The stall-holders were:—

JAMES BOYLE MACKINLAY.

The late James B. Mackinlay was buried at the British Cemetery at Chacarita yesterday afternoon. The deceased, an old resident of the River Plate, leaves a widow, two daughters and a son. Those who knew the deceased could never speak too highly of his sterling qualities.

A long and painful illness ended on the morning of the 6th. Beautiful floral tributes were sent by his wife, Eva, and by the officers and staff of the British Bank of South America.

An impressive service, was held at the house by the Rev. Dr. Fleming, and the Rev. W. M. Laing officiated at the graveside.

The deceased gentleman died at the age of 69 years.

Amongst the wreaths sent were those from: Isabel and Sydney, his grandchild Benitez, Ethel M. Francis, the grand children, Christina, Amelia Isobel and Willie, Doll and Juana, Mrs. Ford, Christine, Muriel and Greg.

Telegrams from Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Gibbings, and from Miss Errecalde were also received.

Amongst those present at the graveside, or who sent cards were:

Mr. and Mrs. Alex Ross, Mr. and Mrs. John Bellamy, Norman Leslie, Alfred Antoney, Vice-Admiral J. P. Saenz Valiente, John W. Breckon, John Y. Caldwell, A. B. Ferguson, Mr. and Mrs. J. OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

By the courtesy of the "Sphere" we are enabled this week to give two pictures from a highly interesting photographic representation of the various stages through which a wounded soldier passes, from the moment he is struck down, to his arrival in the permanent hospitals. The series in the "Sphere" is entitled "From Krithia to Cairo." Our pictures show the wounded man receiving field surgical treatment in a hospital tent, fitted up as an operating theatre, just under the cliffs of the Gallipoli shore, exposed to shell fire. The removal of the wounded from the shore in barges or lighters is also a dangerous operation, but once aboard the hospital ships, or in this instance, a battleship, they are out of danger from the enemy, and can be leisurely conveyed to hospital. Little has been heard of the work of the Australian artillery in the Dardanelles fighting, but it has done brilliant service, and as the next picture shows, the gunners are eager for the fray, and strip to the waist as in the good old days of hot naval fighting. In the next picture King George is shown greeting Marshal Joffre. By the side of the King is the Prince of Wales. While it is known that in Poland, as in other parts of Europe, the women do heavy labouring work, the picture showing Polish peasant women working at railway construction under German guards, strikes a harsh note. The last two pictures of this week's series deal with the Balkans campaign, and show the busy scene at Salonika when the British forces were landed, as well as the aspect of the camp which was pitched outside the town.

ENTERTAINMENT AT AMERICAN CHURCH

COLLECTION FOR CAVELL FUND AND XMAS.

A crowded Hall of the American Church on film nights is rather the rule than the exception but last night was a special occasion. In addition to the exhibition of a very special Gaumont film, full of dramatic surprises, there was to be a collection on behalf of the British Hospital Cavell Memorial Fund and also for the Christmas Tree and treat to 2000 poor Argentine children connected with the Sunday Schools. Mr. John Zimmerman took the chair and, in a short introductory address spoke very strongly although quietly, on the tragedy of Nurse Cavell and the nobility of the martyr.

Mrs. Evans, Matron of the British Hospital and several nurses in uniform were present. In addition to the film there were one or two musical interludes, Mrs. Evans singing a naval song to admiration and being encored to the echo. Mr. Lynn Hazelton also, who goes home shortly to volunteer sang very acceptably. The film itself was as good as its reputation which is saying much and in an interval the collection was taken by the nurses very appropriately. The total realised reached $100, a gratifying amount and the whole affair was thus successful from a financial as well as an entertainment point of view.

AGED AND INFIRM FUND

MONTHLY COMMITTEE MEETING.

The customary monthly meeting of the British and American Aged and Infirm Fund Committee was held yesterday afternoon at 5 at 750 Moreno, the offices of Messrs. Moore and Tudor.

There were present Mr. James Begg in the chair, Mr. Bramwell, the Rev. Dr. W. P. McLaughlin, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert Grant, and Mr. Tribe. Apologies for unavoidable absence were received from Sir Reginald Tower, H. B.M. Minister, the Rev. Dr. J. W. Fleming, Mr. W. H. Logan, and Mr. Hope Gibson.

After the customary routine business, several cases were looked into and pensions granted where advisable.

NEW PORT WORKS

A Wise Arrangement

TERMS OF THE SETTLEMENT

BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND CONTRACTORS

THE HERALD is in a position to announce definitely the arrangement between the Government and the contractors in so far as the future of the New Port Works is concerned.

The continuation of the work is stopped, and until such time as financial conditions are favourable to that purpose, no further development will be undertaken, the contractors, Messrs. C. H. Walker, Ltd., being at liberty to retain the contract, without the obligation to continue operations.

Messrs. Walker Limited are, however, to maintain the works in their present state, and keep them in order, so that development work can be resumed at any time.

To do this the maintenance of a certain staff of supervisors and workmen is essential, and it is estimated that the cost will be something like $50,000 per month, which Messrs. Walker Limited have undertaken to provide.

The most cordial relations exist between the Government and the contractors, due to a perfect understanding on both sides of the difficulties encountered in these times of financial stress. The Government recognises the desire of the contractors to adhere faithfully to the spirit of the contract, and also admits the reasonableness of the request that a suspension of operations should be granted owing to the impossibility of converting the bonds, taken in payment, into cash. When financial conditions right themselves the Government will assist Messrs. Walker Limited as far as is reasonably possible, and the work will be proceeded with.

The news that such an arrangement has been entered into will be received with great satisfaction by all those who appreciate the work which Messrs. C. H. Walker Limited, have done in Argentina. It would have been intensely disappointing, not only to the contractors, but to all parties, had the work been summarily abandoned, and that portion which has been carried out at so much expense, allowed to drift into a state of disrepair and decay. The contractors are known to be keenly desirous of finishing the entire work of making the Port of Buenos Aires. They were the original contractors, and have carried out the whole of the construction, so far as it has progressed. To the British community it is a matter for national pride to be able to point to the magnificent works and say that they were constructed by British engineers, and by British enterprise. This pride would have been lessened, had the present contract been permitted to lapse, and the work completed, possibly by other than British contractors.

In this latter connection it is rumoured that several bids have already been made to the Government by contractors—German firms among them—to complete the work. It is also stated that an offer was made by a financial house to relieve Messrs. Walker of the serious problem of finance, but that the offer was waived aside, for one reason, among others, that the rate of interest proposed was unreasonable.

NEW PORT WORKS

Visited by Engineers' Society

WONDERS OF CONSTRUCTION

Owing to bad weather, the opportunity of inspecting the New Port Works kindly arranged by Messrs. C. H. Walker and Co. for the Society of Engineers of the River Plate was postponed on Saturday week. Yesterday, however the weather was not wet. A fierce sky burned in a cloudless sky scorching the backs of the visitants and making one's brains bubble like pitch in the caulking of a deck.

At 2 p.m. about 20 gentlemen, engineers or friends interested, had assembled and were led to the offices of Messrs. Livesey Son and Henderson, where Mr. Berry, of Walker and Co. greeted the party, told them off in file and led the way to the Presidential train, consisting of a 3 coupled engine (No. 1850), and an open carriage with canvas covered rail, and fore and aft wooden seat. The party of 23 having accommodated themselves, the gangway was pulled in, tied up behind, and 1850 started in the direction of Uruguay and Brazil. Previously however the dynamos made by the General Electric Company of Witton, Birmingham, were inspected, and the Stores. To the lay eye dynamos are all much alike, varying in size. These are no doubt "top hole," but the Stores were impressive. By the tenpenny nail of Jael, there were every blessed, and unblest thing, which the mind could conceive as being remotely necessary. Wheels, braces, bits, tacks, nails of all dimensions, screws, nuts, iron bars, steel wire, copper articles to make a German green with verdigris—and envy; saw blades and handles; shovels, picks, hammers, gimlets, vices, jacks, wheels, rods, pumps, bores, tubes, and all assorted as to sizes and discoverable at once. Glutted with the sight of these treasures the party in "the train" proceeded.

They went past stacks of wood big enough to build villages; amid lines of corrugated iron huts that would comfortably house half a division; out on the sun baked, wind-swept embankments and gantreys. First a halt was made to observe a huge and hideous monster which scoops mud and sand by the few tons at a time, from the river bed; then another which whines and complains as it grabs a truck full of stones at a time; it deals with 350 tons in 9 hours. Then along the lofty concrete and stone edges of the Docks. On entering from the Rio de la Plata, ships for the New Docks—will instead of entering the North Basin turn to the right and go into the Ante Port, a long and wide stretch of water protected by a long breakwater from the river. On the left of this again are the entrances of the Docks No. 1A, No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3, sloping obliquely towards Palermo.

It is melancholy to contrast the quiet reigning on these enormous works with the busy life that must have been visible only a few weeks ago when over 3000 men were constantly employed; now there are only 250, but this is no place to refer to the causes.

The dock walls when completed, as they nearly are on No. 1, are of prodigious height, and yet are deceptive, being higher than they really look. The depth without the stone coping is over 10 metres, or at least 33 feet. In every direction heaps of dunnage are to be seen, the track of old rail beds, pumps and the tokens of a mighty enterprise suddenly paralysed. Weed grows luxuriantly along the embankment, and will soon trespass on the ways as well. At the bottom of the dock, a great pump is at work, but one 12 in. pump is as a rule enough, except when there is heavy rain.

Facts are about as difficult to disentangle on such an occasion as at a professional meeting of medical men. The Engineer is generally a silent person, but on an inspection, his eyes are on swivels, and he revels and wallows in statistics, formulae, and beastly Algebraic, and Mathematical expressions, "such as no Christian man can abide to hear." Tosca and rubble; armoured cement, the make of that cement; how many feet down for the piles? He is like Behe-moth for statistics "He drinketh up the River and hasteth not," and—a Cicerone like Mr. Berry, full of zeal and courtesy to brethren of the Craft, answers him voluminously and cataractically. As for the Layman, he will, if wise, merely say that "they know all about it." After crawling along the bottoms of the dock among primeval tosca and modern slime; No. 1850 ran gaily up to the level again and stopped again outside the half finished shedding of No. 3 Dock. All descended the accommodation ladder and after running across planks over yawning abysses, went through the interior of the shed, on the roof of which, a recent portion of the B. A. HERALD was stuck in an Excelsior manner. There was enough broken wood to keep Buenos Aires in fire lights for 12 months, but it behaved to go warily for here lurked the unsuspected rusty nail and the felonious spike, fatal to boots and to trouser legs. From the roof of the shed a splendid view was obtainable of the Port and the Works. Much work was going on there directed by an engineer in whites and a solar topi. Everywhere armoured cement, bunches of steel wire and clusters of steel rods, strengthened the solid walls and massive roofing. The general impression of these galpones is that they appear loftier in pitch and lighter than the deposits at Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 Docks of the Port. Such an improvement is naturally to be looked for. Subsequently the mighty "steam devils" by Ruston and Co. of Lincoln, which shovel 1400 cubic metres of earth a day, were inspected, after which a general run round the perimeter of the Works and a flying burst of speed home (eight miles an hour or nothing) concluded a very pleasant and most interesting inspection. At the offices there was tea and for those who wanted it "tay wi' a shlick in it," (in bottles, non refillable), also cake, marmalade, beer and cigarettes. It was in a halo of comfort and heat that the visitors departed, after thanking the Engineer in command for his courtesy, and an agreeable and instructive two hours tour. The Port Works are "well and truly laid," and if they are not finished in the same manner it will not be the fault of the constructors.

Among the visitors present were: Messrs. S. Williams, G. H. Cooke, C. Dawney, A. J. Pringles, C. T. Cornish, T. Fraser, B. Walker, J. Sinclair, T. Neilson, G. B. Harrison, R. E. Kimberley, W. L. Holt, G. O'Sullivan and W. A. Sturgeon.

RAT-KILLING

A TERRIER'S RECORD

Mr. T. W. Burgin, the well-known poultry expert, has just returned from Montevideo, where he officiated as judge in the poultry and dog classes. The show was a great success in numbers and quality of the exhibits, considering that this is only the second exhibition held under the auspices of the Association "Centro Avicultores de Montevideo." An innovation at this show was a rat pit, formed of a cage four metres by four metres, with a wired top, to test the abilities of terriers in killing vermin. The winner was the property of Sr. Alejandro Zorrilla de San Martin, which succeeded in killing five rats in the space of 19 seconds, the second dog requiring 26 seconds for a similar number of rats, and the third winner 30 seconds. This new side-show is supposed to foment the breeding of a suitable class of dogs for the extermination of vermin.

NATIONAL VIGILANCE

Work in Buenos Aires

INTERVIEW WITH MRS. LIGHTON ROBINSON

Although Mrs. F. Lighton Robinson, originally came to Buenos Aires for one year only, to organise the work of the local committee of the National Vigilance Association, she has been here over two years—two years devoted to unceasing, self-sacrificing, and effective work on behalf of her sex. Now Mrs. Robinson is about to take a brief holiday, which is to be spent in a visit to London, there to report the result of her work to the headquarters of the organisation, and bring herself closely into touch with the development of the international movement for the suppression of the white slave traffic. She will leave Buenos Aires next week, and expects to be away about three months.

Asked by a HERALD reporter whether she felt satisfied with the work she and her committee had been able to accomplish during the past two years, Mrs. Robinson replied that she was sure good results have been obtained.

"It was two years ago last October," she added, "that I came here. There was already in existence a local committee, mainly comprising English gentlemen, and it was at their request, made to the headquarters in London, that I came out to organise the work. All expenses were guaranteed by these gentlemen for one year, and the fact that I have been able to carry on my work for another year, and am to return to continue it, indicates that the movement has been well supported. No one could doubt that there was urgent need for active work in Buenos Aires, and our last two reports have shown in what useful directions we have operated beneficially. Personally I believe I have made our organisation and its work well known to those who need our assistance, and there is not a single girl or woman who does not now know that she can come to us for advice and help."

"You may know," continued Mrs. Robinson, "that our work is vigilance, and to that extent preventive rather than curative. Our work comes under the general activity of the International Guild of Service for Women. While we have done all we can to suppress the traffic, and to take care of victims, our most effective work has been done in connection with immigration, and defeating the aims of the traffickers. Both with the Government and the police our relations are most cordial and helpful. The Government has given us facilities, such as the right to board ships on arrival, which they have never given to any other organisation, and we are deeply grateful for this valuable help. The police too, appreciate our work, and help us to the limit of their ability. The laws are good, and I am certain a vast improvement in conditions is distinctly traceable to the legislation framed by Dr. Palacios."

Does the evil exist to the same extent as it did, say two years ago? Mrs. Robinson was asked.

"I do not think so," she replied; "in fact I have already attributed to the good laws a substantial improvement in conditions, and naturally, of course, we believe we have been instrumental in abating it to some extent. The war, has seriously interfered with all the good international work that was going on, but as an offset we must admit that the war has also restricted the international traffic in white slaves to a large extent. Nevertheless there is the same necessity for vigilance as ever there was, and we want all the assistance and sympathy we can get in our mission."

Sports and Pastimes

THE TURF

PALERMO

One would be fully justified in a sub title to these notes such as "the very classic mile which fizzled out." That this race can lay claim to the title of classic is alright, but as a race, it was far from a classic event.

The programme promised a very interesting series of events, and the public gathered together in larger numbers than usual to witness, what they also must have considered something extra special. Alas for the general public. It was a poor, weak, close to the really big events of the year. From now onwards, there is not overmuch to attract. The 2-year olds commence to run in January, and until then racing will be found to be anything but really pleasurable and interesting.

As an example of what may be expected, Sunday was perhaps typical.

On two occasions this year we have felt the necessity of a complaint in reference to sending horses to the post in really important events in an unfit condition, to either do themselves justice and to fulfil—or even with a chance of attempting to fulfil—that which the public have a right to expect from them.

This was first noticeable in a minor degree in the Premio Rivadavia, was exceedingly apparent in the Premio Comparación, when Ocurrencia was run off her legs due to having been overrun, overworked, and pressed too hard. Horses, even the greatest wonders in the world, have a limit to their capacities, but it becomes a crying shame, when two such wonderful horses as Ocurrencia and Pan Pan have to become the victims of having to run, when in no fit condition, and with no other prospect in the race than that of breaking down.

Apart from the point of view of the horses and the just and proper care of them, it is wrong to send them to the post from the public's point of view.

There is, at Palermo, an official veterinary surgeon, whose services have been called in and whose judgment has been used, when it was considered necessary to withdraw a horse. Note Ermita, withdrawn when favourite on the betting board. Yet Ermita came out a day or so later and won easily. If so little was the matter with her, as the extraordinarily rapid recovery would indicate, and yet she was withdrawn, then why was not Pan Pan withdrawn on Sunday, and the "vet's." assistance asked. It was known he was ill.

Furthermore, to any sort of a judge of horses, it was palpable that Pan Pan was far from being the horse he was a few days ago. It was constantly and repeatedly remarked upon.

Let us close the incident, with one remark, and that of congratulations to Rivero in sparing a great horse and extending to it humane treatment. Pan Pan is the horse at Palermo, which probably holds more of the public's affection—this word is carefully chosen—than any other horse, and it is known he is no shirker, and even though a heavy public loss went with his failure on Sunday, the great majority of his backers forgave Rivero this in seeing his humane treatment.

The race was colourless, when Ocurrencia did not run, and when Pan Pan was seen to be more dead than alive.

Melik won the event from the gate to the post. Wotan and Lanatti, were after all, not such a poor combination, as Wotan came second, after showing a great turn of finishing speed, and an improvement out of all recognition. Evoe ran third, Mustafá fourth, Pan Pan, who was eased off a couple of distances from home fifth, and San Paulo (imagine it!!) last.

It may be added that Melik was the picture of health and never looked better.

We are informed that Pan Pan in an exercise gallop the other day, broke a small blood vessel. This is common enough in horses and when only a capillary vessel, has no dangers, but a rest is always necessary for complete recovery.

Uriburu failed in the first race, won by Chiribiribi, who was really the most likely winner, if Uriburu did not extend himself, which was the case. No blame attaches to Englander and his riding. It was the horse, whom we know as a "toe digger" and a mule. Tata Dios came second. Sincera failed after making the running, and considering the time 1.37 4/5, we are not surprised at this.

Mingo on Paloma had a very easy win over Camboata and Yerba Mota, in the second event with Iberia fourth. Yerba Mota did not behave well at the gate.

In the colts' race, Corchito beat Given Or in a most hollow fashion. We called the winner a "mystery horse" some 24 hours before the race, and remarked upon him. "Watch who rides, watch the betting and then"—The moment these two things were seen, Corchito to our minds, was a "snip." He paid $10.70, and we are not to be blamed if our advice went unheeded.

Pielago, who ran third, will win when a jockey rides him, and the class is not too hot. On Wednesday we will advise.

Some, if not considerable, surprise, was in store when Polavieja beat Estro in the fourth race. Half a neck is as good as a mile, but Estro was a shade unlucky to lose. Rivero hardly thought the winner so fast, and perhaps misjudged by a few yards the time when to make his effort. A little sooner and the trick was done. Estro had something left in him which is worth remembering.

We are not really surprised with the result of the second classic, won by Diamant from Floripar and Bombazo. We expected good races from the two, and somehow thought Bombazo at 60 kilos, had too much to do. Palanta however, did surprise by a poor exhibition. She is another that badly needs a holiday.

Considerable discontent was exhibited with the result of the Aguerrido—Retrechero dead heat in the seventh race. Most people thought the former a very easy winner, but on previous occasions Retrechero has surprised by his final position. His propensity to run so wide is most deceptive, when the finishing post is reached. Mingo tried to keep him "up" round the bend, and our belief is he lost more by doing so, than he would by allowing the horse to go its usual way. Anyway it came to the same thing at the finish, because Retrechero would not go until he got his own way. He then came like a flying machine. Solicitud and Debutante were clean out of the race.

The final race needs comment. Firstly, because an apprentice Barroso gained his first win, secondly because Redentor took extra weight, and this surely was sufficient proof he was not "wanted" and yet the public spent over 16,000 dollars on him. Again—we hardly think Mingo did his best, and that Velasquez ought to have been well beaten and yet again, and this last really puts the "tin hat" on to the race. Who has ever heard of a stable lad holding a horse's head at the starting gate?

To lead a horse down, well and good, but to hold a horse, with the gate down and things all ready, whew!! Whose joke is this? Surely Don Gabino was not party to it. However there we are, and this incident made the "jockey joke" more of a joke than ever.

Palermo can teach everyone a lot, a tremendous lot, but ye gods, Palermo itself has a lot to learn in sportsmanship.

LA PLATA

Racing at La Plata on Sunday provided poor sport, small fields, and was in general a weak meeting.

Its feature consisted in the chopping and changing of the weights, by putting 'prentice boys up, to such an extent that but few horses carried their proper weights. Cumbey took 'prentice allowance and won the first race in a field of four.

Spingardi beat Mate Amargo. Insolente, with a 'prentice, won the third race. In the fourth race, Irú imitated this. Then Piquet, through the 3 kilos, dead-heated with Pilleria. Fiereza ran a fine race and beat Fine Mouche and Marabu, who both claimed the 3 kilos.

Then came Pichuleta beating Carcano, both running with 'prentices in front of Herd and so on.

It was a poor day's sport with the following:

"EL GANADOR"

Fulfilling a long felt want, there appeared in Buenos Aires yesterday a new racing paper, or, more accurately speaking, a racing guide.

It is a handy and useful production called El Ganador, and consists of a neatly produced programme of the races at Palermo, a list of selections, and, the most important thing as far as race-goers are concerned, an indexed (by numbers) statement of performances of the horses' running during the month.

This publication has been long looked for by racing men, it is well provided with the details required, and makes its first appearance.

The price is 10 cents, and but one point needs criticism. It appears too good for 10 cents, and furnishes information worth a dollar. The accuracy of the first number is excellent.

This production, which will receive its meed of notice, is more than worth the money, and deserves support.

Comments on the game.

The game was a hard fought battle owing to the rivalry between the teams. Great credit is due to Lopez in tightening up in the pinches, and for the La Plata team Wright pitched an excellent game.

The record of strikeouts shows that Lopez was in fine form particularly the incident of his striking out Sturgeon, something that so many pitchers have tried to do and failed in three years.

Park by his home run in the second inning won the straw hat offered by a La Plata admirer of the game, and he remarked that it sure was worth it for his run around those bases.

An amusing incident amongst the spectators was a foul ball hit by Galloway wending its way through two umbrellas, but very fortunately not injuring the owners. As for the error column, it is only fair to say that the high wind which prevailed throughout the game contributed greatly to the number made.

The work of Cleveland, the La Plata catcher, was a feature of the game.

FRIGORIFICO ARGENTINO v.

B.A.B.A.

On Sunday afternoon at Talleres the B.A.B.A. forfeited the game to the Frigorifico Argentino Central on account of lack of players, score 9-0.

The Argentinos appeared on the field with 12 men, while Buenos Aires could only produce 5 players.

The Argentinos practised together very well and appeared to be on edge to put up a slashing game.

However the large crowd of spectators was by no means disappointed as a "scratch" game was indulged in between players of both teams.

During the practice game many brilliant and spectacular plays were pulled off including three double plays. Also there were plenty of long swats and the game finally broke up after both sides had become exhausted from running around the bases.

The Argentinos appeared on the field with the following players:— Herroff, Rehmyer, Hiltin, Ilaves, McEnnelly, Mihara, Davison, Irish, Tuthill, Shea, Rea, O'Reilly. The Buenos Aires lads who showed up

CRICKET

BELGRANO v. HURLINGHAM.

In perfect cricketing weather, with a breeze that brought some comfort from a scorching sun, Hurlingham and Belgrano met on the latter's ground, and an interesting and good day's cricket was the result, which ended in favour of the visitors.

Belgrano winning the toss, sent in Brown and Magrane to face Gardom and Jackson. The start was disastrous. In his first over Gardom got Brown caught in the slips, and that the attack was a hot and vigorous one was seen by the number of "maidens" that marked the commencing, and by the somewhat painful efforts of the batsmen to play themselves in. When 11 had been registered, Ratcliff was well caught by Brougham off Jackson, and Herbert Dorning filled the vacancy, and from the first played excellent cricket. Magrane's wicket fell to an awkward one from Jackson. Trollope and Holland followed.

With Curchod and Dorning together things brightened up, and several good boundary strokes were made, Curchod scoring cleanly and fairly fast for his 21.

Griffen was lucky, and gave no less than two good chances before he scored, Powell-Jones and the fielder at point making the mistakes. Luncheon was taken with Griffin and E. W. S. Thompson still holding their own. A few moments' play after lunch, and Belgrano were all out for 181, of which Dorning by sound cricket was responsible for 51.

Gardom 3 for 57, and Jackson 4 for 79, had the honours of the attack.

Hurlingham commenced carefully, but without success. Powell-Jones was bowled for a duck in Dorning's first over, and Rumboll joined Mold. The latter played bright cricket as usual and scored 43 before falling a victim to Curchod. Mold is a very slow player, and unattractive from a spectator's point of view, but is a most invaluable bat to any side. Jackson followed Rumboll, and started easily and well. He knocked Curchod, who was keeping a good length and bowling well, fairly well round the field, and it was evident that the wicket gave no assistance to the attack. A change brought Dorning on, and he had the satisfaction of bowling Jackson for a well played 40. Gardom joined Mold, who was the next to go. Wigg was soon out, and Mendl took his place. It was in company with Gardom, who all the time was playing free and clean cricket, that Mendl scored the winning hit. Play was continued until time. The scores were:

B.A.G.S. v. QUILMES.

This match, played at Talleres on Sunday ended in an exciting finish and the defeat of Quilmes by two runs. Neither team were at their full strength.

B.A.G.S. batted first on a good wicket, and due to Scorey, who scored 43, knocked up a total of 115. The bowling of Williams was the feature of this part of the play. He captured 7 wickets for 42.

Quilmes had only nine players, otherwise the result would have been different. Hetley and D'Aguilar made a good stand for the first wicket, but after this, with the exception of double figures from A. P. Williams, Quilmes collapsed and were all out for 113.

Luck got five wickets for 30, and bowled an excellent length and with accuracy.

PACIFIC RAILWAY v. CLUB

PORTUGUES DE SPORT.

At Saenz Pena on Sunday the Portugues Club gained an easy victory of 38 runs over the team representing the Pacific Railway.

The railwaymen went in first and commenced well. Moffat, Day and Bryans helped themselves liberally to runs, and accounted for 88 out of the total of 117. The team collapsed afterwards. Gonsalves did well by getting 5 wickets for 55, and was well supported by Sant'Ana (3 for 31).

The feature of the Portugues Club's innings was the batting of Alves who compiled an excellent 68 before getting his legs in front of a straight one.

The fielding of the Pacific left much to be desired, and no fewer than

With the season drawing to a close, only one match of importance was played on Sunday.

Racing on their own ground met Argentino de Quilmes, and won a very one-sided match by 8 goals to 1.

Mr. R. C. Rolan refereed for the following teams:—

Racing.—Arduino, Ochoa, Reyes, Betular, Olazar, Pepe, Perinetti, Hospital, Ohaco, Vivaldi, Canaveri.

Arg. de Quilmes.—Duque, Ortega, Ferrarotti, Rabeca, Molachino, Pozzoni, Faliberri, De la Serna, Cabana, Barreiro, Lobato.

The first half saw Perizetti (1) and Ohaco (3) scoring. Pressure was kept up in the second half, but once Argentino de Quilmes broke away and Cabana scored their one and only with a fine shot.

Racing through Olazar (2), Ohaco (1), and Vivaldi (1) added 4 more goals in the second half. Duque in goal played well, but he was fairly bombarded all the afternoon.

33 runs were added to their opponents' total by extras.

It was a good game, and well enjoyed. Bryans was successful with the ball, and claimed 4 wickets for 42. The scores were:—

GREAT INTERNATIONAL MATCH

BRITAIN v. GERMANY.

Britain.—Kitchener, goal; French and Chetwode, backs; Smith-Dorrien, Haig, and Macready, half-backs; Grenfell, Daniels, the Prince of Wales, Dwyer, and O'Leary, forwards.

Germany.—William the Kaiser, goal; the Crown Prince and Count Zeppelin, backs; von Hindenburg, Bernhardi, and Clausewitz, half-backs; Joachim, Adalbert, von Kluck, von Mackensen, and von Emmich, forwards.

Referee.—Uncle Sam (neutral).

This match was the attraction of the century, since the two teams had not met for time immemorial. Britain brought with them to France over a million supporters of the game, and were, without doubt, a team to be proud of. Their second eleven was engaged with Turkey.

There was considerable delay at the outset, the Crown Prince having been busily engaged in looting the dressing-room.

Von Kluck kicked off, and for a time Germany rather unexpectedly held her own, scoring a doubtful goal after great efforts to wear down the opposition (Mons). Britain rallied, and some fine work by the forward line brought about the equaliser (Marne). Germany blundered badly when within shooting range (Calais), and Kitchener was responsible for saving many a dangerous situation. After a time, Britain easily demonstrated her superiority, and Grenfell, Daniels, and O'Leary each scored. The interval arrived with the score:—

Britain, 4.

Germany, 1.

Play became very rough on the resumption, and many defenceless women and children on the touch-line were crushed to death during the wild scrimmages of the opposition to get the ball. Zeppelin, a left-back, kicked wildly, and considerably damaged many churches and cathedrals.

At length, after a desperate hand-to-hand struggle, Britain succeeded in capturing another goal (Neuve Chapelle). From this time onwards they completely overwhelmed their opponents, Germany being utterly staggered. "We shall 'Loos,' papa, I fear!" snivelled the Crown Prince. And he was right! Goals came in astonishing number and variety, thanks to the whole-hearted support of the Allies, and the whistle went with Germany thoroughly crushed and subdued.

Final score:—

Britain, 12.

Germany, 1. (Off-side.)

A great feature of the struggle was the splendid all-round play of the visitors, who received a tremendous ovation. Unfortunately the German custodian disappeared with the gate-money shortly before the conclusion of the match.

STORMY NIGHT AT THE STADIUM

On Saturday night, the Stadium was again crowded on the occasion of the joint performance of a portion of the Aida and of Carmen. The orchestra was as magnificently impressive as ever and the exponents of both operas did well. In such an environment however there is a marked tendency for those seated at a distance to lose a great deal of the vocal music and the size of the stage while imposing and the roof of "the vault of Heaven" rather tend to give a pigmy appearance to the performance. Nevertheless the representation was excellent and it is greatly to be regretted that a high wind (the same that spoiled the targets off Bahia Blanca) which rose during the evening, did no small damage to the scenery, especially the wings giving a realistic earthquake effect, not in the stage directions.

AFTER THE WAR

German Plans for Commercial Progress

PREPARATIONS IN AMERICA

London, Dec. 6.

The commercial men of Switzerland, especially at Zurich, comment on the enormous preparations on foot both in North and South America for supplying the industrial firms of Germany with raw material.

The blockade of Germany both by sea and land established by the Allies makes it impossible for these supplies to enter the country until after the war. It follows therefore that they are being ordered by the German traders in anticipation of peace, and it seems that they expect that the conclusion of the war is nearer than is generally believed.

In connection with this matter, Professor Reisser of Berlin, is reported to have given a lecture recently wherein he expressed the conviction that as soon as peace is restored Germany would resume trade relations with all foreign countries, including those which are at present her enemies, despite their illwill. He called to mind the words of the Russian Minister of Finance who said that no country in the world, least of all Russia, could do without German products.

CONSCRIPTS OF '95

GOOD PHYSIQUE OF THE SOLDIERS.

Conscripts for the 1895 Class are now being rapidly enrolled for training at all the barracks and headquarters in the Province, and at the Campó de Mayo. Severe though the medical examination is, the examining doctors report very favourably on the physique of recruits, and state that the number of rejections is very small. December 10 is the last day for enrolment, so a trickle of arrivals is expected for the next few days, followed by a rush at the last, which in view of custom is regarded as almost inevitable.

VIOLENT STORM IN CORDOBA

CONSIDERABLE DAMAGE TO PROPERTY.

From Rio Cuarto in Cordoba reports have been received of an exceptionally violent storm of hail, wind and rain, which broke over the district on Saturday. Although only lasting half an hour, the wind rose to the force of a hurricane. Roofs were lifted off houses, galpones levelled to the ground, trees and walls blown down. There was no loss of life.

Telegraphic communications have been rendered difficult by a number of telegraphic posts being uprooted. In some parts both telephonic and telegraphic communications are suspended. In the southern part of the town of Rio Cuarto a thunderbolt fell.

The main violence of the storm was particular to the town, and the violent hail fall has, therefore, done but little damage to the crops.

One of the local native papers, which has always been so noted for its pro-German tendencies that its sale is almost restricted to that community, in referring to the Presidente Mitre case in its issue of Tuesday last stated: "It is reported from Montevideo that an English transport has been detained by the Argentine ship Presidente Mitre, and both have entered that port, the cause of this is attributed to the fact that the English ship was carrying contraband of war."

Damage to New Dry Dock at Port Militar.

The completion of the new Dry Dock at Port Militar has been thrown back some months more just recently by the breaking of the outside bottom covering by the force of the water underneath. The bottom of this dry dock is composed of armoured cement three and a half meters thick, and on the top of this it was decided to put a water proof covering of cement and sand in order to stop any filtering through of water as is the case with the smaller dock. This covering was five centimeters thick. It was thought that this would stick to the top of the armoured cement and make the bottom of the dock quite water proof, but things did not turn out as expected, and the water coming from underneath caused the covering, which was not strong enough to resist the pressure, to rise over an area of about forty meters on the bottom of the dock. On discovery of the accident, water was at once pumped into the dock in order to counteract the pressure underneath and an investigation was made by the government engineers and those of the German company who have been given the contract for making the dock. It was decided that it would be necessary to reopen the drainage pipes used in the construction, and which had been afterwards closed, for the draining off of the water and relay the covering again on the bottom of the dock, the cost of which was calculated at between 80 and 100 thousand dollars gold. In accordance with the terms of the contract this work would have to be defrayed by the German contractors. The work will be delayed another five months at the least, especially as the necessary material cannot now be brought out from Germany.

News from the Front.

News has been received from Corporal George Wagstaff, who was in business with his brother in law (Mr. Marrs) at Ingeniero White some two years ago. Corporal Wagstaff was in the retreat from Mons. During the advance from Ypres to Zonnebeke his company which had been reduced to 45 strong were ordered to stand to one night about 1.30 a.m. to repel an attack of the Prussian Guards, who were allowed to come within 20 yards of the trenches before being fired upon. The losses on the side of the latter were terrible as no German reached the trenches and next morning the dead and wounded were piled up ten and twelve deep. After this the regiment—the King's Own (Liverpool)—remained 28 days in the trenches without being able to have a wash or shave during the whole of the time. After the attack on Neuve Chapelle, Corp. Wagstaff was recommended for the D.S.M. and the Czar has since conferred the medal of St. George on him. Besides this he has been mentioned in General French's dispatches three times. In the attack on Givenchy the Germans were driven right out of their trenches but the cost of this was 700 men killed and wounded. Corporal Wagstaff was in charge of the section for the throwing of bombs and owing to an accident with one of these the throwing arm, which has a pressure equal to 24,000 lbs. flew back and caught three of his fingers. He was subsequently conveyed back to England.

Missions to Seamen Institute. Ing. White.

A Fancy bazaar and sale of work is to be held on December 18 in the large Hall of the Athletic Club (kindly lent for the occasion by the committee). The entire proceedings will be devoted to the building fund of the new Missions to Seamen's Institute.

The building, which is now approaching completion, stands on a site rented at a nominal figure from the Southern Railway, close to the docks and in a central position between the two railway stations. It consists of a large hall, which will accommodate 300 sailors, a billiard room, library, Captains' room, and "half deck." The cost of the erection and lighting is $8,700, of which $7,000 has already been contributed chiefly by the sailors themselves. It is expected that this final effort will allow the building to be opened free of debt. The bazaar will be opened at 2.30 p.m. by Mr. W. B. Harding Green, British Vice-Consul at Bahia Blanca. Any contributions in kind, i.e. Camp produce, articles of clothing, curious, old clothes suitable for a rummage stall, will be very welcome and may be sent to Mr. Berry, Almacén Inglés, Calle Chiclana 130, B. Blanca, any donations in money, equally welcome, may be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. B. Tregarthan, Ingeniero White.

The Chaplain says:—

"We are aware that there are many calls to be answered, many demands to meet, during the present crisis, but after the encomium passed by His Majesty upon the service of the Mercantile Service to the Empire, we feel justified on patriotic grounds, in appealing for help towards a building, which on the word of the sailors themselves would be a veritable Godsend to them in a Port, which has otherwise very little to offer to those who 'use the sea.'"

Exportation of Grain.

Up to the end of the eleventh month of the year the firm of Bunge and Born have exported the sum of 564,548 tons of cereals; L. Dreyfus and Co. 256,087 tons, Huni and Wormser 131,621 tons, Weil Hnos 118,166 tons, Sanday and Co. 117,762 tons, H. Ford and Co. 592 tons, General Mercantile 67,728 tons, H. C. Ehlert 39,477 tons, Nicholson and Rathborne 52,454 tons, other firms 373, making a total of 1,428,808 tons from the first of January up to the 30th of November. The total amount of wheat exported was 926,426 tons, and of oats 466,895 tons.

School Boy Spite.

About a fortnight ago some of the youths at the national college here were not passed in their exams., and out of spite these young men put quite half a tin of tar on the step, doors, walls and balcony and blinds of the house where Mr. and Mrs. Hilton reside, the latter being one of the teachers at this college. One of the youths strongly suspected in this matter lives a square higher up, and there are marks of tar on the outside of his house, which were not there before this happened. This should be good proof for the police to work on, but although the names of the boys suspected was given them the first night this happened, they have taken no steps in this matter at present. The amount of the damage done, the cost of which falls on the landlord, is estimated at between three and four hundred dollars, as to get the tar off the walls will have to be replastered and the iron balconies taken down.

Mails from the Presidente Mitre.

On Friday last the Madrid arrived here to take in cargo for the south, and left again yesterday afternoon at 5 p.m. in accordance with her time table. Before sailing, the mails taken from the Presidente Mitre, on her being captured, were sent down from Montevideo, and coming by rail from Buenos Aires, were taken on board the Madrid for the southern ports.

Items in Brief.

In the coming census to be taken of the livestock Bahia Blanca is to be considered in the eighth zone, and will include Olavarria, La Madrid, Coronel Suarez, Saavedra, Coronel Pringles, Las Sierras, Villarino, and Patagones. The person named in charge of this zone is Señor J. Urraza.

On Monday morning last the body of a man about forty years of age was picked out of the water at the elevator mole at Ingeniero White. On examination it was found that the body contained two bullet wounds, and according to the medical evidence the man was dead before he was thrown into the water. It is not known up to the present who committed this crime, or who the man was, as no papers were found in his pockets.

Four men recently entered a house belonging to a widow who owned a blacksmith's shop near, and whilst two threatened her with revolvers, the other two searched the house and stole articles valued at $560.

The direction of Agricultural Colleges has received an offer from Señora P. S. de Bordeu of a grant of 50 hectares of land near the yards of the Rural Society in Villa Bordeu for the purpose of constructing a farming college there.

Pensions have lately been granted by the Minister of Finance to Señor J. A. Pedriel, of the customs here, and to Doctor Lucero, the Sanitary Doctor in the Port, whose duty it was to give entrance to the ships arriving there from any other port outside the Republic.

An "asado" and sports are to be held in Port Militar in honour of the conscripts, who are shortly to be disbanded there after doing two years' service.

During the last month in the national telegraph department 7680 telegrams have been despatched from here.

Whilst walking on the line near Grunbein recently a man named Hernandez in trying to dodge one train got in the way of another, and was shortly afterwards conveyed to the local hospital with a broken arm and internal injuries.

The district office of the military department here, number 24, will in future be open from 7.30 a.m. to 12 mid-day.

Judgment has been given by Doctor Singulany in the libel case published by Senores H. Guezurraga and A. Brunel in the evening paper the "Sud" last month against the Intendente, the first-named persons having been condemned to one year's imprisonment.

Two boys were knocked down by a motor-car whilst playing in the street at the corner of Alsina and Soler, but thanks to the promptness of the chauffeur in applying his brakes they were very little hurt. The driver was arrested pending inquiries.

As the La Madrid train will in future arrive on certain days at 11.30 a.m., and the correspondence by the Pringles train is delivered from 11 to 1 p.m. that by the former train will not be taken around till after 3 p.m., as the postmen are on duty from 6 a.m. As it is, there will still remain ample time to send a reply off by the 6.40 train the same evening.

It has been decided to hold the Spanish Romerias here on December 25, 26 and 27, and several donations have already been made towards this festival. The Minister of Public Works (Doctor M. Moyano), accompanied by the Minister of Marine (Vice-Admiral J. P. Saenz Valiente) will shortly visit the new dry dock at Port Militar, with a commission of engineers in order to inspect the amount of damage caused there by the recent breaking up of the bottom of the dock. Various excursions are shortly to be made from La Plata museum in order to study the marine fauna at the ports of Madryn, Rio Colorado, and Rio Negro.

STAR OF NEW ZEALAND ASHORE

London, Dec. 6.

The British steamer Star of New Zealand, 4417 tons, belonging to the Star Line of Belfast, is reported to be ashore on Molene Island south-east of Ushant. Forty-six of the crew have been rescued.

(Note.—The Star of New Zealand left Buenos Aires for Havre on November 7.)

THE LATEST "U" BOAT

REPORTED CAPTURE OF A SUPER-SUBMARINE.

The Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury publishes the following from its London correspondent: "I have heard an interesting story, which I believe to be worthy of credence, of the inglorious career of the latest German 'U' boat. She was the first of the enemy super-submarines, 250 ft. in length, with a 20 ft. beam, and in addition to her torpedo tubes she carried four guns of fairly large calibre. She was launched a fortnight ago at Stettin, and within a few hours of leaving her base she was securely caught in one of the traps we have so skilfully laid for these craft somewhere in the 'German' Ocean. The surprise and chagrin of her officers may be imagined. Indeed, so great was their disgust that they absolutely refused to make any statement in regard to their unfortunate vessel. One of the crew, however, was more talkative, and from him the captors heard with satisfaction mingled with a good deal of amusement the brief and tragic history of the submarine. Our experts have, I believe, made an inspection of our latest prize and find that in this branch of naval construction the enemy has nothing to teach us."

resenting the French Government for the purchase of horses for the war, in that district. A lot of animals are still being stolen in the Tandil district. Two horses valued at $350, were taken recently from Señor Manrique. The police there have recently found thirteen of the steers stolen from Senores Santamarina and Cantelo. A further robbery has been reported to them from the estancia of Señor Juilarena of seven heifers of two years valued at seven hundred dollars.

A fire broke out recently in a shed belonging to Senores H. C. Olivera and Co., of Coronel Pringles, in which was deposited naphtha and oil. The building was burnt to ashes, and was insured for the sum of $65,000. The cause of the fire is not yet known.

In the Pampa there are some 2,105,000 hectarcas sown for the coming harvest, which, on account of the recent rains, is expected to be very good. A large amount of machinery has already been purchased for the work of cutting.

It is reported from the Neuquen district that the snow which is now melting on the Andes is doing considerable damage to the new irrigation works. They have been destroyed in several places by the floods.

At the sales held in the yards of the Rural Society on December 1 and 2, steers were sold at $72 to $185 each, bullocks $110 to $180, cows $63 to $163, calves $45 to $103, bulls $80 to $120, wethers from $6.75 to $14.40, ewes $170, rams $90 to $160. In all there were sold 3,401 head of cattle, 25,987 sheep, 47 bulls, and 68 rams, fetching a grand total of $558,841.

Camp Notes

(By Our Agricultural Editor.)

The commencement of the cutting of the oat harvest is reported from Carlos Casares, and also in the district of Lincoln, where the crops are reported to be likely to give a good yield.

The values for fat cattle during the week have not improved, though entries have been fewer at Linieres. Best quality steers in the camp are worth 26 cents a pound. Calves have been meeting a good inquiry, and late values have been sustained. Sheep have been forward in large numbers, and prices show a decline from last week.

At the sheep sales held during the week, in the auction yards, several varieties of sheep from Britain and New Zealand were submitted for public competition, when a very firm demand was experienced and satisfactory prices were obtained. The high average of $2575 was obtained for four sheep, bred by Messrs. J. H. Dean and Sons, imported by Mr. Ernest St. C. Haydon. These sheep were a fine type of big, lengthy, heavily woolled animals, representing the most saleable type of Lincoln rams for this country. The same gentleman's importations from New Zealand were admirably presented, and also experienced a good selling trade. An average of $1000.90 was secured for all the Lincolns sold. The New Zealand Lincolns were nicely clad, and the sale was well supported, as these somewhat smaller type of sheep are yearly becoming more popular here, as the higher value of their wool, and their suitability for mating with the big, coarser, strong woolled sheep becomes more generally known.

The great size and weight formerly looked for in a sheep does not mean as great an advantage as it was considered to be. Nice handy, medium-weighted carcasses are so much more saleable, on the home meat markets than heavy fatty carcasses. The superior wool carried by the progeny of these rams is also of great importance, and not only will a higher price be attained, but a heavier fleece will also be shown if the sheep are properly graded or classified for the density of their fleeces. Before many more years have passed, I anticipate that this Republic will see the advantage of copying more closely the practical style of sheep management in New Zealand, and thereby obtain the same range of high values as the mutton and lamb exported from that colony has now commanded for many years. This is due in a great measure to the attention given to the careful handling of sheep by the New Zealanders, who bring out the correct class of carcass animal, at the weight found most acceptable by buyers on the home meat markets.

On Thursday, Dec. 2, Messrs. José M. de Yriondo and Coy. held a most successful joint sale of pedigree imported Shorthorn bulls, the property of Messrs. Sidey and Poels and Messrs. P. and G. Hughes. This sale was well attended, and a satisfactory trade was experienced for all animals passing through the ring, though "Baron Bridekirk," a big good kind of a bull was none too dear at $7000, to Sr. S. Rodriguez Loreda. The bulls shown by the Messrs. P. and G. Hughes were mostly young animals recently received from the Embarcadero, and though presented in very good bloom, did not carry the flesh they would have had if a longer period had been available for their preparation. Both importing firms could not be other-wise than satisfied with the trade ruling at possibly the last sale of imported Shorthorns for the season. The thirteen bulls belonging to Messrs. P. and G. Hughes gave an average of $2507, while Messrs. Sidey and Poels had $3871 for 8 bulls sold.

During the week several well known camp men have been in town. Mr. Thomas Bett, Santa Narcisa, General Belgrano, has returned from a business trip to Uruguay, where he reports the camp to be in very good condition. Mr. George Matheson, from Las Barrancas, has been in town for a few days, and acquired a very nice young bull at Thursday's sale, imported by Messrs. Sidey and Poels, for use at that famous Cabaña. Mr. Charles Peters has again returned to Salta after a business visit to the Capital.

Latest home mails report that the last consignment of chilled beef from Brazil sold on the Smithfield Market was poor in quality, and had not been handled as it should have been. In ordinary times buyers would not have looked at this sort of meat, and Brazilian shippers ought to bear in mind that the London meat market is always looking for choice quality beef. They should attempt to supply that demand by sending carcasses of good quality, and properly handled, as is insisted on by home butchers.

A home contemporary reports that a loin of Argentine chilled cow beef at Sivains, in the London Central markets, the other week, had 6½ inches of solid fat.

An esteemed correspondent, writing from Quiroga, F.C. Oeste, under date Nov. 30, says: "I was very pleased to read in THE HERALD of the great success attending the recent fat stock show. Perhaps you will be glad to know that everything looks well for a bumper harvest here, and crops are almost ready to cut."

THE CROPS.

The Director-General of the Department of Rural Economy and Statistics of the Ministry of Agriculture, presented his definite estimate of the areas under wheat, linseed, oats, barley and rye, to the Minister on Tuesday last. They are as follows—with comparisons with last agricultural year:—

	Year 1915-16.	Year 1914-15
	Hectares.	Hectares.
Wheat	6,645,000	6,261,000
Linseed	1,619,000	1,723,000
Oats	1,038,000	1,161,000
Barley	174,500	160,500
Rye	85,600	92,600
	9,562,100	9,398,100

ENGLISH SALES.

The sales of pedigree farm stock in Britain have been animated, and very satisfactory prices obtained. The Collynie sale was a great success. The bull calves this year were as good a lot as ever Mr. Duthie put before his patrons, and he scored the highest price but one in the history of these sales since 1892. The average for 18 bull calves this year is £348 14s. 4d., and the highest price £1312 10s. This average has only been exceeded in 1907, when the figure was £409 16s. 7d. for 17; in 1910, when it was £378 8s. 2d. for 18; and in 1912, when it was £377 8s. 7d. for 24. In that year the highest price was recorded, viz., £2100. The most successful sire this year again is Knight of Collynie. Six bull calves by him were sold at Collynie at an average of £647 10s., and the highest-priced bull calf at Upper-mill—the red Upper-mill Layman, which went to Mr. Duthie at 1,000 gs.—was also got by him. The ascending ratio of averages for Mrs. Marr's bull calves is also well worth looking at. The largest number ever present-

At Edgcote, near Banbury, 70 beasts from the herd of the Edgcote Shorthorn Co. were sold in about two hours for £8,014, an average of over £114. Thirty-six bulls averaged nearly £150, and 34 cows £88. The exceptionally high prices of 170 and 120 guineas were paid by Mr. Casares, a London buyer for the Argentine, while he paid 220 guineas for Edgcote Volunteer, and ten guineas less for Edgcote Bugler. Mr. Walden also bought several bulls for South America, his prices including 110 guineas for three fine animals.

DEPARTURE OF MR. E. MOUBRAY ALEXANDER.

This gentleman, whose name has been intimately connected with the importation of many high class pedigree animals, for the past few years, has again left for Home. During his present visit Mr. Alexander travelled considerably in the camp, being interested in the acquisition of good, heavy draught horses for the home trade, and he speaks most enthusiastically of the undoubted great agricultural richness of this country. It is understood Mr. Alexander intends visiting South Africa before returning here, as he has for a number of years been largely interested in the importation of fine stock to that colony. Mr. Alexander's interests here will be in the capable hands of Mr. J. Greig, who has since his arrival in Argentina made a wide circle of friends, and enjoys the confidence of all those with whom he has had business relations.

SOIL IN RELATION TO DAIRY CATTLE.

There would probably be less quarrelling between our various breeders if they realised the important part which the soil plays in relation to breeds of cattle, says a writer in a New Zealand paper. In this country we seem to take it for granted that one breed is best for all the varying conditions of climate and altitude and herbage. Experience in England and other countries has disproved this for years past. It is much the same no matter what the cattle are selected for, but this is particularly so with regard to dairy cows.

People often overlook the fact that no one kind of cow will meet the requirements of the dairy farmer under all conditions and circumstances. The nature of the soil and the quality of the pasturage need to be duly taken into account in making a selection, and another important point to be considered is what branch of the dairy industry is being cultivated. The choice of a breed also depends to some extent upon the locality, as there are certain districts which have their favourite breed of dairy cows, and it is usually found expedient to conform to local preferences.

As regards the question of soil in connection with the selection of a dairy breed, it may broadly be said that only good land is suitable for carrying large-framed and heavy cows, such as big dairy Shorthorns, their crosses, and others of similar type.

These big dairy cattle have a massive body to support, and therefore require good pasturage and very plentiful food of good quality if they are to do themselves justice. On the other hand, on farms where the soil is light and the pasturage only mediocre, the Garden.—The same practices as advised in our previous articles should be continued this month. Sow the seeds already named. Remove bindings from the grafts which have taken. Dig up and store all bulbs which have finished flowering. Collect the seeds which are dry and mature. Dig up and loosen the earth in beds and round plants. Cut away dead roses and trim the plants. The rose bushes not only benefit by this operation, as it strengthens the plants, but they improve very much in appearance. Trim and put supports to chrysanthemums, cactus dahlias, etc. The latter are either now in flower or will soon be, and the chrysanthemums are now developing rapidly. A sprinkling of "Salitre de Chile" in those gardens where the earth is poor would be very beneficial, not only for the late flowering plants, but also for those now in flower, as this would favour the better formation of the seeds.

Orchard.—Plough or loosen the earth round the trees and keep down the weeds. For the formation of plants from the shoots coming up around the trunks of pear, apple and quince trees, pile the earth round these trunks, covering the shoots as high as possible. Only a limited number should be left round each tree, and cut the excess away, as they would weaken the plant. Attention should be paid to the watering, as the fruit in general is now at a critical moment, and if the rain is not sufficient, artificial irrigation should be employed. In the irrigation districts this is a delicate operation, and the water has to be systematically applied, and it is then seen what a disadvantage it is to have vegetables planted in orchards, as these requiring much more water than the fruit trees, the choice should fall upon a medium or small-sized type of dairy cattle, for these are more frugal. Big, heavy cows would not do sufficiently well on this class of land, for it will not afford good enough and adequate keep for them.

The question of hardness must also in certain cases be given consideration. For example, in bleak, exposed situations, and particularly upon hill farms in the high veld, it is very important that the cows should be of a hardy breed, for if they are not able to fully withstand the exposure to inclement weather, which must necessarily fall to their lot in exposed situations, their milk-yielding powers are sure to suffer a considerable reduction, and they will not thrive properly.

In spite of all that is urged to the contrary, the two breeds most famous for their hardness are the Ayrshire and the Kerry. South Devons, a breed gaining in popularity in South Africa, and a great dairy breed, enjoy a reputation for hardness and robustness of constitution, but being large-framed cows, they require plenty of good food to show to advantage, and hardly do well on poor land, though in this respect they are better than the dairy Shorthorn.

Red Polls are a notably hardy race and excellent doers, easy to keep in fresh condition, as they have good flesh-producing qualities, while being at the same time first-rate for the dairy. Channel Island breeds are, as a rule, the least hardy of imported cattle, though there are some which have been acclimatised in the Northern Hemisphere, which are hardy and at the same time preserve all the famous characteristics of their race.

The Friesland is too well known to need much of a reference here. It is a breed which occupies a very high place in the opinion of farmers throughout South Africa, and while some declare that they are good only for milk and an abundance of it, records prove them excellent dairy cattle as well.

latter get an excess and the fruit turns out insipid.

In our previous article we gave some indications about artificial irrigation.

Plagues and Insects.

The latter are continuing to appear in their most dangerous forms. Butterflies and beetles are laying their eggs on all plants and grubs are fast making their appearance. For the butterfly of the orange and lemon tree and the "bicho del cesto" arsenical sprays should be employed, and for the butterflies, beetles and moths, the lighted traps of which we spoke last week. There are many grubs which come out at night, and which we do not see working. We may find our cabbages eaten up or peppers, etc., neatly bitten off at the bud, and find them strewn on the ground when we get up in the morning and cannot find a trace of the culprits. For these the poisoned bait should be laid overnight. This is made by mixing one part of white arsenic or Paris green in 25 parts of dry bran. When these are well mixed, add sweetened water until the bran forms a thick paste. Distribute it in small mounds of one table spoonful to each plant. Fowls or animals should not be allowed to touch this bait, as it is poisonous.

Probable Weather.

Without intending to forecast the weather, we will try to give each week a synopsis of same for the coming period, the changes and meteorological occurrences expected at that time of the season, and the precautions which should be taken where possible to minimise their effects on agriculture in general and gardening and fruit tree cultivation in particular.

The weather continues fairly warm, favourable for vegetation in general, and being unsettled, there is a possibility of rain, so no droughts are to be feared for the present. Watering is therefore not urgent. The development of cryptogams is to be feared owing to the heat, and the damp from the recent rains. Hail storms are expected, so those having hail cannon, should get them into working order.

General Notes.

Agriculturists know how much of their success depends on the state of the weather, and the more experience a man has as to the climatic conditions he is working in, the more successful he will be. The principal dangers arising from the conditions of the weather, are the excess or want of rain; winds either by their force or direction, fogs, hail or frosts. During the present season, damage to plantations may be caused by excess of rain or hailstorms. These latter are very frequent and violent. Their affect may be minimised by the use of hail cannon, provided these are employed in sufficient number to cover practically the whole region which is threatened by the storm. Otherwise the effect is only local and will not benefit the property employing them. In France hail towers have been used with success during the last few years, and these have also been employed in this country in Mendoza, but their result has not yet been defined.

CORRESPONDENCE.

(To the Editor).

Sir.—Can you please inform me through the medium of your widely read paper if there are any firms in Buenos Aires who sell spray pumps of any description? Any mark except Hummish. Thanking you in anticipation.

Yours, etc.,

Pest.

In reply to the above letter "Rustic" writes:— "The best sprayer is 'Vermorek's Eclair, sold at Ferreteria Francesa, Carlos Pellegrini and Rivadavia, at $30 to $35. This is all copper, and of the knapsack pattern. A. B. Mayer, Avenida de Mayo 1245, also has a very practical sprayer to use with a bucket. It costs $20."

AMERICAN TRADE CAMPAIGN

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

STAFF TO BE DOUBLED.

War has its campaigns and so has peace. The campaigns of war always mean destruction, but the campaigns of peace, if they be efforts for the extension of trade, produce wealth. Just now the Department of Commerce in Washington is inaugurating a world-wide effort for the conquest of new markets for American products. It is hoped that as the result of the European war the manufacturers of this country will secure new markets in countries which have hitherto seen very little of the products of the United States.

Through the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce the department purposes to aid American merchants and manufacturers in taking advantage of their wonderful opportunities and in preparing for the struggle for trade supremacy which commercial officials are certain will follow the war.

Reorganization of the staff in Washington and an increase to about twice its present size of the foreign commercial service are contemplated, according to Dr. E. E. Pratt, Chief of the Bureau.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce will make extensive inquiries about commercial conditions in other countries, while the cost of production division will conduct a similar investigation with respect to tariff conditions. Of necessity, these inquiries will call for considerable expenditures, and appropriations to cover these items will be asked for at the coming session of Congress.

"The commercial agent service is the backbone of the trade promotion organization," said Dr. Pratt. "It is expected that under the appropriations asked for it will be possible during the fiscal year 1916-17 to make investigation of the possible foreign markets for cotton textiles, motor vehicles, railway supplies, boots and shoes, agricultural implements, furniture, machinery of all kinds, electrical power equipment, structural material, wearing apparel, investment possibilities, etc. No large increase will be asked by the bureau for the establishment of branch offices in the United States, but the bureau hopes to extend this service through the co-operation of the local commercial organizations.

"The commercial attache service has been in existence just about a year. It has proved so useful that an addition of ten commercial attaches will be recommended. These attaches, it is intended, will be stationed in such important countries as Japan, India, South Africa, Spain, Scandinavia, Italy, the Netherlands, the Balkan States, Central America, Venezuela, and Colombia. With the present organization the commercial attache service will then cover practically the entire world, and the equipment will then be equal to that of any other country."

The bureau will also extend its labours so as to cover the whole of South America and will conduct a number of separate investigations in all the Latin countries.

Finally it is also planned to take up a series of market investigations abroad for the purpose of placing producers of raw materials and staple products in closer and more intelligent contact with foreign markets.

CANADIAN APPLES

THEIR FUTURE IN ARGENTINA.

The Acting Trade Commissioner for Canada, Mr. B. S. Webb, at Reconquista 46, has received an important shipment of apples from Okanagan Valley, in British Columbia, of more than ten thousand cases. These are consigned to a well-known English fruit broker in the Capital.

This is perhaps the greatest shipment of apples received in Buenos Aires this season. The Canadian apples, such as the "Delicious," "Jonathan" and the "Winter Spy," have long been a subject of favourable comment. Growing in a northern climate of vast range, they possess a flavour which is typically their own. A superiority of quality is generally attributed to the apple growing in cold regions, and they well merit their reputation.

The sudden appearance of a heavy supply of apples coming at a time when the demand for apples in the fruit market exceeds all previous demands, will go a long way in breaking the ice—that is, commercially—which existed between Canada and Argentina.

This apparent coolness has long been puzzling, especially to those who appreciated the possibilities for business relationship between both countries.

Many reasons for this commercial indolence were cited. Mr. Webb, however, maintains that the fault is largely due to past negligence on the part of his country, who rather entertained an equivocal conception of South America.

"Recently," he claimed, "a new feeling has circulated in Canada about the progressiveness of Latin America, and a movement soon made itself evident in favour of a better acquaintance with a country that was the possessor of great natural riches, and of clean business methods."

He believes that the time is not far distant when Canada will make a great bid to capture some of Argentina's trade.

The apple industry is a case in point. Argentina, for many reasons, has been unable to produce a superior grade of apple, and she has, therefore, been obliged to fill her wants by supplies from foreign countries, of which Canada, although one of the greatest apple producers in the world, was an inconspicuous figure.

This large shipment, consigned to a local broker, will undoubtedly assist to open up new fields of activity in which both Argentina and Canada will not be the losers.

FIRE IN NAVAL ARSENAL

SERIOUS DESTRUCTION AT PUERTO MILITAR.

A destructive fire took place yesterday at the stores of Puerto Militar Arsenal, the outbreak occurring very early in the morning. The Minister of Marine had disembarked from the Moreno awaiting the reconstruction of the targets for battle practice and proposing in the meantime to thoroughly inspect the Arsenal dependencies with especial relation to the defects which have developed in the Grand Dock. On the outbreak of the fire it was found necessary to withdraw the railway coaches on the lines in front of the Arsenal, in which the Minister of Public Works and Admiral Saenz Valiente had travelled, to a place of safety owing to the violence of the flames.

A large crowd of spectators were quickly attracted by the glare of the fire and the sirens and whistles of all the shipping set up a dolorous concert of shrieks of alarm.

The armoured cruiser Pueyrredon was moored alongside the quay close to the burning galpones and was made ready for immediate retreat from the menace of the fire.

The danger was increased by the fire spreading to some fifty tanks and containers of oil outside the galpones which also took fire and burned furiously. Six corrugated iron sheds comprised the endangered portion of the Arsenal. They were erected in 1898 and subdivided by interior walls. Of these, four have been entirely destroyed with their immensely valuable contents consisting chiefly of sea stores, clothing and provisions for the fleet. Luckily the summer uniforms had already been served out, as had also much of the other material in stock. Nevertheless, the total value of the losses is very high.

A short circuit has, the Captain of the Port believes, been the cause of the disaster.

The stores were not insured, and it will be almost impossible to replace much of the destroyed material owing to the great demand for all such induced by the European war.

As a spectacle, the fire was imposing, broad sheets of flame and enormous volumes of smoke rising up from the raging furnace. Several heavy explosions of ammunition took place and some objects were hurled to a great distance, but no personal casualties are reported.

About 5 a.m. it was evident that the fire was being subdued, and not long after it was thoroughly got under. All the authorities were present during the entire course of the conflagration.

AN EXPENSIVE LESSON

(To the Editor).

Sir,—If the Minister of Marine saw nothing else at Puerto Militar, he has at least seen the enormous damage which a trifling accident may cause to a National Arsenal and which, in a time of actual stress might cause the most serious results, even the loss of a campaign. Four large stores sheds out of six, are totally destroyed and their contents of provision, arms, clothing and ammunition are gone for ever.

The effect of this may be imagined on a fleet which had come into harbour to refit in a hurry and get back quietly to its post and, all is due to a wretched little short circuit, that plentiful cause of fires which so signally mocks those who think that with electricity fire is almost impossible. It is greatly to be deplored that so much public money has gone up in smoke at a time when money is scarce. Perhaps in future there may be more inclination to house the elements of national defence in substantial buildings which will at least make some fight against fire, instead of galpones of tin and match-board which burn up at the slightest provocation and which when, they do catch fire, always seem from the first to be doomed.

MURDER IN URUGUAY

SENSATIONAL CRIME. DRAMATIC ARREST.

At Canelones, in Uruguay, a savage murder was committed on Saturday night under the following circumstances.

Señor Vicente Farnela, a landowner in Florida and Canelones, was in the kitchen of his house on that night, taking mate with Anastasio Martinez, one of his peones, when, about 9 p.m., he was called outside into the patio.

Scarcely had he disappeared when the peon heard several reports, and, running out, found Sr. Farnela lying on the ground shot through the throat and the left arm, in a dying condition. He expired, in fact, in a few moments without being able to speak.

The peon observed a man running away, but owing to the darkness he could not see who it was.

Comisario Franco, who was at once sent for, examined the body and found that the injuries which caused death had been inflicted by heavy revolver bullets which had been hacked with a knife. A number of cartridges were picked up close by.

A man named Marcelino Martinez, of solitary habits and bad character, is known to have held Farnela at feud. He has disappeared, and suspicion was strong against him. In his bedroom a gun loader with cartridges like those found was discovered and his apprehension was ordered at once. This was effected by Comisario Caballero, who knowing the man's habits and haunts, went and arrested the fugitive at the house of Regino Rodriguez, in Colorado Chico, as he was in the act of putting on a woman's dress after removing his moustache.

He was induced to confess by a ruse, for, being carried to San Ramon, the officer of the Jefatura informed him that Farnela was not dead yet, had recognised him and accused him as the assassin.

The murderer, who thought he had made sure work, was confounded and hesitatingly acknowledged the crime. He said he had long intended to kill Farnela, as the latter had driven him from his holding and ruined him so that his situation was desperate and he did not know what to do. The affair has made a sensation.

MURDER IN THE CITY

PORTER KILLS HIS EMPLOYER AND COMMITS SUICIDE.

Considerable sensation has been caused in the city by a tragedy which occurred in Calle Cangallo on Thursday night, and which the police made public yesterday.

In a house No. 783, of this street, an Italian gentleman named Tassano, a widower of 62 years of age, has been living for some time. In his employ was a Spanish servant called Modesto Castro. He is 20 years of age, and acted as porter to the establishment. For some reason Sr. Tassano summarily dismissed the youth, who apparently determined to revenge himself. Before his dismissal Castro's work was the subject of constant complaints and even reached the stage of personal and violent quarrelling. So impertinent became the porter that on Nov. 20 he was dismissed.

On Thursday night, when Señor Tassano entered his house, he was attacked by the porter, who drew a revolver and shot at his late master. The first bullet lodged in the shoulder, the second in the head, causing instant death.

Castro gave no warning of his intentions, and it was impossible for another to interfere, so rapid was the whole affair. At the first sign of police assistance, Castro turned the weapon upon himself, and fell in agony, to die a little while afterwards.

Dr. Llavallol has charge of the case. Both bodies are lying in the Morgue. Sr. Passano leaves a son.

'AFTER THE WAR'

GERMAN PLANS FOR COMMERCIAL PROGRESS

(To the Editor)

Sir,—In your issue of to-day under the above heading you give circulation to the preparations German Traders are making to resume commercial relations with all foreign countries, (including those which are at present her enemies) after peace has been declared.

Professor Reisser of Berlin will probably find out that whilst the wish is Father to the thought, it won't be quite as easily accomplished as he imagines, at least as far as those countries with whom he is at war are concerned.

As far as England and her colonies are concerned they will have a say in that matter; and if they permit Germany to resume trading with the British Empire on the old lines existing prior to the war, then I for one should consider we were a pack of idiots.

Hitherto German agents, and commercial travellers have over run our country taking millions of pounds worth of orders for goods of German manufacture annually, with no other expense than the hiring of a stock room in a commercial hotel at about 5/- per day; and out of the profits have built up a big fleet with the intention of wiping us off the surface of the seas.

Here in Argentina they require to take out a patente for each province they propose to operate in, running into hundreds of dollars per province a perfectly equitable arrangement. Surely, Sir, the time has come when we Britishers are not going to allow them after murdering our peaceful citizens, on land and sea, slaughtering our nurses and generally acting like "hottentots" to come over to England and the colonies and reap a harvest therewith to prepare again to disturb the whole human family with her military ambitions to become the dominator of the world. France, Belgium, Italy, Russia and Great Britain and the British Empire have to let her see we are able to fight her commercially; and every pound sterling we pay in wages to the workmen and women of our several countries stops in it instead of going to build up a war fund for another occasion, which occasion they will soon find a way of making when they are financially strong enough.

Do they imagine we can forget and forgive the slaughtering of our best blood, home and colonial and shake hands, never! As far as Britishers are concerned it will take centuries to obliterate the specimens of the blasted culture we have experienced at their hands during the last 15 months. Under the cloak of christianity they have aided and abetted the slaughter of armies of Christian men, women and children whose shoes they are not worthy to unloose and if the God of mercy and justice can forgive them for their cruelty then that God is not my God. If on the other hand, He does not forget them and forgive—which I believe He will not—then how can we be expected to forgive and forget? No, Sir, this nation of Germany has committed in the name of civilization and christianity more crimes than any nation since the world began and it is our duty to our dead flesh and blood to fight them tooth and nail to the day of Judgment be it sooner or later; and live for our own, fearing God and honouring all men, who believe in Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, between all nations black or white.

Yours, etc.

APPOINTED TO COMMAND ALL

Paris, Dec. 3.

President Poincaré has signed a decree appointing Marshal Joffre Commander-in-Chief of all the French forces with the exception of those serving in northern Africa.

BARKER COLLEGE

ANNUAL PICNIC

Anything in the way of a whole holiday appeals tremendously to school boys and girls—at least it used to do—and, judging by the way the little ones of the Barker College enjoyed themselves on Dec. 3 at their annual picnic it still does appeal.

Even the on-looker could not have helped enthusing at the enjoyment of Miss Jones' pupils, at the rosy faces, full of health and energy and keen abandonment to the joy of the day.

An early start was made, and as early as 9 o'clock in the morning no fewer than 88 little sporting enthusiasts had arrived at the Lomas Athletic Club ground. At one time Santa Catalina was intended for this annual affair, but weather charms and the like added also to Mr. Pownell's kindness, as Chairman of the Lomas Club and his committee in lending the ground, the nearer home site was decided upon.

In the morning, a tennis tournament, a cricket match and like games passed away the time until 11 a.m., when the feast commenced. All kinds of "tucker" had been brought, and a real royal time followed, which necessitated a gentle "siesta" afterwards. But this is telling tales, and it was only the weather that kept many from over exertion in the broiling sun. No sooner had the sun realised that the little ones wanted their sports, their jumping, racing, cricket ball throwing, their "ducking the apple" and a dozen other things, than he decided to dim himself, and merriment was rife.

Conspicuous in this respect were Miss Agnes Perry, Miss May Bridger, Miss Agnes Dodds, Miss Nordstrom, Miss Estella Sprott, and Herbert Dodds and Wilfred Gibbon.

It was a great day, and when the carriages came along many a weary mite was ready enough to go home and dream of the picnic and the next one to come.

SABRE DUEL AT F. VARELA

ONE OF THE PRINCIPALS WOUNDED!!

Our legislators continue to set peaceable examples.

On December 2 at 8 when all decent people (which does not include journalists) were rising and preparing for the day's tasks, Deputy Dr. Arturo D. Vatteone and Sr. Edelmiro Palacio were rolling up their shirt sleeves in the garden of Quinta "La Merced," Florencio Varela. They had an appointment to settle political differences concerning matters of the Province of Buenos Aires, which Province seems to cause much heart-burning.

The seconds were, for Dr. Vatteone Dr. José Arce and Don Pablo Palacios, and to "see fair" on the other side were Dr. Luis Bravo Zamora and Deputy Valentin Graciano. So Congress was well represented in the small party of Law breakers. The offence being of deep and deadly nature, sabres were handed to the combatants. It is not stated whether these were the ugly German curved, ill-balanced articles used by the cavalry or French weapons, but they had been well sharpened on both edge and false edge and point and the "blondie minded" duellists set to with a mighty clatter and clink of steel. They were out for blood and seven fierce attacks took place before Dr. Vatteone got a good one in the right upper arm disabling his sword hand. This put an end to the conflict (unfortunately the cinematograph operators had not put in an appearance) and the parties left the ground, apparently unreconciled so the benefit of the affair is not apparent, but the seconds highly lauded the "correct and gentlemanly" conduct of both principals throughout. Thus do we conduct politics, respect the laws and guarantee that "honour" shall remain stainless. Aha!

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN

Wednesday's Concert

As a glance at the Port Directory will show, there are not many ships in port at present, and the audience at the Seamen's Mission Concert was rather smaller than usual. It thoroughly enjoyed, however, a very good concert which had been arranged by Mrs. A. H. Forrester, with the following programme:—

Part 1.

Piano solo, Professor Alfred Mistowski.

Song, "Melisande in the Wood," Mr. F. Phillips.

Song, "Red Sun," Miss Maude Clutterbuck.

Flute solo, Mr. W. Fraser.

Song, "Till the Boys Come Home," the Misses Ala.

Song, "A Perfect Day," Mrs. A. H. Forrester and Dorothy Davies.

Comis song, Mr. W. Thompson.

Part 2.

Song, "Off the Philadelphia," Mr. Frank Phillips.

Song, "Sister Susie's Sewing Socks for Soldiers," Misses Ala and D. Davies.

Piano solo, Professor Mistowski.

Song, "Absent," Mrs. A. H. Forrester.

Flute solo, Mr. Wm. Fraser.

Song, "Life has sent me many roses," Miss M. Clutterbuck.

Comic Song, "The Ghost of the Violin" and "The Midnight Chu Chu," Mr. Wm. Thompson.

To have a musician of Professor Mistowski's calibre at the Mission is a great treat and an unusual one. The other turns were all excellent, Miss Clutterbuck and Mrs. Forrester rendered their songs sympathetically and well. Mr. Fraser's flute solos were a pleasing intermission in the vocal music, and Mr. Frank Phillips gave a so-called make-up was truly awful. He "The Ghost of the Violin" Mr. Thompson's snake-up was truly awful. He looked, as Mark Twain said, "not only as if he was dead, but a good deal more than that."

Auld Lang Syne and God Save the King, as usual, brought down the curtain.

POPULAR MUSIC

OPEN AIR CONCERTS.

Throughout the city there will be in the course of a few days a series of open-air concerts given in the various plazas by municipal and public bands. On Friday bands will play in the Plaza Pueyrredon, on Wednesday in Belgrano. Three times a week another band will play in the Diagonal Roque Saenz Peña. In the Plaza Castelli, in Belgrano, the police band are to give a series of musical evenings. Bands will continue daily in the Zoological Gardens, with special concerts on Sun days. In the Lezama Park, in Plaza Constitucion and in other convenient places, this evening music will be developed.

MISS ADELA VERNE

RETURNING TO BUENOS AIRES.

Miss Adela Verne has decided not to journey to Brazil after the completion of her series of recitals in Montevideo. She will return to Buenos Aires and give three final recitals during the second half of this month, and then proceed direct to Europe. Her appearances in Montevideo, the last of which will be on Friday evening, have been extremely successful.

GERMAN PRISONERS

ASSISTANCE TO BE GIVEN BY CHARITABLE LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

Several ladies and gentlemen in the Capital have determined upon a course of action to make brighter the lot of German prisoners interned at Martin Garcia. These are the imprisoned crews of the captured Cap Trafalgar and number 290 sailors and 30 officers. On Dec. 16 a performance of some nature will take place, the funds raised going to ameliorate the conditions of the prisoners.

THE CASE OF THE "PRESIDENTE MITRE"

FRIDAY, December 3, 1915.

There is a marked tendency on the part of some of the Argentine journals to change ground on the question of the seizure of the German ship "Presidente Mitre," and to ally themselves with the strident and bellicose press. This is an unfortunate but not surprising thing, because newspapers, like individuals, can be affected by public clamour and excitement, and are prone to abandon under great pressure, the correct attitude which they may originally have adopted. With this result, however, we cannot complain. If the Argentine newspapers have forgotten that their first demand on their public was that it should remain cool, and allow the proper authorities to judge the case, and if they now feel that the case is sufficiently clear for them to pronounce judgment themselves on its merits, then though we may not commend their wisdom, nor admire their consistency, we cannot reasonably blame them for being most pronounced and emphatic. We still adhere to our former opinion that in this affair, upon which we know sinister influences are at work, it is wise to suspend judgment and not to militate by any hasty or over-emphatic expressions of what are, after all, merely private opinions, against the most calm and reasonable consideration of the case by the proper authorities. So far as we can see nobody outside of the Argentine Government, and the responsible diplomatic officials, has anything definite upon which to form a judgment of the merits of the case. It is known that the matter has been taken up by the National Government, but whether it has been decided by the Argentine law officers that the seizure is illegal, and upon that decision a vigorous protest, accompanied by a demand for the release of the vessel, has been lodged with the British Government, or whether the usual diplomatic course of asking for an explanation has been followed, nobody can say.

At the moment of writing it is not publicly known whether the British Government has expressed any opinion, offered any explanation, or called for any report on the matter. Neither does anyone know precisely on what grounds the British Admiralty has acted, though there is a suggestion in one newspaper that the Argentine Minister for Foreign Affairs has for some time been in possession of the grounds upon which the British Government would act, should the opportunity to do so present itself. Obviously, therefore, in the absence of the information absolutely essential to the formation of a quick and accurate judgment, it is impolitic to treat the case as though everything were plainly decipherable and ready for decision. We may believe, and we do emphatically believe, that what has been done has resulted from quiet deliberation on the part of the British Government, with full regard to all possible considerations, and in strict conformity with Britain's belligerent rights. But that after all is only an opinion, necessarily liable to change at any moment upon the presentation of indisputable facts contrary to such a view. It would be wrong we believe to attempt to force that opinion with violent language and in forcing it to risk doing irreparable damage. The same considerations we think should actuate those who may hold quite contrary opinions on the merits of the case, so far as these merits are known or understood.

As the matter stands it is open to much misunderstanding and to the adoption of false premises which may collapse and bring down with them judgments hastily based upon them. We recognise that in such a matter it is very difficult to refrain from forming hasty judgments. Public opinion invariably judges quickly, and very frequently wrongly. To avoid a great deal of mischief it is well that the public should be placed in possession of the whole of the facts as soon as possible. In this direction of course, the Argentine Government must act first, and respectfully we submit it should act promptly. So far as is known it has done so. It has opened negotiations with London, presumably by asking for an explanation. This will be, or should be forthcoming at once. Britain generally acts deliberately, and gives reasons for her actions frankly and freely to those who have the right to know them. In this case we believe Britain's highest traditions will be well maintained. She will not leave Argentina in doubt for a moment. If a mistake has been committed—a remote possibility—Britain will admit it. If the action of the commander of the cruiser is upheld, then the Argentine Government will be free to take whatever action it deems compatible with its interests, and Britain will act in a similar manner. She will certainly act as far as possible with the greatest consideration and respect for Argentina's views, provided regard for them is not inimical to her own vital interests. To act otherwise no one can fairly ask her. Until this moment arrives, however, we think it is unwise of any party to attempt to prejudge the case, and certainly it is grossly wrong to endeavour to influence public opinion one way or the other.

THE DECLARATION OF PORTUGAL

SATURDAY, December 4, 1915.

More than once it has been asserted by prominent citizens of non-belligerent countries, that in this war there can be no neutrality of thought, and there should be none of deed. The truth of the first part of this assertion is so apparent that it hardly requires argument to demonstrate it. Every man who thinks about this war is either a pro-German or a pro-Ally. It is a mental impossibility for him to be neutral in thought, because he is forced to decide whether he believes the Allies to be right, or whether they are wrong, and his sympathy follows his decision. Many deep thinkers, men of prominence in what are called the neutral countries, have gone further and asserted that there should be no neutrality in deed. Mr. Roosevelt, for instance, has laid it down that it is morally and politically wrong for the United States to be neutral, because the issues involved in this world war are so tremendous that they embrace the very existence of civilisation. His opinion is that the Tenthic alliance is a menace to that civilisation, and is an international wrong-doer, and that consequently the United States, as an upholder of civilisation and international law, must perforce join with those who are fighting what Mr. Roosevelt thinks should be regarded as the common enemy.

This view is quite in keeping with the views of the thinkers among the Allied peoples who claim that those who understand the issues cannot be neutral in thought or word, and should not be neutral in act. Even Germany appears to hold the same view on the question of neutrality, but it is arrived at by a different process of reasoning. Germany argues blindly that he who is not a friend in act is a foe, and therefore not to be considered in the trampling down process by means of which German culture, German militarism, and German imperialism are to be forced upon the world. Up to the moment Germany has done her best to destroy neutrality either by force or by purchase and corruption. The Allies, except perhaps in the case of Greece, where a measure of compulsion was applied to a government notoriously alien in spirit and sentiment to the national ideals, has relied solely upon neutrals recognising the justice of the cause of the Allies, and joining them of their own free will.

We believe that this war has still so far to run before the great issues are finally solved, that long before it is over, we shall see more countries involved on one side or the other. We publish to-day a striking declaration by the newly elected President of the Portuguese Ministerial Council, Dr. Costa, in which he practically commits the nation to action on the side of the Allies. "The Republic," he said, "would lend itself to winning victory for right and justice for which Britain and her Allies are fighting." At such a declaration Germany no doubt will scoff. Portugal is a small country, particularly in a military sense, and it is only greatness in a brutal way, that impresses Germany. But Portugal's declaration is the writing on the wall. A bold and brave lead given by a little nation, may well be followed by the powerful neutrals, especially when it tangibly represents the growing spirit of almost universal detestation in which Germany and her methods are held.

As usual, Germany is doing her best to make fresh enemies, or cow the smaller nations into subservience to her will. Coincident with the cablegram that Portugal has declared openly her belief in the right and justice of the Allied cause, comes a message that Germany is tyrannically demanding that Holland shall withdraw her troops from the frontiers, where they have been ever since war broke out as guardians of the integrity and neutrality of that country. Holland has refused the demand, which we are told "is now being pressed with greater insistence." This means that Holland must either give way, or must fight. If fight she must, or see herself bond slave of the Prussian bully, what will the neutrals do about it? Is it possible that they can still stand by and see another of the small nations, which they collectively are pledged to defend, wiped out of existence, or reduced to a state of vassalage? We think not. The time is fast approaching when there will be but two classifications of nations—those who are fighting Germany, and those who are fighting for her. It is hardly conceivable, unless Germany is fairly speedily beaten by the Powers now at grips with her, that such a thing as neutrality can continue to exist.

THE OUTLAW OF CIVILIZATION

SUNDAY, December 5, 1915.

When the history of the present war is written, and the chapters relating to the observance or non-observance of all the codes, moral, legal, military or otherwise, are perused, it will be found that the historian has rightly attributed to Germany the infraction of all. It will also be realised that underlying all the criminal actions of the enemy of civilisation is the detestable doctrine that the end justifies the means. Not to the Jesuits, but to the Germans, will this phrase be attached as the guiding principle of rascality, and the justification for its application will be found, not alone in the actions of Germany, but in her self-confessed creed expressed in the terms that anything and everything is justified by the necessities of war.

It would be difficult to imagine any other country of the many now at war stooping to such practices as those of which German diplomats have been proved guilty in the United States. There it appears to have been the accepted thing for the highest servants of the German nation to instigate murder and arson in divers forms, under the cloak of patriotic zeal for Germany's cause. In a neutral country these people have planned deliberately to dynamite factories, to blow up ships, to promote strikes, and in other ways to dislocate and disorganise industries, quite reckless of consequences. This is not mere fulmination against the enemy. It is well-proven fact, revealed without the shadow of a doubt by the closest judicial investigation of evidence, all tending to demonstrate that Germany is blind to anything but her own selfish and cowardly interests.

In the conspiracy the highest officials are implicated, not merely as accessories before or after the fact, but as the actual instigators and financiers, acting directly under instructions from their government. Such testimony as has been disclosed in the trial of the Hamburg-American shipping company officials leaves no doubt as to the hollowness of German protestations of friendship for America, and of regard for the integrity of neutral nations. What effect the disclosures will have on the attitude of the United States towards the criminal government responsible for such gross violations of international decency and honour, it is difficult to say, but there can be no doubt about the effect on American sentiment. A nation justifiably resents any affront to its dignity, when that indignity takes the form of direct and offensive action, but ten times more justified is it in resenting trickery and treachery by the emissaries of a foreign power operating within its own borders and covering their criminal actions under the cloak of friendship.

What has transpired in the United States is, we feel sure, quite on a par with the despicable tactics of Germany wherever she is represented. In her dealings with other nations there is no fairness; no honour. She does not understand the meaning of the two words, but civilisation does. She is quite incapable of a straight fair fight, and it is obviously futile to expect her to "play the game." Some critics of her conduct speak of her "bungling" methods. To some extent they are right in their description, but they do Germany too much justice in attributing her breaches of all law to mistakes of policy. The policy is deliberate. It is designedly wicked, and it is mistaken only in so far as it must inevitably lead to complete failure. The very elements of plotting or conspiracy are coolness and deliberation. In the cases of the criminal attempts made by German officials in the United States, not only to violate the neutrality of that country, but to destroy lives and property, there is too much evidence of malice aforethought to permit of the excuse of mistaken zeal being effectively set up. Germany is an apostate from civilisation, a renegade and an outlaw, and the sooner the neutrals recognise the fact, and help rid the world of the outlaw, the better for them and for all ideals for which they as nations profess to stand.

THE ALLIES' GRAND COUNCIL OF WAR

TUESDAY, December 7, 1915.

It has taken the governments of the Allied countries a long time to recognise the indispensability of a common plan of campaign against the enemy, and the British press critics have helped to bring about that recognition, though probably they will never get the credit for having played any part in the formation of the Grand War Council which from now on is to direct affairs. According to to-day's cablegrams the Council has been organized and its deliberations in Paris are being presided over by General Joffre, accredited with being the most brilliant strategist of all the Allied generals.

Why such a Council was not formed many months ago is one of the mysteries which the thinking man, not endowed with the rank of expert, has never been able to fathom. In fact, to judge by the remarks of some people, it was little less than a crime for him to think of it at all. But think of it he did, because he could not help seeing the obvious necessity for it, even though the various governments regarded the question with the utmost indifference. However, considerable changes have taken place in public opinion and government politics during the last month or two, and the formation of a council, or as it might more properly be called in a military sense, an Allied Great General Staff, is one of the most important and valuable of the changes. From now on the war is not we hope to be conducted as though it consisted of several wars, each independent in cause and consequence of the other.

This is what must have happened in the past. Obviously there could never have been proper coordination of effort, and cohesion of strategic ideas, or there would not now exist the necessity for the formation of the Grand War Council. It may not be correct to say that each war department or generalissimo of each of the Allies acted entirely without regard to the common needs, but clearly there could never have existed a well-organized common plan under which every move in every theatre of the war was directed by a common strategic purpose. That this was not possible in the very early stages of the war is perfectly understandable. There was too much haste and feverish preparation; too great an urgency to fight quickly, and in a sense, anyhow, to permit of the quiet deliberation by all the commanders of a common plan of campaign, and in this respect again Germany had an enormous advantage, which has never been fully realised. She came into the war with all her plans prepared, and with complete understanding between herself and Austria, the latter subordinating herself to Germany in the matter of military control. Nevertheless the Allies have been extraordinarily slow in making good the serious defect under which they laboured by reason of their geographical separation, their differences of language, of military systems, of strategical ideas and tactical training.

To overcome these difficulties and to blend and harmonise these differences, in order that the Allies might fight in perfect unison, as one great army, under a simplified and authoritative direction, was, and is, admittedly an undertaking of great magnitude. But its very magnitude, and certainly its absolute necessity, if a common victory were to be achieved, made it all the more urgent that it should be tackled as early and as expeditiously as possible. It is only now, after 16 months of war, that the Allies as a whole appear to have set about solving the problem. Well, better late than never. It is to be hoped that a real understanding of the problem now animates all the Allies, and that their military chiefs are quite in accord as to the urgency of formulating common plans. Of the doings and decisions of the Grand Council we do not expect to hear much, because necessarily its proceedings will be and should be strictly secret. But of its achievements we may reasonably hope to see tangible evidence at an early date.

THE DOMINIONS AND THE WAR

WEDNESDAY, December 8, 1915.

Time and again the remarkable solidarity of the British Empire has been emphasised by the cablegrams relative to recruiting operations in the British oversea dominions. So responsive have been the great self-governing branches of the Empire to the call of the Motherland, and so unselfishly have they given of their scores and scores of thousands of sons, that more than once mystified Germany has flung it forth as a taunt against Britain that not she, but her colonies are fighting this war for her. The statement is on a par with most of the assertions of Germany, but nevertheless it is interesting as indicating the deep impression which the springing to arms of the British dominions has created in the German mind. Doubtless also the whole world has been impressed with the strength of the ties which bind the British Empire, and the visible proof which is afforded of the genius of the English for imperial expansion.

It is almost impossible to say precisely to what extent the Dominions have recruited fighters for the Empire's cause. Recent figures gave the total from Australia at something like 300,000, and according to the present rate of recruiting in the big centres of the Commonwealth, this total cannot be an exaggerated one. Australian casualties at the Dardanelles have alone reached the great total of nearly fifty thousand, or almost as many as the total losses of the entire British forces in the South African war. New Zealand has proportionately raised even more men than Australia, and the total now cannot be far short of ninety thousand.

The figures we had from Canada the other day showed that that Dominion had raised a quarter of a million, and had another fifty thousand under training. South Africa, has of course, fought a big war entirely alone, and now is prepared to settle conclusions with the enemy in East Africa, the number of men offering for this campaign being greater than that considered necessary. In addition the Union has sent strong contingents to Europe.

Practically every colony or possession of the British Empire has yielded its organized quota of trained men, quite apart from the many thousands who have found their way singly to the fighting fronts. If we could get the exact figures, and marshal them, we should probably find that the Empire, outside of the United Kingdom, has provided Britain with at least a quarter of the total number of the men who are bearing her arms and fighting her cause. It would be foolish and mischievous to make comparisons, as some people have endeavoured to do between the efforts of the Motherland and those of her daughters. It is a source of pride to every Briton, be he born in the United Kingdom, or born in the Dominions or colonies, that every part of the great empire has recognised its duty, and has fulfilled it to the utmost of the call made upon it. The limit of effort has by no means been reached, and it is the recognition of this fact that gives the British people so much confidence.

When people speak of a long and exhausting war they understand full well that Britain can make such an effort that must paralyse all enemy effort, and that with her Empire solidly behind her Britain, best of all the nations, can stand the process of exhaustion, because she has the greater resources in men, money and material. When we hear people speak of all Britain has done, we think of all she can yet do, without an undue strain upon her strength, and it is because we recognise her tremendous power, that we sometimes get impatient that it is not utilised as rapidly and as fully as it should be. At this moment when there is talk of peace we believe those who have entrusted to them the direction of the affairs of the Empire should throw still further resources into the scale. The dominions are ready to do so, and so we believe is the United Kingdom. We cannot see that the announcement of the number of men Britain has under arms can help the enemy in any way. On the other hand we believe that were that number doubled, or trebled, as we believe it could be, the effect of such a further display of strength flung in the face of an enemy that only understands this kind of argument, would be most inimical to the enemy's cause.

THE CAMPAIGN IN MESOPOTAMIA

THURSDAY, December 9, 1915.

By the receipt of rather unpleasant news concerning the fortunes of the Bagdad expedition the British public are reminded sharply that in an almost forgotten arena, the Nation has on its hands a war of considerable importance. Little or no attention was paid to the operations of General Townshend's army while it was making steady progress into the heart of Asiatic Turkey from the head of the Persian Gulf, and it was only by an occasional reference to it in the cablegrams and official British dispatches that we knew such an expedition was afoot. Yet in normal times the operations of the British forces in Mesopotamia would have constituted a war of all-absorbing interest.

In the absence of specific information regarding this particular campaign it is scarcely possible to say whether or not it has been wisely conducted, but apparently those in England, who are well informed, are under the impression that grave mistakes have been made and the expedition is in serious danger. Up to a certain point, so far as our information goes, nothing but success attended the operations. Assisted by gunboats, and naval forces in some strength, General Townshend experienced no serious difficulties in forcing a passage for a considerable distance up the rivers. Several glowing accounts were received of the capture of enemy river ships, and forts, and the putting to flight of substantial numbers of land forces. But like many a similar expedition that of General Townshend appears to have advanced too far, and to have attempted more than was possible with its small forces.

This appears to be the gist of the criticism of the London press and certain parliamentarians, who have pointed out the great foolhardiness of having attempted to penetrate to Bagdad with a single division of troops, across 600 miles of dry country, in the face of an enemy whose numbers and material strength must increase the further back he is attacked. Lord Crewe has, however, asserted that General Townshend had more than a division of troops, and in any case his forces were considered sufficient to accomplish the object he had in view—the capture of Bagdad, an operation which was felt to be particularly desirable both from a political and a military point of view. The Government appears to have accepted full responsibility for the campaign, and does not seem much disconcerted by the failure of the operations. Lord Crewe has also paid a high and doubtless well deserved tribute to the skill with which the commander of the expedition extricated his forces, in the face of superior numbers, from a perilous position.

As we have said, we are in no position to judge of the military aspect of the campaign in Mesopotamia, but it certainly appears that the Government has all along taken an unwarrantedly casual view of the importance of the operation. It looks to us as though in this case, as in the cases of the Dardanelles and the Balkans, the campaign was entered upon without full consideration, and under the delusion—still prevailing in many quarters—that the enemy, whether Turk or German, is hopelessly beaten and demoralised. In a war of this magnitude and with such issues involved, nothing can be taken for granted. Naturally no one would expect the Government to employ in a certain enterprise more than the necessary number of men to make success reasonably sure, but, if we may be permitted to be critical after the event, it looks as though the employment of a small force, even of two divisions, for such an undertaking as the capture of Bagdad was rather risky.

We are afraid that not yet have either the Government or the people recognised the real nature of Germany's designs in the East, or if they have done so, then they are still under the delusion that Germany and her allies are so badly embarrassed that those designs cannot be attempted, let alone carried out. It may make very nice reading to say that every idea of German aggression has gone entirely wrong, and that all danger is past, but unfortunately such statements do not rhyme with the facts. The danger of serious developments in the East is still present, and the setback to General Townshend's expedition has certainly not lessened that danger. In this connection it strikes us as distinctly unfortunate that Lord Kitchener did not remain in Athens, and retain direct and unfettered control of the whole war in the East. He at any rate cannot be blind to the real intentions of Germany, and if trouble in Egypt and on the Indian frontier are to be avoided by action from London, that action will be dictated by Kitchener!

Public Opinion as expressed in the Argentine Press.

THE BLOCKADE OF THE PLATE

(La Prensa—Dec. 2.)

From the outset, remarks La Prensa, it has stated that, in its opinion, the best method of dealing with the case of the captured steamer is to negotiate directly with the British Foreign Office, and in this belief all the leading organs of public opinion concur, it being inconceivable that the British Government is likely to uphold the unfair and violent action of its agents in the River Plate, whilst few people suppose that Argentina's just claims will go unheeded. The friendly relations of this country with Great Britain are founded on solemn treaties to which both nations are signatory, and if the British agents in the River Plate have violated them, then the English, as champions of the liberty of universal trade, will see that due reparation is made. Britain's relations with other neutral countries do not rest on the same foundation; there are other agreements in force, and therefore different diplomatic procedure is called for.

It has been suggested that the United States should be consulted concerning the case of the Presidente Mitre, but La Prensa maintains that there are diplomatic reasons why this should not be done, despite American solidarity. First and foremost, this country stands in a more favourable position towards Great Britain than does the United States. Argentina does not look on the advent of British capital as a favour, but rather as a reciprocal advantage. A large proportion of the population of Great Britain lives, so La Prensa states, on rent derived from Argentine affairs to the tune of $150,000,000 gold dollars exported in payment thereof more or less year by year, owing to the fact that the beneficiaries are not domiciled here.

Now the United States are every day becoming keener commercial rivals of Great Britain, engaged in a colossal maritime war destined to sweep German commerce from the seas. Hence, says La Prensa, the attack on Argentine coastal trade. At the same time, it cannot be maintained, continues La Prensa, that Britain, given over to the production of war material, is able to replace German exports, whereas the United States are able to do so. The sovereign becomes the vassal of the dollar, and this situation has led to the difficulties between the two great nations that ended in the flotation of the Allies' loan in New York. The Americans have treated the Allies as a banker treats an old and valued client who is in difficulties, says the writer in La Prensa, by restricting their credit and raising the rate of interest. As a matter of fact, he continues, the Allies sought a thousand million dollars and were given but half the amount, and despite the rate for the money in good times being $\frac{3}{4}$ to 2 %, the American bankers charged 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ %, interest and charges, at the same time refusing to pay over cash, preferring to open current accounts for the Allies, thus collecting the cost of their orders in advance. According to La Prensa, these things have had a very bad effect in Great Britain, and this has been accentuated by the United States claims on behalf of their maritime trade.

Hence it is inadvisable for Argentina to involve its affairs with those of another nation, and this is the reason why La Prensa argues in favour of a direct defence of the interests of the Republic. Nor is the suggestion to call together the neutral nations in order to form a coalition any happier. Indeed, it does not require discussion, being outside the sphere of practical politics; whilst difficulties are smoothed over, the war will come to an end, and if it does not, then the belligerents will say that this is no time to theorise, declaring international principles non-existent until such time as they have satisfied their military requirements. The base of Argentina's demand for consideration is, says La Prensa, as unshakeable as the errors of the British naval and diplomatic authorities in the River Plate are crass, and on a future occasion it promises to elucidate the error of relying on a treaty of 1825 whilst forgetting various subsequent agreements that, unlike the former, are still in force.

REGULATING THE ENTRY OF IMMIGRANTS

(La Prensa—December 3.)

The Minister of the Interior has met to exchange ideas with the President of the Republic relative to a proposed law destined to check the entry into this Republic of depraved or worthless characters who come hither intermingled with the crowd of useful and laborious immigrants whose presence is ever welcome. This, says La Prensa, is pleasing news, and one is glad that the Government is about to take the matter up seriously, given its importance for the future of the country. For whilst the immigration returns go up, it is equally true that the crimes list increases comparatively, many convictions being directly chargeable to new-comers, a proof of the assertion that there is an indetermined, but none the less certain, relation between convictions and the advent of foreigners.

La Prensa has always followed this problem with attention and not so very long ago published a series of articles in which the matter was thoroughly thrashed out. Therein the basic ideas ruling over the selection of immigrants were clearly laid down, not only as regards the preservation of order but also in so far as the general composition of the nation was concerned. The incorporation of an excessive number of inferior individuals lowers the tone of the whole population, hence the problem, viewed from a statesman's standpoint, means something more than mere police action such as hitherto has been the chief criterion of the authorities. It is a very complex matter, continues La Prensa, and from the outset a difference must be made between the so-called "Social Defence" Laws, and the regulations designed to promote a selected immigration. The latter ought rather to be extensive in character, tending to the exclusion not only of the criminal classes but also towards the diminution of the idle and useless element among the would-be immigrants. These characters are not what the country wants, and an application of the two-years provisional residence rule, so often urged by La Prensa, would, in the opinion of that journal, go far to remedy the evil.

THE CASE OF THE PRESIDENTE MITRE

(La Nación—December 3.)

Dealing anew with the theme of the day La Nación rightly praises the dignified manner in which the details of the whole affair have been received by the Argentine nation, considered as a whole. There are, as it says, certain Jingoists who, not content with the fact that Argentina's international horizon is absolutely cloudless, would try and make unnecessary ill-feeling over an incident that is quite within the ability of diplomacy to settle without needless fuss. Such people, disregarding the fact that the fons et origo mali lies in the derogation of Art. 57 of the Declaration of

THE HYGIENE OF THE HOME

(La Prensa—December 4.)

It is well known, says La Prensa, that in most of the rentable houses in Buenos Aires, the inner rooms are almost perpetually gloomy and characterised by the odour of vitiated air to which the tenant eventually becomes accustomed, due to the fact that the architects do little or nothing to plan for light and ventilation when taking out their drawings, preferring to make the most of every inch of ground space available even at the sacrifice of hygienic principles. At the same time La Prensa admits that among most classes here, false ideas still rule as to the ventilation of rooms, which probably accounts for the fact that year after year houses that are insufficiently lighted and badly ventilated continue to be built, many of them with rooms that never get direct light at any season of the year.

So be it, remarks La Prensa; the Municipal authorities sanction that sort of thing, leaving the health of the home absolutely at the mercy of the architect, the speculator in ground values, and the contractor, without however losing sight for a moment of the heavy taxes that weigh upon building and that are one of the causes which postpone the solution of the problem of cheap and healthy dwellings. Apparently the Municipal point of view is that this is a source of income which cannot be done without, and there the matter is left. On the contrary, there is a means whereby the problem might be solved almost at once. Congress might pass laws dealing with urban hygiene as summary as were the decrees that solved what is ever the greatest urban problem, namely the water supply; laws that would tend to act as a defence against tuberculosis by hygienising the dwellings of the people, both rich and poor. It is regrettable that special laws have not been passed in this country to meet special circumstances dealing with hygienic problems as they arise, but in the meantime, seeing that the actual state of affairs has gone on too long, the most practical thing would be to draft a comprehensive measure to be brought up next year, determining on the broadest of lines the official conception of healthy dwellings, and including, as a matter of course, the question of open spaces, street areas, and so forth. Concluding, La Prensa remarks that the Intendente ought to bear in mind that when the curve of tuberculosis goes up in any locality, the curve of hygiene goes down, and vice-versa.

London, a reactionary step as La Nación has already pointed out, try to make a case out of the third clause of an agreement signed by Great Britain and Argentina at the second Hague Conference whereby it was agreed not to subject to capture small local craft or coastal fishing boats.

Capital is also sought to be made out of the fact that the Argentine flag was lowered, whilst, as La Nación justly points out, the captors of the Presidente Mitre, considering the vessel to be German and therefore not rightly entitled to fly the said flag, cannot be said to have inflicted the slightest insult on the national colours, which were moreover a mere indication of the vessel's registry and not to be classed with the official ensign as flown on a government vessel, a fortress, a legation, or a consulate. Fortunately the majority of the Argentine people do not side with the Jingoists, and they have reason to believe that the British Government, misinformed, will submit the whole affair to arbitration, which, if the steamer is not returned at once, would doubtless be the best course to pursue, and in accordance with the indications given by Lord Lansdowne in his recent speech.

THE PRISON PROBLEM

(La Nación—December 4.)

In a carefully detailed report which has just been published the Minister of Justice proposes various far-reaching reforms in regard to the prisons, both in the territories and the Federal Capital. The measures suggested are not meant to be in the nature of panaceas, nor even definite solutions of the many problems connected with prison reform. But they do claim to be practical measures remedying the worst evils complained of, and that without further delay. Which, as La Nación rightly observes, is what is wanted at the present moment. Suggestions and projects abound, not to mention laws that have been sanctioned and even half carried into practice. Dr. Saavedra Lamas might easily have taken up some of these measures on the lines of a doctoral thesis, but he has preferred to tackle the subject in a practical manner. Now is not the time to discuss important works nor to lay down vast schemes for posterity.

The present report shows that the internal discipline of the prisons, by enabling the prisoners to work on behalf of the authorities, plus a reorganisation of the methods of justice in order to prevent a glut of persons awaiting trial, is the base of actual reform. In so far as the territorial gaols are concerned, reconstruction and amplification of the existing buildings will perforce take time, since the prison authorities must to a large extent depend on their own resources. Hence progress will be slow, but sure, though all the time working towards the ideal so frequently mentioned and so seldom seen, namely "that the prisons shall be healthy and clean, for the safety and not for the punishment of the prisoners confined therein."

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFLICT

(La Prensa—December 6.)

Step by step, says La Prensa, it has followed the facts relative to the deplorable arrest of the s.s. Presidente Mitre, but in view of the parliamentary interpellation arranged for on Monday, it believes it to be its duty to pause for a moment in its study of the legal side of this affair, leaving the arena clear for the foreign office and the national authorities to make plain their ideas both here and abroad. As regards the manner in which the minute of interpellation will be answered La Prensa states that it has no definite information, but however the affair may be handled, Monday's session ought to throw a clear light on the business for the public guidance. The day following ought to enable a more mature judgment to be formed concerning the actuation of the Argentine chancellery, anent which Argentine public opinion serenely yet expectantly waits a decision.

It is the duty of La Prensa to repeat that its intention is to carry the investigation to a conclusion in so far as law and the rights of the nation are concerned, without in any way shirking responsibility for so doing, however heavy such responsibility may be, thereby following out its unchangeable programme of serving the public interest. The subject, continues La Prensa, is being handled by the paper, and all attempts to particularise its remarks as being the production of one or more individuals is vulgar and inopportune. For the rest La Prensa intends to help in so far as it is able towards the elucidation of the case that has arisen, believing that timely parliamentary initiative of the illustrious deputy for the Federal Capital, Dr. Zeballos, and the reply of the Government will convince the country that Argentina's cause is in good hands and will be carried to a conclusion at once decorous and satisfactory.

POPULAR THRIFT

(La Nación.—December 6).

France, declares La Nación, has given yet another fine proof of her high spirit as well as of the thrift and foresight of her people. After bearing the strain of a colossal war for a year and a half she has covered at short notice an enormous internal loan to which all classes of society have subscribed from their ordinary savings. French thrift is proverbial, but the recent example beats all previous records and serves as an incentive to imitate similar virtue. Argentines are undoubtedly one of the most striking examples of the opposite, says La Nación. Living in the midst of plenty, even the present crisis has not been sufficient to bring us to a sense of the truth, which is in plain language that the nation spends too much and saves too little. A little more foresight and the present state of affairs would have been beneficial rather than prejudicial to this country.

The strange thing is, continues La Nación, that despite the large proportion of European blood in the country, the second generation of immigrant parentage gives up all pretence of thrift. The son of a thrifty man, far from following father's footsteps, usually lives from day to day and takes no thought whatsoever for the future. Hence from generation to generation virtues that would place the country in an enviable condition are discarded. Moreover together with the lack of thrift one has the vice of gambling. Races and the lottery constitute two of the most pernicious ills, swallowing millions and millions of dollars annually. True that thanks to the ease of living the deposit accounts of the various banks show steady increases, but this does but strengthen the argument, since the actual number of depositors is few and confined to a certain class. The proof of this statement lies in the small success that has attended various institutions destined to receive small economies, and until thrift is implanted from infancy no benefits will accrue. The example of France ought to show us, concludes La Nación, that thrift, whilst highly beneficial to the individual, may at need prove to be at one and the same time the salvation of the nation.

A GOOD EXAMPLE

(La Nación.—December 7).

Prior to deciding a certain lawsuit relative to trade-marks, the Federal chamber, realising the full significance of the affair, believed that it was possible to reach an amicable arrangement on the basis of reciprocal advantages. With this intention in view, remarks La Nación, an audience for both parties to the case was appointed at which the matters in dispute were discussed, and the suit ended. Owing to an easily comprehensible error regarding the judicial mission, the judges in almost every case are not in favour of adopting preliminary conciliatory measures, forgetting that justice does not mean merely recognising the right, but is also intended to prevent the perpetuation of lengthy and contentious litigation.

It is on this account, La Nación continues, that the laws give facilities to the judges to call both parties together in order that cases may be arranged if such is possible, and it is strange that similar settlements to that remarked upon are not more frequent. There are many cases running their course in which blind passion is the only reason for preventing the parties from coming to an understanding. When justice does its best to act as a conciliatory force it will fulfil its real social duties, and this, concludes La Nación is so important a task that it ought to be always in the forefront of the courts when cases are to be decided.

INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVES

(La Prensa.—December 7).

Dealing with the case of the Presidente Mitre and the general position of the neutral nations in the war, La Prensa, whilst admitting that every nation must look to its own interests, declares that it sees nothing to lead it to alter its opinion concerning the special position of Argentina in the present instance; a position that can only be dealt with by means of direct Anglo-Argentine diplomatic negotiations. This is a case that lies outside the regular rules, and the suggestion of a diplomatic coalition of the nations on the American continent, however admirable may be the motives whereby it is inspired. It is, says La Prensa, patently wrong to class the arrest of American vessels and the capture of the Presidente Mitre as though they were facts on an equal footing. Substantial legal and diplomatic differences exist calling for an entirely different judgment in the two cases.

On the outbreak of war many merchant ships belonging to the belligerents lay in United States ports where they were bought by capitalists belonging to that country and placed under the American flag. Great Britain refused to recognise the transfer as valid; in other words ships and cargo remained German in the eyes of the British Government. Protests were lodged by Washington in the case of such ships as were captured, but the British policy of annihilating the enemy economically continues, thanks to its preponderant force afloat.

The case of the President Mitre is in no way parallel. This steamer did not hoist the Argentine flag after the war; the right to use it was granted long years ere the war was thought of. Hence La Prensa maintains that it is as clear as daylight that the British policy applied to boats that have taken refuge in neutral ports does not hold in the case in question. Hence the Argentine plea must differ radically from that advanced by the United States. Hence care should be taken not to lose the advantage that this singular aspect of the case presents. At the very least it is reasonable to wait for a reply from London to the Argentine claim. At present the public has no fixed data to go upon, and though this country confidently relies on receiving the satisfactory reparation that the British Government cannot deny to it, commonsense and patriotism alike point to the wisdom of suspending judgment until the aforesaid reply is forthcoming. Meanwhile says La Prensa, the matter must be looked at through Argentine eyes and for the present all thought of international coalitions should be discarded.

THE IMMIGRATORY MOVEMENT

(La Prensa.—December 8).

During the last two months, remarks La Prensa, the immigration statistics show a notable appreciation in the number of newcomers during October and November, namely 5,090 persons during the former and 6,223 during the latter period. All things considered, this increase is not to be despised, and is indeed distinctly favourable. Not that this increase means that we are about to see even a partial re-establishment of the normal current hither, not ought it to be so regarded, but nevertheless it is legitimate to look upon the figures as a proof that this country has not yet lost its charm for the foreign labourer.

Whilst the causes that led to a cessation of European emigration are likely, as La Prensa says, to last for some considerable time longer, with the natural consequences to this Republic, yet it is proved that even under these conditions the Republic can obtain some twelve thousand persons in a couple of months. They may be the two best months in the year as regards immigration prospects, but none the less it shows that in the minds of many people it is worth while to come here since the prospects are better than they can hope to see at home. The majority of the newcomers are Spaniards. In October came 3,310 and in November 4,412. Nearly all of them are old residents who left this country when the crisis began and now return to the home of their adoption. Italians numbered 877 and 967; Portuguese 100 and 178; Greeks were 106 and 4; French 99 and 87; British 99 and 64. There are also 224 Argentines in October and 158 in November; these La Prensa declares to be the children of former immigrants who accompanied their parents to the home land and now return.

There is no fear of a shortage of labour for the crops as some people have insinuated. Both here and among the foreign immigrants recently arrived there are many available for agricultural tasks, and the figures aforementioned deserved a brief note of comment proving as they do that despite all adverse circumstances the country preserves its regenerative forces intact.

LABOUR LEGISLATION

(La Nación.—December 8).

The increase in industrial activity, which has led to an extension of factories, formerly confined to the Federal Capital almost in their entirety, throughout the provinces, and especially in the Province of Buenos Aires, has also brought about the formation of workmen's quarters in their vicinity, and the whole position of labour in the provinces calls for governmental attention. Realising this, the Buenos Aires legislature has latterly been busy with various protective laws, which however have not, says La Nación, been actually put into execution. Many factories working in the province do not conform to the regulations governing the hours of labour, the age of the workers, or the hygienic conditions laid down by law, in some cases pretending ignorance, and in others, as has happened in the freezing works situated in La Plata port, alleging that they do not come under provincial jurisdiction.

These latter establishments have, says La Nación, shielded themselves under the statement that the port is national property, and therefore only governed by Congressional laws; in practice they comply with no laws at all. The long hours worked have led to various strikes, one lasting for an appreciable time and ending to the detriment of the workmen and without in any way modifying the labour conditions. In these self-same establishments, La Nación continues, there are many children employed below the standard age and at certain times of the year the Government schools are almost empty, since a large proportion of the scholars go to the works, induced thereto by exceptional wages. There are facts that the Buenos Aires provincial authorities ought to take into account, and an opportune intervention be held. The work of women and children has been regulated by a special law, based on the Congressional law, but as yet it has not been applied. If this inaction continues much longer the motives that led to the passing of the measure will be ineffective, which is to be lamented, especially seeing how important are the interests at stake.

EDITH CAVELL

Mr. James M. Beck, one of the leaders of the New York Bar and former Attorney General of the United States, has written a masterly article on "The Case of Edith Cavell." This work, by the author of "In the Supreme Court of Civilisation: the Dual Alliance v. the Triple Entente," is written in that calm judicial manner that has made Mr. Beck famous. It originally appeared in the New York Times, and is to be reprinted in The Herald. The opening instalment will appear tomorrow.

CONCORDIA NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

December 6.

Weather.

The days are quite warm, but latterly at night it is fresher than a fortnight ago. The wind occasionally is southerly, but often changes to the north. When in the latter direction, added to the strong rays of the sun, one's eyes are affected by the heat which seems to dry them. A hard rainfall would be a blessing. There is so much dust on the roads, and the ground is quite hard.

Cricket.

The match played in Monte Caseros on Nov. 28 between Monte Caseros A. C. and Mr. P. Kingsbury's XI. from Concordia resulted in a win for the homesters by 61 runs. Concordia were unable to field a strong team, several being prevented from making the trip on account of business. Concordia played fairly well. Their total at the wickets was 61. They did better in the field at the beginning, getting out five of the Monte Caseros best men for 11 runs. Ingleson, really a member of the Concordia team, played well for the homesters, making 54 runs. The match to be played on December 18 in Concordia between the new Victoria Athletic Club and Corrientes Camp has been postponed at the request of the Camp, as the date is inconvenient for them. A later date will be arranged.

Women's Association.

The arrangements for the fête to be held on the grounds of the Victoria Park, kindly lent for the occasion, are such that everything should be a success and help those deserving objects: the Edith Cavell Memorial Fund and the lighting arrangements in St. Thomas's Church. Many people from the provinces of Entre Rios and Corrientes have responded to the call for subscription or gifts for sale at the different stalls. As the fête will take place on Dec. 18, those who are desirous of helping should kindly forward all kinds of gifts (except perishable) on Dec. 17 to the Hon. Treasurer (Mrs. Kellard) or to the Hon. Secretary (Mrs. Neville). It is encouraging to be able to report that Mrs. R. H. F. Stuart, who has just returned from Buenos Aires, whilst in the Capital obtained many gifts for the fête. Those who can spare a day to come in to Concordia should do so to enjoy the fun.

VICE CONSULATE IN CONCORDIA

(To the Editor.)

"HERALD" CORRESPONDENT'S REPLY.

Sir.—In reply to your correspondent "Gabriel," whose letter on the above subject appeared in your issue of the 2nd inst.

In my report of the 26th ult. I referred neither to Mr. Oliver Budge nor to Mr. Herbert Robinson, but to Mr. T. M. Morley. The latter gentleman, after Mr. Robinson resigned, was duly authorised to carry on the duties of the Vice-Consulate in Concordia in the capacity of Acting Vice-Consul, and did so until the post was abolished.

"Gabriel" would do well to study his local history before rushing into print.

Yours, etc.

NEXT SUGAR CROPS

FAVOURABLE EXPECTATIONS.

Reports from the North of the Republic are highly favourable to the prospects of next sugar crop. A much larger area is under cultivation than was the case last year notwithstanding the heavy losses suffered by growers in the unlucky harvest preceding, which was many thousand tons less than the fine crop of 1914. This year, the plants look well: there has been plenty of rain, and throughout Tucuman and Salta the cane has developed exceptionally well. In both provinces the growers are highly pleased at the prospects, which so far are excellent.

HORSES FOR EUROPE

RENEWED ACTIVITY IN BUYING.

From information received yesterday, it appears that the agents of European Governments are again becoming very active in this country in search of horseflesh.

For some time buying has been very quiet, and the enormous stock of horses in England, France and Italy were considered sufficient for immediate reinforcements. Lately, however, horses in the war zone have been perishing in thousands.

Italy, France and England are reported to have purchased in all parts of the world hundreds of thousands of head of horses, and as this has been found to be insufficient, some idea of the mortality can be gathered.

THRESHING IN ENTRE RIOS

Some excellent reports are being received concerning the first results of the threshing operations in Entre Rios. In some departments along the banks of the Parana, a return of 20 to 22 quintales to the hectare is reported.

The wheat harvest is most favourably reported upon, and the action of the Agricultural Department in giving their attention and assistance to growers in these localities has been of considerable benefit and greatly appreciated.

OLD METALS

PROHIBITION OF EXPORTATION.

Complaints have been made that the Government edict forbidding the sale of old iron, old copper, and other metals for export is being persistently evaded. Good commissions are said to be paid to those who can arrange or connive at these sales. There has been a general belief that the prohibition referred to the Port of Buenos Aires only, and that shipments might be legally made from other ports, such as Corrientes or Concordia.

The transhipment of a cargo of old iron from Corrientes, in the North Basin has recently been reported, but it is not known what action, if any, the authorities have taken.

The Union Industrial Argentina is urging that the edict shall be widely circulated, and an end entirely put to the traffic in an article particularly useful to commerce.

WILSON'S WARNING

Immigration and the Monroe Doctrine

AMERICAN UNITY AND THE BRITISH FLEET

Great and all-embracing is the message of President Woodrow Wilson to the American nation, and from its salient clauses as transmitted hither by the cables it is easy to realise with what supreme interest it must have been heard by Congress, and read far and wide throughout the vast territory of the United States. There are many points that will afford good ground for discussion to citizens of the United States, but there are also at least two themes which have a direct interest to Britons, and especially to Britons resident abroad.

The insistence on the fact that the Monroe doctrine is a living force, forming part and parcel of the United States political creed, and the solemn denunciation of the plotters, whose nefarious activities, shielded, as has now been proved, by the erstwhile honourable titles of "officer" and "diplomat," have been so disastrous to innocent lives, so destructive of neutral property, are both connected with the stern fight that the Allies are waging against the relentless and unscrupulous foe at whose behest the plotters worked. It is on the British Fleet that the Monroe Doctrine depends for its permanence at the present moment, and it is to the British Fleet that thanks must be given for the fact that the Germano-American movement, in Argentina, in Chile, in Brazil, as well as in the United States, has not reached the proportions of a veritable catastrophe. With the British Fleet out of action who can doubt what would have happened in Southern Brazil, with its four million German colonists ready, and willing, to place themselves literally under the banner of Prussia? Does anyone for a moment suppose that either Argentina or Chile could have made a serious resistance to a similar attempt? The United States, as their military programme admits, would have been far too busy to do anything to protect her smaller sisters for the time being.

These are hard facts, and one believes that the United States have looked them in the face. As President Wilson stated "neutrality for the United States is not merely a tradition but a duty, since it is a great democracy, and great democracies can only flourish in an atmosphere of peace." Yet one would almost join issue with him on this point. For Great Britain too, despite her constitutional monarchy, is in effect a great democracy, and war, as is evident, is slowly purifying her as by fire, without harming one jot or one tittle of her democratic rights. Indeed one prefers to read into the statement an ambiguity that is not on the surface apparent. The United States realise that a great democracy must be ready to keep the peace against all intruders and intriguers. This, one feels persuaded, is the feeling of rational America, and no efforts of interested parties to create discord between the United States and Great Britain will be powerful enough to upset the balance of level-headed public opinion as voiced in the President's speech. The German-American press may print scare headlines over the "seizure of an American vessel," the owners of such vessels may protest against the "outrage" to the Stars and Stripes; the German news service may tell the world that Britain's high-handed attitude afloat has brought America to the verge of war. We'll not believe it. President Wilson's measured phrases of weighty import, though they do not refer to the Allies or to

FAMOUS RACING STUD

ACCEPTED BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

London, Dec. 3.

Colonel Hall Walker's stud, which was brought over from Ireland for sale at the December auction sales at Newmarket, was withdrawn to-day, the British Government having at the last moment accepted the gift.

The total realised for the five days of the sale came to £84,200, the average being 169½ guineas each as against 191 guineas obtained last year.

Great Britain by name, are clear proof that American neutrality is no mere diplomatic fiction adopted to benefit her won interests, but a course dictated by her conscience and love for fair dealing. In her neutrality she recognises her obligations to Great Britain and fulfils them. She also recognises her responsibility towards her own people as against the Central Empires, and, in the fullness of time, when the cup is pressed down and flowing over, she may fulfil those darker and more sinister responsibilities also.

THE WINNEBAGO

Has She Been Captured?

'MYSTERY' SHIP DISAPPEARS

According to "La Razon," there is considerable anxiety expressed in shipping circles concerning the fate or whereabouts of the Winnebago.

She left the roads under the American flag on Sunday, under pressure of expense. She is supposed to be proceeding to a North American port, but has not yet been heard of anywhere about in Uruguayan waters.

"La Razon" presumes she has sailed for the high seas, southwards to go round the Horn, and travel along the coast up to the Panama Canal. It is admitted that this is presumption on the part of "La Razon," and at the same time it might be suggested that the other South American coast has its dangers as has this side, and equally, if not more so, has its expenses through the Panama Canal.

Another version is that the Winnebago has been captured by an English cruiser, and is now being escorted to the Falkland Isles. This is equally speculative.

From Montevideo there is no news, nor as a matter of fact is anything known anywhere. It is improbable that the Winnebago would be in Uruguayan waters without information having been received.

ANOTHER "NEUTRAL" VESSEL

PLIGHT OF THE S.S. CAMARONES

From Comodoro Rivadavia information is persistent that the situation of the vessel Camarones is day by day becoming worse. She is stated to be running short of coal and should the weather become bad her case will be a serious one. Her supply of fresh water too is very deficient and it is doubtful whether she will be able to reach Buenos Aires in safety.

GERMAN "NEUTRAL" SHIPS

Opportunity for Argentine Vessels

MONOPOLY AND THE COASTAL TRADE

Apropos of the capture of the German owned vessel, Presidente Mitre, the Rev. H. Westby Brady, Chaplain to the Missions to Seamen, has suggested that the Argentine Press appear to have overlooked one or two important and significant points. The Cia Mercante Argentina, a really Argentine line of steamers, having an indisputable Argentine ownership, registry and right to the bandera, have hitherto been crushed by the formidable competition and almost monopoly of the powerful and wealthy Hamburg Sud Amerika Line, and the conscience stricken tying up of the latter will give the Argentine Company a good chance of getting a better footing and doing good business. Furthermore, he says that the real character of the Mendoza and Tucuman, of the same line as the Presidente Mitre, was confessed with the utmost effrontery when those vessels left for Hamburg about a year ago. They then flew the German flag and made no bones of it, and their subsequent continued use of the Argentine flag has only been a continued course of deceit and specious trickery on which the professed indignation of protesters is entirely wasted.

MIHANOVICH LINE

COMBINATION WITH F.C.N.E.A.

In accordance with the change in the time table of the F.C.N.E.A., whose trains from Posadas and Corrientes come direct to the port of Concepcion del Uruguay, the Mihanovich line have resolved to run some of their vessels trading to that port in combination.

The s.s. Viena, therefore, will leave, on and from Dec. 15, on Tuesdays, at 3 p.m., arriving in time to catch the train which leaves Concepcion del Uruguay on Wednesdays, at 7.47 a.m., for Corrientes.

The vessels going down from Salto and Concordia on Sundays and Wednesdays, will enter the Basin at C. del Uruguay, to await the train on those days arriving from Posadas and Corrientes at 6.35 p.m.

From the ensuing week the s.s. Labrador will replace the s.s. Montevideo on the C. del Uruguay run, leaving the Boca, instead of South Basin on Wednesdays and Saturdays at 11 a.m., and returning from Concepcion, Thursdays and Mondays, at 7 p.m.

BUENOS AIRES SHIPPING

PHENOMENAL DECLINE IN ACTIVITY.

Some interesting figures have been published concerning the amount of shipping in the port of Buenos Aires. The diminution in the gross tonnage and in the number of vessels that have arrived in the course of the present year is remarkable.

It is stated that during the year 1913 Buenos Aires took seventh place in the list of important ports of the world and returned figures shewing that 2073 vessels, representing a tonnage of 4,867,326 had been in the port.

In 1914 there was an appreciable diminution in vessels entering, which fell to 1673 equalling 3,089,330 tons.

For the first eleven months of the current year a further reduction is evidenced. Only 1438 vessels entered with a sum tonnage of 1,971,649 up to the end of November.

Approximately 2,000,000 odd tons of shipping will represent the figures for this year.

This reduction of a further million tons is one of very considerable importance and is directly attributable to the war. In shipping circles a hope is earnestly expressed that the limit of diminution has been reached.

THE WATCHER

A MYSTERIOUS SHIP.

A report from Galveston states that a mysterious four-funnelled warship is lying outside at a distance from that place, and that she is supposed to be watching the steamer Ausable of the American Transatlantic Co. To all enquiries as to her identity, the warship cryptically replies that she is "a British cruiser." It is not likely that she is of the Defence, Achilles or Black Prince classes—all large armoured ships with something of the Scharnhorst armament, but she may be an improved County or a Sutlej. Any of these is fast enough to catch the fastest merchantman in those waters, and of overwhelming power to any combination she would be likely to meet, which could scarcely be more than a piratical yacht.

SIR JOHN FRENCH SUPERSEDED

New Commander for British Army in France.

APPOINTMENT OF SIR DOUGLAS HAIG

Career of Britain's New Leader

LONDON, Dec. 15.

General Sir Douglas Haig has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the British Army in France, in succession to Field-Marshal Sir John French.

THE ARMY'S NEW COMMANDER

General Sir Douglas Haig

ANOTHER BRITISH CAVALRY LEADER

Whatever may have been the reasons which led the War authorities to supersede Sir John French, it cannot be denied that the appointment of Sir Douglas Haig to the supreme command in France is one that will meet with little criticism.

Like his former chief, Sir Douglas is an old cavalry man; moreover he has shown time after time during the present campaign that he has little to learn as a general, and has played the great part allotted to him in a way that has earned him much praise and no censure. Haig has been French's chief of staff since the early days of Mons and will always be associated with the splendid work of the First Corps during that great retreat.

Three years younger than Sir Horace Smith Dorrien—the announcement of whose transfer to East Africa was one of yesterday's principal sensations—Sir Douglas Haig was born in June, 1861. The youngest son of a Fife shire magistrate, he was educated at Clifton College, Bristol, and Brasenose College, Oxford. He was gazetted to the 7th Hussars in 1885—when he was already twenty-four years of age. From 1888 to 1892 he was adjutant of that regiment. He had obtained his captaincy in 1891. His reputation in those days was two-fold—a dashing polo player and a studious soldier of the new school. From April, 1894, to March 1895, he was A.D.C. to the Inspector General of Cavalry. He then passed through the Staff College.

Sir Douglas Haig's first experience of active service was with Kitchener in the Soudan, during 1898. He was at Atbara and Omdurman, and was mentioned in despatches.

On the outbreak of the South African War, Major Haig was sent to Natal and served under Sir John French at Elands-laagte, Rietfontein, and Lombard's Kop. He was on French's staff at the beginning of 1900 and

GENERAL SMITH-DORRIEN

Important New Command

THE ARMY'S "YOUNG MAN"

London, Dec. 14

General Smith-Dorrien has been appointed supreme commander of operations in East Africa.

Than General Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien, the War Office could not have selected a more distinguished commander to control the operations in East Africa.

The son of a colonel, and born in 1858, Smith-Dorrien is now 57 years old. He was educated at Harrow and Sandhurst, and first saw active service in the Zulu War, 1879. He was then mentioned in despatches. Subsequently he fought in Egypt and the Soudan, and from 1893 to 1898 he was in India, where he served in the Chitral campaign and with the Tirah expedition.

accompanied him to the relief of Kimberley. Haig was subsequently present at Paardeberg, Poplar Grove and Relfontein. The taking of Johannesburg, Pretoria, and the battle Diamond Hill were also included in Haig's service at this period.

When the Boer leader Kritzinger invaded Cape Colony in December 1900, Kitchener gave Haig the command of four columns sent in pursuit of the Boer leader. It is thus exactly fifteen years ago this month since the present leader in France obtained his first independent command.

After service in the fruitless chase of De Wet, Haig became Lieut.-Colonel of the 17th Lancers ("Death or Glory Boys.") During the remainder of the war he assisted French in clearing Cape Colony; and, then, when peace was declared, Kitchener appointed him Inspector General of Cavalry in India. That post he held until 1906, when he returned to England and was made Director of Military Training at the War Office. In 1909 he became Chief of Staff in India, and three years later was given the command of the Aldershot district, which formed practically the First Army Corps. It was this Corps which he commanded—he was then a Lieut.-General—when he proceeded to France in August last year.

On the retreat from Mons, Haig, as already stated, greatly distinguished himself. He added to his laurels in the battles of the Marne and of the Aisne. Since that time the story of the work of the British Army in France has contained a continual reference of the splendid services of General Sir Douglas Haig. He is one of the few men who, during the present war, have consolidated their positions, and added to their fame. The appointment seems an eminently wise one.

When Lord Kitchener undertook the expedition to Omdurman, Smith-Dorrien accompanied him, and later he was under the same chief in South Africa, where he was promoted to the rank of major-general, at the early age of 41, for "distinguished services in the field." After the conclusion of the South African war, Smith-Dorrien commanded a division in India, and in 1907 was promoted to the Aldershot command.

On the outbreak of the Great War, Sir Horace was given command of the second corps; the first corps commander was Sir Douglas Haig, while in supreme authority was Sir John French. It was Smith-Dorrien's wonderful handling of the second corps which enabled the retreat from Mons to be carried out without complete disaster. Writing on this point, the "Times" History of the War says:—

"According to the rules of Kriegspiel, the British left wing (commanded by Smith-Dorrien) was doomed to destruction. Outnumbered as it was by at least four guns to one, the artillery deluged the advancing Germans with shrapnel. In vain the German commander threw his picked cavalry into the battle; it was thrown back by the British in complete disorder. Still there are limits to human endurance, and it was obvious that if General Smith-Dorrien was to escape annihilation he must retreat. . . . thanks to the General's superb handling of his corps, this most difficult and dangerous operation was successfully effected.

"I say without hesitation," wrote Sir John French, "that the saving of the left wing could never have been accomplished unless a commander of rare and unusual coolness, intrepidity, and determination had been present to personally command the operation."

Since those not very distant days Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien has earned the gratitude of his country a thousand times over. His ability in Flanders has been conspicuous. His presence in East Africa will inspire confidence in the early termination of the campaign in that corner of the earth.

"In the Bandesapt region of the Vosges the French batteries directed their fire against the enemy's workmen who were endeavouring to repair the trenches which had been shattered by our bombardment yesterday.

"In addition to the bombing forays reported yesterday our aviators on the 14th instant made many flights in pursuit of enemy aviators.

Those of the French were slight, many being due to frostbite.

The withdrawal of the British from Doiran was effected under very difficult circumstances. There was heavy fighting at Strumitza, but the British destroyed the bridges in their retreat.

The line taken up by the Allies now extends east and west about 25 miles north of Salonica. The retreat has been effected in good order and without the loss of any war material.

It is officially denied by the Greek Government that the Bulgarians have invaded Greek territory. One or two small parties did cross the frontier by mistake, but retired as soon as they found that they were on Greek soil.

Finally they appealed to a French engineer, who undertook to show some officers how to handle the machinery. The boat put to sea under his charge, and since then nothing has been heard or seen of her, the inference being that the Frenchman sank her deliberately with himself and all on board.

FUTURE OF GERMAN SHIPPING

Will be Held as Guarantee for Payment of Indemnities.

THE NAVAL POWER OF THE ALLIES

Reparation to Belgium Essential

New York, Dec. 15.

A British official of high standing is reported to have made the following declaration:—

"Whatever may be the terms of peace granted by the Allies, they will on no account permit of German merchant shipping the freedom of the seas until the fullest indemnity has been paid.

"The Allies have the power to do this and they will use it."

This is taken to mean that there will be no peace until Germany has made reparation to Belgium.

It means that vessels at present interned in Atlantic ports will have to remain there until those demands are paid.

It means that vessels valued at $100,000,000 will be mortgaged in order to recompense the little nation which gave her life to delay the Germans in their dash upon Paris.

Balance of Trade for 1916

WILL BE HEAVILY IN FAVOUR OF THE STATES.

London, Dec. 15.

Mr. George Parish predicts that the trade balance for 1916 will be 2,000 million dollars in favour of the United States.

In supporting the mobilisation of American securities in Great Britain, Mr. Parish adds that the amount of gold in the United States is colossal, and its importation may lead to wild speculation. It would be better to pay for goods in securities or loans.

Sir Ernest Cassel reported that England had 2500 million dollars of such securities, of which 150 millions had been sold since the war.

It is stated that New York bankers agreed to supply the dollars on securities, and in two cases they are buying the securities outright on the provision that they will be permitted to market them, and that the British will not throw any obstacles in their way to upset the security of the markets in New York. They will lend at a low rate provided the deposits are made in the New York banks and that an adequate margin between the loan and market value be maintained.

Germany's Finances

FALL IN TREASURY BONDS CREATES UNEASINESS IN HUNLAND.

London, Dec. 15.

Telegrams from Holland report that the German financiers and bankers are very uneasy over the position of German stocks both on the home market and abroad.

Despite the confidence displayed by the Imperial Chancellor in his recent speech in the Reichstag the fact remains that Imperial Treasury bonds have fallen ten points, and that even then transactions are few, as each offer to sell results in a further tendency downwards.

It is found that people are beginning to turn their paper into cash and conceal it. The over-abundance of paper-money has proportionally reduced its purchasing value, and contributes to the increase in the prices of all commodities. Articles of prime necessity for food, such as fats and oils, are becoming daily scarcer and consequently dearer.

European Deadlock

INACTIVITY ON MOST FRONTS.

New York, Dec. 15.

Despatches from the various fronts show that operations are almost at a standstill in Russia, France and on the Italian frontier. Only skirmishes take place, often sanguinary enough, but without any importance as regards the general development of the campaign.

It is expected that as the winter advances and becomes more settled a revival of activity may be looked for. At present the only front upon which operations on a large scale are proceeding is in the Balkans.

The expenditure for the ensuing three months is estimated at 2505 million francs.

A motion in favour of reducing taxation to what it was before the war commenced was rejected.

Some excitement was caused by one of the members accusing the military purveyors of having purchased 30,000 horses in England and subsequently selling them to the French army at an exorbitant profit. The former Minister for War, M. Millerand, rose to reply, but his voice could not be heard amid the tumult.

London, Dec. 13.

The British Foreign Office announce that commencing from the 20th inst. the Press censorship will be suspended.

It is understood that the newspaper proprietors and editors will in future be held responsible for what they publish, and will be dealt with under existing Acts and under the Defence of the Realm Act. The same applies to news agencies, both for what they publish and for what they transmit to other countries.

This will not affect news transmitted from one foreign country to another by means of a British telegraph or cable system.

None of the above regulations will affect those already in force in regard to the censorship over questions of a military or naval character.

BRITAIN'S LABOUR LEAGUEAPPROVAL OF NEW ORGANISATION.

New York, Dec. 10.

Despatches from London, referring to the Labour League in England recently formed for defensive and offensive purposes in regard to wages and other industrial questions, say that the Government considers that the League, far from being a menace to the State, is bound to be of the greatest service provided it adapts itself to the plans of the Minister of Munitions; and it is also likely to promote enthusiasm among those who are eligible for military service.

SLOW DEATH FOR PRISONERSGERMANY'S "HUMANE" METHODS

London, Dec. 10.

Every fresh report received as to the treatment of the British prisoners in Germany serves only to increase the anxiety that is felt.

A report published by an American paper on the subject some few weeks ago stated that the condition of the prisoners was bad enough; but the state of affairs related then was nothing compared with that described by the prisoners recently returned from Germany as unfit for further service.

It is known that at the Wittenberg prisoners' camp an epidemic of typhoid fever broke out owing to want of proper food and bad hygienic conditions, and that 1600 of the prisoners, including 99 British, died of the malady. All of the returned prisoners say that were it not for the assistance received from England the men in the camp could not hold out.

BRITISH GENERAL WOUNDEDCASUALTIES IN COMMISSIONED RANKS.

London, Dec. 13.

The casualty lists for the last three weeks contain the names of 183 officers killed, 307 wounded and 17 missing. General Knatchbull is among the wounded, and three Colonels were killed.

The total of the officers' casualties since the commencement is 6,572 killed, 12,866 wounded and 1,733 missing.

TOWN DESTROYEDFIRE IN A "DUPONT" CITY.

New York, Dec. 10.

A telegram from Richmond, Virginia, announces that the new town built at Hopewell by the Dupont munitions company has been destroyed by fire. Communication with the place is interrupted. Special trains have been despatched to the assistance of the population.

The papers announce that a man, believed to be a German, was surprised in the act of placing explosive materials in the powder workshops, and that a plan of them was found in his possession.

The whole of the industrial and commercial part of the town is destroyed. The fire has not yet been got under.

$2,000,000 DAMAGE.

MUNITIONS FACTORIESSPECIAL PROTECTION IN THE STATES.

New York, Dec. 10.

Further steps are about to be taken to protect the factories that are making munitions for the Allies from the attacks of ill-disposed persons. The works will be closely guarded by police, and instructions have been given that if they have cause to suspect any individual they are to bring him before the authorities.

A guard has also been established over the ports to prevent persons of doubtful antecedents from going on board the ships.

AMERICA'S ARMYDEMAND FOR 1,500,000 MEN.

Washington, Dec. 10.

The United States Secretary for War, Mr. Garrison, reports that to ensure the national and continental safety of America he would require an army of 1,500,000 men. The expenditure during the first year is estimated at 503,000,000 dollars.

Owing to a great strike seventy foundries and contracts for war material representing millions of dollars are hung up.

A QUEEN'S HEROISMUNDER FIRE ON BELGIAN FRONT

Paris, Dec. 10.

The Belgian Government at Havre has published the following statement:

"On five occasions the hospitals and medical establishments to the rear of the Belgian lines, over which Queen Elizabeth presides, have been attacked by German aeroplanes. During last week the bombs they let fall occasioned the deaths of 103 persons, 3 of whom were soldiers.

"The Queen refused to abandon her post, despite the danger and the earnest entreaties made to induce her Majesty to retire to safety."

WINTER AT THE DARDANELLESPRIVATIONS OF AUSTRALIANS AND TURKS.

London, Dec. 13.

A Reuter's telegram from the Dardanelles says that the winter is severest upon the Australians and Turks, the first blizzard having found them unprepared. It was necessary for the former to evacuate the trenches which were inundated, and the corpses of Turks and dead mules were being washed into the Allies' trenches.

The prisoners captured by the Allies are poorly clad, and the Turks are reported to be on half-rations.

The authorities believe that the fine physique and equipment of the Colonials will pull them through the winter.

INVASION OF INDIAGERMANY'S NEXT CAMPAIGN.

London, Dec. 9.

A telegram from Rome to the "Daily Telegraph" reports the receipt of indirect news from Constantinople that Germany has given up the idea of an expedition to Egypt in favour of a Turco-German expedition to India.

The German project is to raise an army of 400,000 Turks and 100,000 German troops commanded by Marshal von der Goltz. The expedition would start in the spring and would be preceded by a strong Turkish advance guard which is actually on the way to Bagdad.

The Bulgarians would undertake the care of the Balkan line and ensure supplies for the Germans in Asia.

FRENCH AIRMAN'S FEATGERMAN CRAFT PURSUED AND DESTROYED.

Paris, Dec. 9.

An official communiqué published to-day by the French Government says that this morning a French aviator flying at a height of 3000 metres gave chase to a German aeroplane. Rapidly overtaking the enemy he got within twenty metres before opening fire with his machine gun. The German machine caught fire and exploded, falling with its crew within the French lines near Tilloloy.

GERMAN CARDINAL'S RETURNVON HARTMANN LEAVES ROME.

London, Dec. 10.

CARDINAL CONVEYING RECOMMENDATIONS FOR PEACE.

Rome, Dec. 10.

It is stated that Cardinal von Hartmann is returning to Berlin with a message from the Pope to the Kaiser, also recommendations for peace. The Cardinal will probably visit Prince von Buelow in Switzerland.

WARNING TO MONTENEGROMANIFESTOS DROPPED (FROM) AUSTRIAN AEROPLANES

Paris, Dec. 10.

An official despatch from Montenegro states:—

"On Thursday last an Austrian aeroplane dropped bombs on Cetinje but without effect. The same day other Austrian aeroplanes scattered over the Montenegrin front a proclamation to the army and population advising them to cease resistance, if not, Montenegro would suffer the same fate as Serbia, the Entente being unable to help them to repulse the invaders of their territory.

"Great numbers of Austrian dead covered the field after the engagement of Wednesday last."

WARRING NATIONS AND PEACE

VON BETHMANN HOLWEG'S ADDRESS IN THE REICHSTAG

New York, Dec. 9.

The gist of the German Chancellor Bethmann-Hollweg's speech in the Reichstag to-day on the subject of peace, as telegraphed from Berlin, is as follows:—

"So long as criminal ignorance continues to lead public opinion astray among the nations hostile to the German Empire, it would be madness for Germany to make proposals of peace, which would only contribute towards lengthening the war instead of shortening it.

"If our enemies make proposals of peace compatible with the honour and safety of Germany, we Germans will be prepared to discuss them while always bearing in mind our military successes.

"We refuse to accept responsibility for the continuation of the distress which scourges Europe and the whole world—a responsibility which History will lay entirely on the shoulders of our enemies."

After stating that the announcement that it was intended to discuss in the Reichstag matters relative to peace had caused satisfaction among the enemies of the Empire, the Chancellor proceeded:

"TRIUMPHS IN SERBIA."

"This satisfaction is incomprehensible after the triumphs obtained by the Austro-Germans in Serbia, after our armies have opened the way to Constantinople whereby to threaten the vulnerable points of the British Empire.

"The explanation is, however, that the feeling is due to the desire which the nations of the Entente have for peace. None of them, nevertheless, asks for it, and all of them reaffirm their intentions, expressed with naked brutality since the commencement of the war, that the end must be the annihilation of Germany. We declare that the war will terminate with a peace which offers the human certainty that the attack upon Germany will not be repeated."

ALLIES' "ABSURD" CONDITIONS.

The Chancellor then referred to the conditions which it was rumoured that the Allies would impose, such as the surrender of Alsace and Lorraine to France, the crushing of Prussian militarism, the expulsion of the Turks from Europe, the creation of a great Serbian State, all of which he called absurd.

He maintained that the pretext alleged by the Allies that they are fighting on behalf of the small nations has lost its persuasive force on account of recent events in Greece.

He discussed the principle of nationality from the viewpoint of the Allies, and asked whether the British Colonial Secretary was aware that over 87 per cent. of the 1,900,000 inhabitants of Alsace spoke German, and whether by right of nationality Poland could belong to Russia. He observed that on this same principle being applied to England it loses all its force in regard to India and Egypt. The Chancellor concluded with the words, "For us Germans, this war is always one of defence, both now and in the future."

64 HUN SPIES

SHOT IN FRANCE.

Paris, Dec. 13.

"Le Journal" states that during the war sixty-four German spies have been shot in France.

BERLIN CLAMOURS FOR PEACE

CROWD ENDEAVOUR TO ENTER LEGISLATIVE BUILDING

London, Dec. 11.

Private despatches from Copenhagen state that last night there was a demonstration in Berlin in favour of peace.

Thousands of people assembled in the Friedrichstrasse and tried to enter the Parliamentary buildings.

Traffic was interrupted and confusion reigned for several hours, the multitude shouting "Peace, peace!"

OLD MEN AND WOMEN CALL FOR PEACE.

Both Holland and Denmark report having received information direct from Berlin giving very full details of what happened after the meeting of the Reichstag and the speech of the Imperial Chancellor referring to peace.

The circulation of the Chancellor's declarations resulted in the assembly of huge masses of people consisting of elderly men, women and children, the women predominating. These arranged to proceed to the Parliamentary buildings and make known the popular desire for peace.

Meetings were held at various places with this object, and all the demonstrators proceeded towards the Reichstag palace. Assembled here, representatives of each party were chosen to present their petition to the Reichstag.

The concourse of these thousands of people entirely put a stop to traffic, the trams and other vehicles being unable to move. Three hours were consumed in the passing of the various delegates into the building by the police. This having been accomplished the crowds paraded the streets shouting for peace.

NEWSPAPERS SUPPRESSED.

London, Dec. 11.

It is reported from Copenhagen that the Socialist paper "Vorwaerts" has been forbidden to comment upon the Chancellor's speech in the Reichstag, or upon the debate upon it that ensued.

The "Post" of Berlin has also been closed by the Government for publishing an article which did not meet with the approval of the authorities.

WOMEN BAYONETED AND SHOT.

New York, Dec. 11.

The London special correspondent of the "New York Herald" sends the following despatch to his paper:—

"People belonging to neutral countries who have come from Germany and Austria say that in the recent peace demonstrations numbers of women were bayoneted and some shot.

"The opposition to the war is acquiring vast proportions. The German Socialist Scheidemann, when he demanded peace, voiced the wishes of nine-tenths of the population of the two Empires. The Chancellor represents only the Junkers, who are now more powerful than ever.

"So great is the power of this party that Germany will not yield until she is obliged to do so by force of circumstances, which will happen when her enemies impose upon her conditions which will be more severe than those under consideration at present.

RECRUITING ENTHUSIASM IN BRITAIN.

"Meanwhile, judging from the way the volunteers are pouring in to the recruiting officers and by the attitude of the Press, it can be stated that England is determined not to lay down her arms until she has destroyed the death-dealing war machine whose mouthpiece is the Chancellor.

"I went to the recruiting office near St. Paul's and saw there thousands of men who, in spite of the pouring rain, had been waiting all day and far into

ABSORPTION OF THE U.S.A

GERMANY'S DEEP-LAID PLAN.

Paris, Dec. 9.

Mr. Reinach of the "Figaro" writes that an eventful conflict between the United States and Germany is inevitable. He is convinced of the existence of a great secret design on the part of Germany for the political and economic absorption of America.

This belief is expressed in a review of President Wilson's message to Congress on the relations between Germany and the United States, which appears in "Figaro" under the caption "Gulliver Wakes Up."

The review says that the message was animated by righteous anger, although not free from metaphysics. Mr. Wilson was moved to the deepest indignation by the revelations at the trial of the Hamburg-American Company's chief officials.

"DISHONOURABLE INACTION"

ROOSEVELT'S OPINION OF WILSON'S POLICY.

New York, Dec. 9.

The Press of the United States, with a few natural exceptions depending on political and racial leanings, praise President Wilson's message as patriotic. The majority agree that the stand taken by Mr. Wilson is sound. Opinion varies as to the methods whereby "preparedness" is to be achieved. Most of the papers support a courageous policy in America first.

In a criticism issued by ex-President Roosevelt of the President's message the following passages occur:—

"What does Mr. Wilson mean when in one line he says that we stood apart, seriously neutral, because it was our manifest duty to do so, and a couple of paragraphs later he says, 'We demand security for prosecuting our policy on the lines of national development for others.' Mr. Wilson must choose either of the two positions, but he cannot take both.

"Again, he says that he regards war as a means of asserting the rights of a people against aggression; yet he says that it was our duty to remain studiously neutral when Belgium asserted the rights of Belgians by war against the aggression of Germany. How does he reconcile both these statements? He cannot do it. No words will cover a policy of dishonourable inaction."

DESTROYED BY FIRE

500,000 BUSHELS OF WHEAT LOST TO ALLIES.

New York, Dec. 10.

A telegram from Erie reports the destruction by fire of half a million bushels of Canadian wheat destined for the Allies.

the night in order to enlist. Men in silk hats, merchants and professional men, were standing shoulder to shoulder with rough seafaring men.

"In the evening, the crowd was increased by the arrival of hundreds of clerks from the City offices who marched singing the favourite air of "Tipperary."

"At all the other recruiting offices similar scenes are enacted. Frequently there are not sufficient doctors to examine all who present themselves and it has to be done by hospital students and practitioners. The people fight for the honour of enlisting.

"From Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, Swansea, Leeds and other cities the reports are the same. Everywhere the same enthusiasm for military service prevails. It would seem, after all, that the system of voluntary enlistment has triumphantly vindicated itself and that the question of conscription will drop permanently into abeyance."

WAR AND RELIGION

CARDINALS NOT ON SPEAKING TERMS.

Rome, Dec. 9.

The English and French cardinals who have come to Rome to attend the Consistory have not spoken to the German Cardinal Von Hartmann, and barely salute him.

Cardinal Von Hartmann has complained to the Pope in the name of the Kaiser about the absence of the Austro-German diplomatists, alleging that His Holiness has been influenced by the representatives of the Allies.

It is reported that Von Hartmann is the bearer of another message requesting the personal intervention of Benedict XV on behalf of any concrete proposals of peace that may be made.

RUSSIA SHORT OF MONEY

CALL TO BE MADE ON ALLIES.

New York, Dec. 9.

The postponement for an indefinite period of the Duma sessions, which was stated to have been done in order to give time for the preparation of the Budget, is further explained by a despatch from Petrograd which states that the Budget Committee has frankly declared to the Government that it can arrive at no satisfactory conclusion, and that it is very likely that the Russian Government will have to apply to the Allies for financial support in resolving certain difficulties of a fiscal nature.

GERMAN AIRSHIP DESTROYED

RUSSIAN SUCCESSES ON THE DVINA RIVER.

Petrograd, Dec. 9.

The Russian War Office has published a despatch which reports:—

"The enemy made an attempt to cross the Dvina river to an island south of Vaskull, but was repulsed by fusillades from the bank.

"Our heavy artillery forced a German airship to descend in the region of Merzendorf, north of Baldon. A loud explosion was heard which probably signalled the destruction of the airship through the detonation of the receptacles containing gas which she carried.

"On the remainder of the front there was occasional firing at various points.

"In the Caucasus the situation is unchanged."

PRESIDENTE MITRE CASE

Ministers Confer With
Dr. Naon

BRITAIN'S REPLY RECEIVED

On December 10, Dr. Romulo Naon, Argentine Ambassador to the U.S., had a long interview with Drs. Murature and Cantilo, in which international questions were discussed, and more especially those referring to recent British seizures of Argentine and American shipping as being of German proprietorship.

Dr. Naon furnished the Ministry of Foreign Affairs with complete data on the subject of these captures, and the attitude assumed by the United States Government. Meanwhile a long despatch has been received from Dr. Dominguez, Argentine Ambassador in London, giving the British Government's views on the subject of the Mitre's capture, but the greatest reserve is maintained as to their tenor. It is interesting to note that the German Minister in Buenos Aires, Graf von Luxburg, announces: "The German passengers and crew of the Argentine vessel 'President Mitre,' which was captured on 28th November last by English forces and declared a good prize have been obliged to sign the following document: 'I, German subject, seaman or passenger of the German steamer 'President Mitre,' hereby undertake not to intervene in any action relating to warlike operations while the present hostilities last.' I hereby declare that the basis of the declaration exacted and given is illegal. The declarations are null."

The animals disembarked from the Presidente Mitre were reshipped to Buenos Aires on Thursday night by the Roma. So far neither the Mitre nor her captor, the Orama, have been reported by ships calling at Montevideo, and it is presumed that they are en route to Port Stanley, Falkland Isles.

Reply from Sir Edward Grey

EXPECTED BY ARGENTINE AUTHORITIES

It is understood that yesterday should have been the day on which Sir Edward Grey was to return from Paris to London, so that at any moment the British Government's reply to the protest from this country concerning the "Presidente Mitre" may be expected.

It is possible that Doctor Dominguez, the Argentine representative in London, will have audience of Sir Edward Grey.

Business men and especially estancieros are daily putting in claims for the loss of cargo on board the vessel, and attempts are being made still to hold protest meetings against the action of the British Government, when all and sundry are still completely in the dark as to the true state of affairs.

The Presidente Mitre had 2300 tons of cargo on board.

From Comodoro Rivadavia, off which port the "Camarones" is still taking refuge, information has been received that the situation of the vessel, through lack of coal and water is daily becoming more critical. She is loaded with wool and hides for Buenos Aires. The passengers refuse to land.

DECLAMATORY PATRIOTISM

Attack on Dr. Zeballos

BY MONTEVIDEO JOURNAL

...El Día of Montevideo, the organ of ex-President Batlle, publishes an article warmly commending the action of the Buenos Aires police in prohibiting the meeting or protest against the Presidente Mitre seizure. It observes that this fresh disauthorisation of the flamboyant and declamatory patriotism of Dr. Zeballos is significant, and that it may be remembered that he laboured the point that in the Presidente Mitre case the gravest aspect was the pretended outrage on the Argentine flag.

Prohibited Protest Meeting

PRO HUNS DISPERSED BY THE POLICE

A meeting called for Sunday by the Centro Estudiantil Manuel Moreno, some days ago to protest against the capture of the Presidente Mitre, was formally forbidden by the Police as likely to lead to disturbances, and very properly so. The first promoters of the meeting, who at least acted in good faith, therefore abstained from participating in it, but a Teutonic Rump decided to defy the Minister of Interior and the Chief of Police. Accordingly a large number of Teutons and their sympathisers proceeded to Plaza Congreso on Sunday afternoon, but found the Plaza strongly picketed by Gendarmerie of the Squadron, and police on foot, who prevented their forming in column or in mass.

Finding the Law too strong for them but determined to show their hostility, the manifestants began to pour down the Avenida de Mayo in compact groups. According to police reports about 5.20 p.m. an incident occurred near Calle Santiago del Estero, when the manifestants tried to enter that street, and were ordered by the Comisario in charge to disperse. A scuffle ensued, and a policeman was pushed about, and nine youths arrested for uttering hostile cries and causing obstruction. The public looked on from the pavements in quiet surprise.

Don Manuel Ugarte, of "La Patria," was among the orators who proposed to address the crowd, and a select detachment of it then penetrated to Corrientes, and drew up outside his offices between San Martin and Reconquista, their flank being also covered by the friendly Power of "La Union." Here they felt secure, and when the Comisario again told them to disperse, as the meeting was unlawful and forbidden, his words were received with derision, and as they were now heated to the heroic point, they refused to recede. A squad of the Gendarmerie of Security were at hand, and on the signal of the Comisario, their trumpeters sounded the warning to disperse; again, again, and yet again the trumpet blew, but the valorous pro-Teutons heeded not. Then with an ominous swish, the sabres flashed from their sheaths and the squad trotted determinedly into the mob and broke it up with shoulder thrusts, trappings, and smart blows from the flats of (oh, irony!) German sabres made in Solingen. The field was cleared, and the authorities remained in peaceful possession. It is understood that Don Manuel Ugarte was not present at the row, and that he did not see the bottles thrown at the police. Naturally he would not countenance such conduct by his presence. He has issued a protest against the prohibition and breaking up of the meeting, and demands from the Government permission to hold another next Sunday!

A RIO FAKIR

Newspaper Editor's Joke

HOW THE PUBLIC WERE "GULLED"

Public gullibility has been again amusingly illustrated, as also incidentally the somewhat slow methods of the Police by an incident which has just occurred at Rio.

A principal member of the Staff of "A Noite" had determined to amuse himself at the expense of both public and police, and if the former be grateful to him, it is quite certain that the latter will not, and will probably find means to testify their displeasure.

The term "Fakir" is to many a word to conjure with, and he of "A Noite" was for the time being a Fakir in all senses. His plan was to pose as an Oriental marvel worker, and he did this Capital the equivocal compliment of stating that he came from Buenos Aires. Money was evidently not lacking, and the supposed Fakir, whose name is Eustagino Alvarez, hired a set of sumptuous apartments, which were decorated with all the customary mystical paraphernalia of rich draperies, gloomy alcoves, tripods, fires, and suitable "locations" for the working of his spells and incantations. The entire aspect of the place was carefully calculated to impress the imagination of the visitant, and did so. In the midst sat the false magician, imposing and mysterious to behold, cleaner than the ordinary ash smeared fakir,

"and wildly tossed from cheeks and chin,

The tumbling cataract of his beard." Even the amateur detectives of the Press were completely deceived, for during the month that this colossal joke lasted, many of them interviewed him and all came away profoundly impressed with his astuteness. Senhor Alvarez fooled them to the top of their bent, and numerous laudatory articles on the Great Medicine Man appeared in the Rio Press. In one month no less than 385 "consultations" were held, the clients including military and naval officers, diplomats, senators, deputies, ladies of the best circles, and others of the "Half World."

Certain envious periodistas, however, urged the police that the man, however plausible, must be an imposter, and after much prodding induced the authorities to take decisive action against the swindler.

Certain high police officials therefore went to the haunt of the Wise Man, and while professing themselves astounded at what they heard and saw, explained that they had no option but to arrest him, and his secretary also.

At the Comisaria, however, the bogus Fakir removed his venerable beard and prodigious wig, the police and many of his consultants being greatly out of countenance when he revealed himself as Eustagino Alvarez, editor of "A Noite." He informed his clients that the money paid as fees would be returned to them, and that any indiscreet revelations were entirely forgotten. So numerous are still credulous persons, and so little does superstition change except in form.

MITRE CAPTURE JUSTIFIED

BRAZILIAN EXPERT ON THE DECLARATION OF LONDON.

A Brazilian telegram reports an interview of the Rio journal O Diario with the eminent expert on International Law, Dr. Sa Vianna, with respect to the seizure of the steamer Presidente Mitre by the British cruiser Orama on the ground of her actual German nationality.

Dr. Sa Vianna said that he had carefully considered the case, and was of opinion that the warship was com-

FIRE ON ISLA MACIEL

Whole Square Destroyed

FIREMEN'S HOPELESS TASK

The Isla Maciel which many only know as a not too reputable terra incognita on the other side of the Riachuelo, reached by the transporter bridge, has been the latest victim of "the devouring element" which has been having a special time here of late.

The class of habitation fashionable in the district, wooden frame houses, were eminently fitted for an exhibition of what an active and really mischievous fire can do and the display was excellent and rapid. The fire broke out in Calle La Plata which abuts on the transporter bridge and from the combustible and flimsy nature of the structures, took a rapid and destructive course and although the damage is not very great as estimated in figures, it is serious from the extent of area laid waste and the number of people rendered homeless. An entire square has been practically erased, only smoking and charred joists, with twisted masses of blackened corrugated iron, remaining to declare that here had been houses. Trifling events produce catastrophes and the cause of this one was the upsetting of a small stove in the "Tripolitania" almacen situated at the corners of La Plata and 3 Febrero. In ten minutes the place was a roaring furnace.

The Avellaneda police and the Boca Fire Brigade were at once advised and sent aid without loss of time. It was necessary to use very long lines of hose over 400 yards in part in length, to reach the river as the primitive and arcadian arrangements of the Isla Maciel do not as yet include street mains and are, indeed deficient in many respects. So poor was the pressure when the water did come that very little could be done in throwing a jet on the fire. The evil minded remarked that Riachuelo water, even in that form was inky and professed that the fire would be poisoned but not drowned. Dense volumes of smoke rolled up and hung heavily over the conflagration causing great trouble to the bomberos, several of whom were half choked by it.

Meanwhile the dwellers in 3 de Febrero and La Plata hastily dragged their movables and property out of danger anticipating that their timber township would become a second Chicago; beds, commodes, dressing tables, some of them of a suspiciously smart appearance, bags, trunks, stoves, sofas, tables, clothes chairs mattresses were piled in heaps, their distracted owners rushing about like the tenants of a disturbed ant's nest. The unfortunate housewives were all in tears and many have lost their little all for the wind drove the fire through and over their frail homes leaving only desolation and cinders behind.

The police, who worked very hard at extinguishing the fire, have offered temporary refuge to many of the destitute and homeless. Although Isla Maciel has a dubious reputation, it is and has been for the most part inhabited by honest and hard working people whose misfortunes merit sympathy.

petent and correct in her action, and that the seizure of the German ship was quite justifiable.

He pointed out that, in accordance with Article 56 of the Declaration of London which is perfectly well known and in the light of the published facts, the Orama's capture of the Mitre was entirely right and proper.

THE P. MITRE'S CARGO.

A good deal of perplexity exists among the owners of the goods for residents and merchants in the South,

ROSARIO NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Dec. 14.

The temperature has been at times up to 101° F in the shade in Rosario during the past day or two.

People are beginning to sit up and take notice of the posters calling attention to the usual summer and Christmas railway facilities to the hills, and cheap tickets from all parts to all parts. "Hope springs eternal" and the human breast is prone to harbour the delusion that no where can be quite so hot as the spot in which it is located.

The break-up of the schools in Buenos Aires has made temporary absentees of several local pater familias. Mr. and Mrs. A. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. E. T. E. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Christie and, I believe, Mr. and Mrs. Van Horn are among them. They should all be back within a day or two, for I believe the big day at St. George's is that on which I am writing.

Mrs. E. W. Dean, of Alberdi, is away to San Esteban, with the younger members of her family, and Mr. Dean intends a brief visit to their holiday quarters in the near future.

The Gollan family are going away to the Hills shortly for a change; also the Cafferata and Tamborini families, numbered among the leading people known to members of the British community.

The students attending Newell's Commercial School had a successful break-up last week. A prize distribution and concert were the basis of the programme; accessory to these were those opportunities for social merry making and amenities peculiar to such occasions.

St. Bartholomew's School Sports—as I prophesied in my first allusion to the matter—are to be held on Dec. 18, and not on Dec. 11 as I was led to state in last week's letter and its predecessor by way of "correction."

The concert is to follow on Dec. 22, and a scene from the "Merchant of Venice" is to be presented by the pupils, who, I am told, are shaping most splendidly. I presume it is the trial scene; and as this is the crux of the whole matter it is possible to compress the interest into twenty-five minutes, and to keep the programme within reasonable bounds.

Both concert and sports are likely to do a great deal towards furthering the popularity, and in consequence the utility of the school. It was Mr. Pepys who last year initiated the sports—or resuscitated them, perhaps it was—and they were an unanticipated success. This year, in the absence of Canon Pepys, the Rev. F. Middleton has been the moving spirit, and there is every likelihood of last year's sports being surpassed.

Mr. and Mrs. Pepys are due back early in the coming year.

Mrs. Middleton, still in the English Nursing Home, is making capital progress; baby too.

Mr. J. H. Marston is leaving by the s.s. Amazon for Rio de Janeiro, to meet the Desna, by which boat Mrs. Marston, Miss Brewer, and Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Knight are returning.

Their arrival should usher in a social event of considerable importance, for one of the party is to occupy a very charming house at Fisherton, to the garden of which the finishing touches are being put. It is hard to spare Mr. Stanley Knight from the ranks of the bachelor's though!

Writing of the Tea Concert at the Savoy Hotel the other day I omitted by inadvertence mention of the Police Band, which played selections at intervals outside the building, and turned the attention of many to the opportunity for lending support to a deserving cause. Capt. Santangelo has won a full meed of Allied gratitude, for he is ever ready to place the services of his talented musicians at the disposal of patriotic committees.

I have been tempted once or twice to make allusion—I had almost said bantering allusion—to a curious little piece of juvenile by play to be witnessed now and then in Rosario. It is in connection with the "Boy Scouts." At first it was very bewildering. A gentle hold was laid on my buttonhole, and I was confidentially assured that "these are the real and only antediluvian boy scouts bearing the hall-mark, embroidered in each corner and scrolled past all imitation into the water-mark." As a dutiful scribe I duly chronicled the scouts in question; but subsequently my buttonhole was again ambushed and I was assured that the boy-scouts I had previously cacheted were, alas! but spurious imitations, and that "mine are the real only original pre-Noahian specimens." Well, again I dutifully wrote that I had been wrong, and that the present sample were, etc., etc., hall-marked in every link. Now I should be really indebted to any reader, who has graduated in the science of classifying the Boy Scout, who will give me a clear explanation of this mystery!

The Sale of Work at Alberdi, handicapped though it was by the atrocious weather of the morning of the opening day, realised $1200 approximately towards the Building Fund of the S.A.M.S., for which it was inaugurated.

Miss Gillbee, Headmistress of the High School, journeyed down to Buenos Aires on Saturday with the four pupils who have entered for the Cambridge Locals. May they be as successful as last years candidates, all of whom passed, one with special distinction!

And old link with the Railway past has been broken by the death of Mr. John Nibloe, a foreman in the Carriage and Wagon Dept. of the F.C. C.A., which occurred on Sunday at the English Nursing Home. The funeral took place at the Protestant Cemetery on Monday, when a large number of Mr. Nibloe's old fellow employees attended. The Rev. S. C. Deacon, of Alberdi, conducted the service, assisted in regard to the Spanish portion by Mr. Drake. The deceased, a widower, left a son and two daughters.

Mr. J. W. Traill, at present an inmate of the English Nursing Home, is making favourable progress.

News has been received of Mr. Charles Chapman and Mr. H. Parry, members of the staff of Messrs. Proctor, Garratt, Marston, Ltd., who went home recently to volunteer. The former has joined the London Rifle Brigade, and the latter the 6th King's Liverpool Regt. Both are as fit as fiddles.

The wedding of Miss Newell, sister of Dr. Newell, a well-known local justice, to Dr. Alejandro O'Connor, another luminary of the Rosario Bench, is to take place at St. Bartholomew's Church on Monday next.

The newly-formed British Society in Rosario and District is anxious that all British subjects and their descendants should send in application for membership as early as possible, so that the names may come before the Committee for election. Mr. A. P. Ferguson, the Hon. Secretary, of Maipu 648, will be pleased to furnish particulars to any to whom the circular appeal has so far not been delivered.

With Christmas at hand the children begin to think of Santa Claus, and a visit to Cassini's should be helpful to any to whom the rôle is a bit unfamiliar. Messrs. Lynch and McGarrell know what should be incorporated in the Christmas pudding, and stock all the ingredients.

On Wednesday afternoon the Sale of Work, Sports and Tea in aid of the Church Building Fund took place at the picturesque grounds of the Cordoba Athletic Club, General Paz. The weather which was threatening in the morning cleared away before midday and in consequence a perfect afternoon greeted the large attendance when the first race was held at 3 p.m. The long programme of sports for children and adults attracted many entries and the winners in the different events were as follows:—

Tea Girls Race.—1, Miss Florence Morton; 2, Miss Phyllis Davis.

Consolation Race.—(Three prizes for those who had not won a prize): 1, Marjorie Weedon; 2, Donald Lewis; 3, Dorothy Boyd.

Thanks are due to the ladies and gentlemen who so kindly gave the money for the prizes and also for the prizes which were given.

Mr. Boyd very kindly presented the Committee with a little black pig which was put up at auction and bought by Percy Schultz who returned the pig for re-sale. Mr. Schibler being the second purchaser; but after some 10 minutes of ownership Mr. Schibler turned the pig over once more for sale and Mr. Schultz again was the highest bidder and concluded by inviting all those present to a cold repast on the following Sunday when the pig would form the principal item.

Tea proved one of the greatest attractions and the following young ladies acted the part of waitresses to perfection:—Miss Lilly Robinson, in charge, assisted by Miss Doris Robinson, Miss Florence Morton, Miss Phyllis Davis, Miss Gracie Baxter, Miss Eileen Welch, Miss Blanche Guppy and Miss Gladys Guppy.

The little girls who acted as flower girls and sold fragrant button-holes also deserve praise for their strenuous work. They were Miss Dorothy Lewis, Miss Violet Dunbar, Miss Marjorie Guppy, Miss Dorothy Boyd and Miss Davis.

The Sale of Work brought in a very satisfactory amount. The following ladies were in charge of the function: Mrs. Sugden, Mrs. Guppy, Mrs. Lang and Mrs. Babb. The articles which were not sold were afterwards disposed of at auction, Mr. L. G. Babb acting the part of auctioneer.

Mr. Walter's "Aunt Sally" was also well patronised, some $16 being realised, 3 balls for 10 cents, attracting many of the ladies who made Sally's head "go back" more than once.

The returns from the sale of tickets, sale of work, sports, auction sale, pig sale, tea and "Aunt Sally" realised the grand total of some $640, which is a little more than a third of the Church debt.

It is the intention to hold a Sale of Work on a much larger scale later on, when it is hoped that the balance of the debt will be wiped off.

At the conclusion of the sale cheers were given for the Committee in charge of the sports. The Rev. Mr. Sugden, Messrs. Dunbar, Lang, Boyd and Babb, and also for the ladies and the tea girls for their very efficient work is making the affair a success, and with a final "Hurrah" for Rev. Sugden and Mrs. Sugden the enjoyable event was brought to a close.

Cordoba Athletic Club—Spring Tennis Tournament.

The long drawn out Spring Tournament is now about to be finished and the prizes will be presented on Sunday afternoon at 4.30. In the ladies singles Miss Gladys Symonds beat Miss Gladys Guppy 6-4, 6-1; Mrs. Walters defeated Miss Florence Morton 6-2, 2-6, 6-2; Miss Symonds and Mrs. Walters will play off the final this week-end. In the final of the mixed doubles Mrs. Walter and Mrs. G. E. Morton beat Miss Florence Morton and Mr. Zimmer 6-1, 6-2. While the scores in the latter match look one-sided yet the play in the majority of the games was very close the score going to deuce time after time. Mr. Dunbar very kindly acted as Umpire. The following are the prize winners in the present tournament:—Mixed Doubles, Mrs. Walters and Mr. G. E. Morton; Men's Doubles, Mr. E. W. Marks and Mr. L. G. Babb; Men's Singles, Percy P. Schultz.

ARGENTINE SHIPPING

Official Interference Causes Destruction

A RECORD OF LOST OPPORTUNITIES

Again and again do grandiose schemes appear dealing with the building up of an Argentine mercantile marine. Anything from one to a dozen large liners, usually of 15,000 tons, are the basis of the idea; their construction, manning, and indeed everything save the commissions or management to be found by the State. With these means at her disposal Argentina will, according to the promoters, be able to shake off the yoke of the foreign owner, make fabulous profits, cheapen the cost of living, and generally bring about the commercial millenium in this Republic. The utter impracticability of all these schemes renders it unnecessary to slay the slain by criticising them, but the mere fact that they are so frequently launched—the schemes, not the boats—throws into high relief the absolute crass ignorance, mingled with petty official spite, and inflated ideas of personal importance, that threaten to do away with whatever little merchant shipping Argentina still claims.

Anyone wishing to get statistics about the tonnage still under the Argentine flag can do so from several publications; the compilation prepared for the San Francisco exhibition is as good as any. Analysing the figures it will be seen that the great majority of the ships are small river craft, schooners or ketches, with a few steamers of small tonnage and uncertain age, single ships owned by private individuals for the most part. Then one has the boats of the "M" fleet, the vessels of the Marina Mercante Argentina, the two new big boats, Asturiano and Argentino of the Punta Arenas line, and all's said. Now the up-river trade is not what it was, owing to the ever-growing and quite legitimate competition of the railways, but as a set-off to this is the fact that the trade to south coast ports, to Brazilian ports, and the international trade from Brazil to the south direct, has grown considerably during the last decade. This year it has a chance of enjoying exceptional prosperity, heavy cargoes and high freights being the rule everywhere. At the same time it must be remembered that the cost of fuel has risen exceedingly, since the boats in these trades are dependent on local bunkering facilities. No outcry on the part of shippers has been heard against the projected rise in freights, a rise of 50 per cent, for the simple reason that the cargo concerned will bear the increased tariff with ease. All that the southern wool growers and producers generally are anxious about is to get their goods away, an anxiety increased since the withdrawal of the German boats from the run.

Hence it is evident to anyone with the least modicum of commonsense that now or never is the time for the Argentine Government to do all in its power to foment the growth of local shipping. A glance through the article from La Prensa which is paraphrased elsewhere in this issue will show that owing to the archaic method of sub-divided administration that is the fatal curse of all nations of Spanish descent, a sub-department of state is carrying out a policy of obstruction. It is a tradition that comes down from the days of the Council of the Indies, when the ships engaged in the trade of the new world took longer to discharge their cargoes at Seville than the voyage half round the world, slow as it was, usually occupied. Officialism, in this case the Prefecture of Ports, is ready to sacrifice millions of dollars of trade rather than lose one jot or one tittle of subservience that it considers its due from the merchant classes.

The increase of freight was barred by the Prefect of Ports, to which the shipowners replied by relinquishing their postal privileges. A counter to this is found in an order prohibiting working in Port after the usual hours of labour, or on feast days. Was ever any order more ridiculous? "Port" is merely a conventional name to apply to the majority of the open roadsteads down south, where the boat lies off the beach and bundles her cargo into lighters, which are supplied by the vessel, tows them ashore, with her own launch, dumps the goods on the beach and re-loads at once, the skipper always keeping a watchful eye to windward and anxiously following the trend of the glass. "Ports," where there is not one single boat, and the coast guard fulfil their duties on horseback, as far as such a thing is possible. "Ports" where a 30 foot tide makes anchoring a nightmare.

The whole difficulty lies in the fact that the Prefect of Ports is an elderly naval officer, and that the majority of his staff of advisers are accustomed to work up-river, where, in the intervals of maté-sucking, the crew tie their vessel up to a crazy wharf and leisurely discharge a few boxes or casks until dusk, repeating the process next morning after dawn has sufficiently well broken. The exigencies of the open sea are something that Argentine marine officials neither understand nor wish to understand. The Argentine sailor, true criollo, is as rare as a bird of Paradise in a suburban hen run. Dalmatians, Spaniards, Genoese and Neapolitans do the work that he has no liking for, and would, in spite of official interference, make the coastwise trade of the Republic something worth while were it not for the evident intention of the authorities to crush it out of existence. Restrictions and expenses are increased year by year without rhyme or reason. Officialdom itself cannot give any comprehensible explanation of its doings. And in the meantime the boats are sold elsewhere, or put under the Uruguayan or Brazilian or Chilean flag. Argentina, despite her two Dreadnoughts and her naval ports, her long coastline and her mighty rivers, wastes all her opportunities. In the old "windjammer" days it was said that "the devil himself would make a sailor if he'd only look aloft." But Argentine officialdom sternly refuses to look aloft, preferring to strut along the quay in all the pomp and panoply of a naval uniform, doing nothing, but, on the contrary, like the clown in the pantomime, getting in the way of the few harassed men who still try to do the work of the Republic afloat.

UNEMPLOYED IN THE CAMPS

Many complaints have of late been received by the Government concerning the misdoings of unemployed workmen in the camp. It appears that some of these are committing a variety of depredations and the Government has been requested to take some steps in the matter.

This request has caused the Minister of the Interior to telegraph to the Governors of Cordoba and of the Pampa asking for their co-operation and ideas.

It is the railway companies that have brought to the notice of the authorities the action of many of the unemployed, because they themselves in giving free passage to workmen have apparently been the chief sufferers.

THE BUDGET COMMITTEE

ZEALOUS FOR DAILY SITTINGS.

Dr. Alfred Echague, President of the Budget Committee, yesterday put on the paper a motion in the name of his colleagues to the effect that in order to get the Budget forward, daily sittings should be held.

The different groups of the Chamber are said to regard the proposal very favourably, from a theoretical point of view, but what the effect of the heat may be upon their resolution, it would be difficult to forecast.

THE PAMPA AFFAIR

"MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING."

There has recently been a recrudescence of "alarming and sanguinary" reports concerning the seizure of Argentine vessels, which reports while proceeding from sources which are not unsuspected of anti-Ally bias, are nevertheless worth investigating. In regard to these "El Diario" says that the national transport Pampa has been employed to make a voyage to New York, returning with coal. Several Allied warships are cruising off the Antilles and among them is the French cruiser Descartes.

This ship met the Pampa recently off Porto Rico and signalled her to stop, merely in accordance with her duty and the established custom of the sea. According to the first and sensational version put in circulation, a German subject on board acting as writer was forcibly removed to the French from the Argentine ship. This piece of news came by cable, and was current in the Capital on Monday.

On being questioned by Press representatives the Minister of Marine Vice-Admiral Saenz Valiente, showed profound surprise that the affair was known outside the limits of the Marine Department. He stated indeed that no one there had the least information about the matter until the night previous. He expressed himself entirely sceptical as to the occurrence of any such incident, giving several reasons. It was not possible that the information could have been radiogrammed from the sea, as all the wireless stations of the coast are closed to calls except those for urgent assistance. Therefore, says the Minister, the allegation did not come by wireless.

Further, said the Vice-Admiral, he is inclined to think that the report was an invention and false telegraphic information, designed to disturb and put pressure on the grain market, as coinciding with the Presidente Mitre incident, and tending to show that our merchant ships are in constant danger of being meddled with by the Allies' ships of war.

Meanwhile, "El Diario" declares, that though the Minister of Marine diverted himself in this manner with the reporters, he had definite information three days before from Captain Caillet Bois, of the transport and knew all about it.

The Pampa was merely detained till her papers were looked at and from interest in the flag she displayed. There was no incident; nobody was carried away, and the visit of the officers to the Pampa was merely French naval courtesy.

As soon as he heard of it the Minister of Marine consulted his colleague of Foreign Affairs, who examined rules and precedents, and explained that the business was of no importance whatsoever, that the cruiser had acted with perfect correctness, and that the Argentine transport had gone on her journey without trouble.

Both decided therefore to attach no importance to the episode, and to so report of it to Dr. de la Plaza, while denying it altogether to the representatives of the Press, to prevent the rabid Chauvinists and mischievous sensation mongers from making capital out of it.

VEGETABLES FROM CHILE

ARRIVAL OF LARGE CONSIGNMENTS

The Chilean Government has recently permitted the export of large quantities of vegetables, including porotos for Argentine consumption. Special rates have been arranged with the Transandine Company which deliver direct at Retiro.

The circumstance is in all respects fortunate, as during the intense heat there is an increased demand for green vegetables, and this timely supply may help to keep the too ambitious prices from rising, as they are apt to do.

UNPAID WAGES

THE PLIGHT OF THE EMPLOYEES OF THE PORT.

At the moment, considerable distress is being caused to junior employees of the Port of Buenos Aires, owing to it being some two months since their salaries were paid.

Some of the employees complain that they are selling articles in their homes to obtain the necessities of livelihood, others who live out of town are unable to find the necessary tram fares, wherewith to travel to their work.

It is stated that the senior officials have received their due, and it is claimed that those who suffer most are those whose just claims affect the Government in but a very small degree.

The matter, as do so many financial Government matters at the moment, calls for immediate attention.

During yesterday an affair occurred, which is reported of considerable gravity. The officials have suppressed every detail of the occurrence, but it is known that a sailor employed by the Prefecture of the Port, is alleged to have been treated with severe official injustice, and that some seven of his sailor comrades decided to interfere in the matter. They have all been arrested.

Nothing is known as to what actually occurred, but it is believed that the sailor publicly protested and personally forced his protest upon the authorities, concerning the non-payment of wages during the months of October and November.

The affair is well worth an enquiry, on the part of responsible officials.

POLITICS IN GUALEGUAY

AN UNPRECEDENTED SCANDAL.

The trouble between the Municipality and the police in Gualeguay—Entre Rios—is apparently increasing, and has now reached a most scandalous stage, and one without precedent. The basis of the trouble and original cause of the breach is political.

On Monday last a special Council meeting was held in reference to the late elections. Members of both the Democratic and Radical party assembled in considerable numbers. What was their surprise to find the Chamber and the Council building full of armed police under the orders of three officers.

It is stated that their sympathisers are with the democrats, and that at the orders of this party they filled the hall, determined to suppress the Radicals.

The Municipal President states that he in no way requested police aid, having sufficient force in the house to preserve order. The newspaper, "El Provincial," a democratic organ, is held responsible for this unprecedented interference in the Council Chamber. The Radical paper, "El Debate," demands that all business done under such forced conditions shall be annulled. Matters are in a state of extraordinary deadlock.

LIFE IN THE CAPITAL

MUNICIPAL STATISTICS.

During the month of October the official figures concerning the population, which have just been published show an increase of 57 immigrants over a previous period and which is stated to have brought the city population up to 1,595,408 inhabitants. Of the 3,310 arrivals the majority were Spaniards.

967 marriages have been contracted during the month and 3,493 births, while 2,312 deaths have been recorded.

The figures of the matrimonial market are very low and the report refers to the "crisis," without explanation defining which crisis. In the corresponding month of 1914 there were 1196 marriages and 4365 births.

Marriage is still popular in outlying districts and shows a corresponding increase over previous years.

PATRIOTIC FUNDS

BRITISH WOMEN'S PATRIOTIC ASSOCIATION

The usual monthly meeting of the Association was held on Friday, at the Plaza Hotel, Mrs. Withington in the Chair.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

The two pictures donated by Mrs. Oliveira Cezar which were raffled by Mrs. Corry Smith in aid of the Officers' Families' Fund, realised $28, and were won by Mr. H. Tully Gregg and Mr. J. W. Barclay, respectively. The same Fund benefitted to the extent of $4082 as the result of the fete held at Hurlingham on the 6th of November, which was most successful.

On the 5th and 6th November the Tienda a la Ciudad de Londres held a sale, part proceeds of which were donated to the Allies Countries Red Cross Funds, the British Red Cross receiving $758.15 m/l. The warmest thanks of the Association to the Manager of the Ciudad de Londres are recorded.

The raffle of Mrs. Withington's mare at the Media Luna Polo Tournament realised $700, half of which amount has been sent to the Association to be forwarded to the Blue Cross Fund.

The dance organised by Mrs. Lindop at La Plata realised $1548.85, which was divided as follows:—

British Red Cross . . .	$1,000
French Red Cross . . .	274.85
Belgian Red Cross . . .	274

The ladies of St. Saviour's Guild, Belgrano, have forwarded to the Association the amount of $926.85, one-half of the net proceeds of the Sweet Pea and Rose Show. This amount has been forwarded, in accordance with the wishes of the subscribers to the Ladies' Emergency Committee of the Navy League, which sends food, tobacco, underclothing, and money to the Royal Navy Prisoners of War in Germany every week.

Letters of thanks from the Officers' Families' Fund for a donation of £250, and from the Prince of Wales's Fund for £500 were reported, as well as a letter from Mrs. McClure advising that further two cases of clothing for hospital use had been received and distributed. Apart from the value of the contents the kind thought for the needs of the soldiers thus practically expressed is very gratifying to the recipients; the letter states that body-belts are not at present urgently required.

A special appeal to the Members of the Association is made by Mrs. Ernest Drabble, who is shortly leaving for England, and is anxious to take with her as large a quantity as possible of old kid gloves. These are used for lining waistcoats and other garments, and give great warmth without adding much to the weight and at little cost. These should be sent to the Women's Exchange, Cangallo 623.

A preliminary announcement is made of the fact that a Sale of Work will be held in April next, the entire proceeds of which will be devoted to the British Red Cross. Every article sold is to be the actual handiwork of women and children all over the Republic, and an opportunity will thus be afforded not only of contributing to a worthy cause, but of showing what the skill and energy of British women can produce. As an example, articles of needlework, clothing, fancy articles, pictures, preserves, anything and everything made by women. Further announcements regarding the date and the address to which contributions should be sent will be made in due course.

The following statement was presented by the Honorary Treasurer, and a further remittance of £200 will be sent to the Officers' Families' Fund, as the result of subscriptions received at the meeting. It will be sent by telegraphic transfer as a Christmas present.

HELP THE BELGIANS

THE HERALD Fund

A TIMELY DONATION

Mr. William Reid Lewis, Hon. Secretary of the Bexhill Belgian Refugee Committee, to which organisation all funds subscribed by readers of THE HERALD have been sent, has written as follows to the Manager of THE HERALD, in acknowledgment of the last remittance of £50.13.4, sent on October 4:—

Dear Sir:—I wish I could tell you exactly how grateful I am to you and your readers for the draft which you have so kindly sent with your favour of the 4th ultimo. Yesterday we were in doubt if we should be able to keep things going much longer. Local contributions have fallen off; so many other claims present themselves that we have to use bait to attract. London now doubles all we collect, so that I am going to use your remittance as a bait for another £50, and this hundred London will double, so your people have laid the foundation for a couple of hundred pounds for us, which means going on. Again very many thanks for your generous kindness.

BELGIUM SOLDIERS LEAVE

AN APPEAL FOR HOLIDAY SHELTER.

The Indépendance Belge, formerly of Brussels now that it is of Tudor Street, London, (a paper of weight as it was formerly) has issued a strong appeal on behalf of the Belgian soldiers (what are left of the brave fellows) after 15 months of incessant and desperate fighting. The appeal is to those who may be willing and able to give a soldier a few days rest during his seven days leave from the front. A subscription list has been opened in the columns of the paper and appeal has been addressed to the British Press and people generally.

NURSE CAVELL'S LAST WORDS

"... I must have no hatred nor bitterness towards anyone."

You have spoken a great word, Martyr, As you faced your lonely Cross, To us who so often barter God's gold for the Devil's dross.

He must lose his life who would save it. Nor hate nor bitterness feel, The lesson is worth that we grave it On granite with keen-edged steel.

It has thrilled through the world like lightning, That last great word you spoke; It points where the dawn is brightening Above this Hell-born smoke.

SEAFARER'S TOBACCO FUND

Last night as usual the local gentlemen and gentlemen of the sea who take an interest in the British soldier and his provision of tobacco, met together on the roof of the Seamen's Mission, the evening being warm, under the canopy of Heaven.

Mr. A. G. Pruden is an exemplary Chairman and never misses a meeting. There were present also the Rev. H. Westy Brady, Captain Lewin of Houstons, Captain Samson of Houlders, Captain Colley s.s. Kelvinbank, Captain Shaw s.s. Corinthia, Mr. Gall, Mr. Neilson, Mr. Jones s.s. Sutherland Grange, Mr. Jones s.s. Thessaly, Mr. Owens s.s. Hermione, and Mr. F. E. Beatty Hon. Secretary. The minutes having been read and approved the Rev. H. W. Brady, Hon. Treasurer, recorded the receipt of the following sums:—

s.s. Highland Brigade $104, s.s. Howsker $33, s.s. Scottish Prince $25.

The latter had already contributed recently to the solicitations of young ladies for the Belgian Fund.

The entire total collected has now therefore reached the splendid total of $5,806.82 and there is a balance in hand of $465. It was then considered upon which seat of war the next benediction of my Lady Nicotine should be bestowed. The Rev. W. H. Brady stated on the authority of a letter from a relative Vice-Admiral Moore that the mine sweepers were supposed to be already well provided in the matter of tobacco. After some debate, it was decided that France was not so immediately pressing as Gallipoli and that to the Eastern theatre of war £40 or such sum as might be available, should be despatched. A letter read for Captain Caper now on that station, led to the inference that those navigating Levantine waters are better informed of what passes in Buenos Aires than in the Dardanelles or at Salonika.

Captains Colley and Shaw were appointed to the Seafarer's Committee. Mr. Pruden pointing out that it was not desired to expend the money of the donors without taking their advice and that the presence of Captains and Sea officers is earnestly desired at the meetings. Mr. Beatty read some post cards of appreciation and thanks from soldiers in France who had received tobacco and there being no further business the meeting dissolved.

In writing of his intention, Mr. Noakes says: "I am sorry to leave Argentina, but as my country needs me, I must go. I would have gone before, but was not of military age. I am now 19, however, and am quite willing to do my share in my country's cause."

PRISONERS IN GERMANY

AN APPEAL TO HUMANITARIANS.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—The telegram in THE HERALD of Saturday dated London Dec. 10th, re the inhuman treatment of prisoners in Germany, fills one with intense pain. I am writing to ask if you think it would be possible to open a subscription on their behalf, to be worked in this way. The Daily Graphic in London undertakes to send hampers direct to the prisoners containing the following:—

1 lb. oatmeal biscuits,
1 plum cake,
½ lb. chocolate,
6 cubes of vegetable and meat compound,
2 oz. tea,
¼ milk powder,
1 cake soap,
50 cigarettes.

for the small sum of 5 shillings inclusive.

Now I think children and young people may be asked to give a portion of that which they would otherwise spend on themselves to alleviate and brighten, if only for a few hours, the dismal lot of these poor unfortunate men. I know it is only a drop in the ocean, but I think it cultivates a spirit of thankfulness in those who receive, and most certainly unselfishness in those who help. And when a certain sum has been obtained, send a cheque crossed Secretary and Co., Daily Graphic, Tallis street, London, E.C.

If you think the scheme workable, I will send donations to you proceeding from things that I have already initiated in Lomas. I may tell you that 11 hampers, or at least the money for them, have already left Lomas, and that there is no doubt about those for whom they are intended getting them, the distribution being looked after by an American and British commission.

Yours, etc.

HUMANITARIAN.

[We have already considered the points raised by "Humanitarian," and only the multitudinous demands for donations to other funds have prevented us from opening a fund for the amelioration of the conditions under which helpless British prisoners live in Germany. The work suggested by our correspondent is a noble one and should commend itself to HERALD readers. We shall be glad to receive any monies sent to us for the proposed fund.—Ed B.A.H.]

The following donations have been received by THE HERALD towards the fund for providing comforts for British prisoners of war in Germany:—

Mrs. Taylor $5.00
Miss Taylor 5.00

Total $10.00

BRITAIN'S SAILORMEN

CONTRASTED WITH POLITICIANS.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—Referring to the article "Los Errores de Inglaterra" in La Nación of the 6th inst it is difficult to find an excuse for England.

All the cries are a result of the shifting of power from the silent sailortype of man to the garrulous politician.

Look at the fine frank physiognomy of Admiral Sir Henry Jackson showing the man of action and iron will and compare it with the wrinkled, subtle faces of most of the present politicians in power expressing dozens of minds and undecidedness in every person.

Put the Anglo-Saxon and Norman sailor in power and he will manage the war to a speedy victorious end. The mixture race of wordy self-conceited politicians has amply proved its incapacity.

Yours, etc.,

CARLOS DE MILLAR.

EXTENSION OF STATE RAILWAYS

Engineer Rapelli, the Director-General of State Railways, has returned from an extended tour of inspection of the outlying districts of these railways, and the lines at present under construction.

Some negotiations had been entered into with the Pacific Railway, with a view to running trains in connection with the State Railways, and it is stated that these have ended satisfactorily.

Engineer Rapelli stated that the line in construction at Metan al Este will be finished on February 1. This line will open up a wide stretch of country now under maize, wheat and alfalfa.

Work on the branch line between Milagro and Candelaria has been begun. This line will in time be extended to San Luis.

HIS NEIGHBOUR'S WIFE

ALLEGED ATTEMPTED CAPTURE BY OFFICER.

San Luis is enjoying a first-class society scandal in which a gallant officer is, according to "La Razon," directly implicated.

The warrior in question may have been reading Roman history, and have decided to get him a fair lady, after the manner of Romulus, or "Ivanhoe," and proposed to play the Bold Templar. Anyhow, it is stated that Commandante Fernandez Basualdo, Jefe de Batallon of the 16th Infantry, has committed an "abuso de fuerza," has not having the fear of God before his eyes, and being led away by the Devil, violently and with force and arms, endeavoured to take, steal, and carry away certain properties, goods and chattels belonging and pertaining to Deputy Doctor Avancibia Rodriguez, to wit, his wife, Doña Georgina R. de Avancibia, treating that lady, who is of good house and high reputation, as if she were a person of no consideration, and in fact, "a woman of no importance."

All this reads like a page of Dumas rather than a sober chronicle of events in a respectable Argentine city, especially as the officer is said to have called up his merry men to his back to aid him, namely a corporal and a private. It is to be hoped that the whole statement is either exaggerated or a romantic imagination, although it is asserted that this is the second time that an attempt of the kind has been made.

Joint War Committee of the British Red Cross Society and the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, 83, Pall Mall, London, S.W.

Oct. 12, 1915.

To British Women of Campana—

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your valued contribution, as specified hereunder, for which the Joint Committee is deeply grateful.

An acknowledgment of the same will also appear in the columns of the "Times" on an early date.

R. A. HUDSON,

Chairman of the Joint Finance Committee.

DOÑA ZELMINA DIAZ DE PAZ.

On Dec. 10 there died a lady who constituted one of the disappearing links between the Buenos Aires of to-day and the vigorous, yet essentially different life of former years in the Argentine capital.

Doña Zelmina Diaz de Paz, was a daughter of the famous Colonel Pedro José Diaz, who when General Lavalle was defeated at Quebracho Herrado in 1840, refused to leave the field and was made prisoner by the forces of Rosas under Don Manuel Oribe. Sta.

Diaz became the wife of another eminent Argentine who has left deep traces of his personality and life's work on the country and its literary and journalistic life, Dr. José C. Paz, founder of "La Prensa," to whom, it is recorded that her character, at once amiable and energetic, unselfish and inspiring, was at all times a great stay and help in his arduous work in the inception and conduct of the great journal, which is his worthiest monument. Doña Paz was a clever and intelligent collaborator, and her intuition and keen feminine perceptions no less than the feminine virtues which adorned her character, made her a notable figure in the intellectual and Social life of the country. General sympathy will be felt with Dr. Ezequiel Paz and the members of the family in their bereavement, which was however, not unexpected, the deceased lady having long suffered from an illness borne with exemplary resignation and Christian fortitude.

JAMES TOD CALLANDER.

On Sunday afternoon the funeral of the late Mr. J. T. Callander took place at the British section of the Chacarita Cemetery. The deceased has been long resident in the Argentine, and died at the age of 58 years.

An impressive service was held at the graveside, the Rev. J. W. Cameron being the officiating clergyman. There were no flowers by request, and only the most intimate friends of the deceased attended the funeral.

VICTORIA SAILOR'S HOME

SUCCESSFUL CONCERT

It is a long time since such an audience as on Saturday was present at a concert given at the Victoria Sailors' Home. The scarcity of shipping has been the cause of small audiences, but although no apparent increase was noticeable, yesterday the hall was crowded. The excellence of Mrs David Herald's arrangements was undoubtedly the cause, and a programme of exceptional quality was given. So numerous were the encores and so appreciated the items that half an hour past the usual time the concert was still proceeding.

Mrs. Eidelberg made a welcome re-appearance and was in great voice and repeatedly encored for her songs. Mrs. Bowditch, too, was just as pleasing and charming in her singing as ever.

Two items of a somewhat unusual character were introduced: one a clever sketch by Mr. A. B. Grinham which was immensely appreciated, and a ventriloquial entertainment by Mr. Robert Brooking, who returns to Buenos Aires after some months' absence in the States. It was an excellent performance.

Mr. Miguel Murphy is a singer all too seldom heard. He possesses a fine voice and uses it well, singing with feeling and a knowledge of each song's requirements. "Violets" and "Star of my Soul" and "Sympathy" were among the chosen songs.

Mr. Crawley was in good form at the piano, and Miss E. Woodwell was delightful with her violin playing. These artists' names, together with those of Mrs. and Mr. Herald, are sufficient proof of the excellence of the entertainment.

Mrs. Herald herself was as inimitable as ever and deserves many congratulations for her efforts.

Mrs. White was the accompanist of the evening.

ARGENTINE TRADE PROSPECTS

ENTRE RIOS RAILWAY RETURNS.

London, Dec. 10.

Presiding at the annual general meeting of shareholders of the Entre Rios Railway, Mr. Follett Holt dwelt on the causes of the past bad year and the good progress since made. He said that there was every indication of a return to normal conditions. The Argentine Republic was steadily recovering from the depression of the past three years.

Telegrams from the manager were very favourable regarding the harvest, and stated that the demand for cattle and general goods was excellent.

WHO WERE THE RED INDIANS?

The following curious theory has been elaborated by an American playwright, Orestes Bean, in the New York "Sun." Mr. Bean has turned the old Indian legends into use for his play, "An Aztec Romance":—

After many years of study I am impelled to the conclusion that the Indians of North and South America are a branch of the Jewish race driven from Palestine under a curse, as were the sons of Ham. In this opinion I am supported by some of the most illustrious names known to exploration, archaeology and science.

Among the American Indians there are not only a great many of the old Hebrew traditions, but mute magnificent monuments left by their ancestors prove beyond doubt that they are an offshoot of the ancient inhabitants of Palestine.

The thought of the Indians being a descendant of the old Jewish race was not at first seriously entertained by the white races because we have known the Indians a long time and many believe they have never told us anything about it.

Let us see whether or not they have.

P. de Roo, the celebrated traveller and archaeologist, relates an experience he had with an old Indian chief. He says the chief gave him an account of his origin which tallied in every respect with the book of Exodus except that it was "Topiltzin, the great chief," who led his forefathers to the border of the sea and struck the waters with his staff, whereupon they divided, permitting his followers to pass through, after which the sea flowed back, drowning the pursuing enemy, of whom nothing had been heard since.

The Cherokees had a precious possession which they called the sacred ark. They believed that this ark contained the spirit of their deity and they always carried the ark with them on their expeditions of hunting and war, feeling confident that no harm could come to them while the ark was in their possession. Who can doubt that this was an echo of the Hebrew Ark of the Covenant?

Columbus found the same tradition among the natives of Cuba. Not only the exodus, but the story of the flood was familiar to them. These natives told the great discoverer of the American continent that when the flood had abated the great chief offered sacrifices; that he built a vineyard, became intoxicated on wine and was disgraced by one of his sons. Some of the tribes told Columbus that they descended from a great chieftain who had twelve sons.

Quotations from the books of Exodus and Deuteronomy were written upon a parchment encased within rawhide and covered with pitch which was found in an old mound at Pittsfield, Mass., in 1815. These quotations were written in ancient Hebrew, indicating that he who wrote them must have been separated from the Hebrew race before their captivity by Nebuchadnezzar. The reason for this hypothesis is that after their captivity the Jews wrote what is called the modern Hebrew, which has vowel points and terminal endings.

In the fifth volume of his history Hubert Howe Bancroft gives a detailed account of the finding of a stone tablet in one of the mounds near Newark, Ohio. On this tablet written in ancient Hebrew were the Ten Commandments. This would seem to be conclusive proof that the builders of that mound were descendants of the ancient Hebrew race since no ancient people save the Jews possessed the Ten Commandments.

Lord Kingsborough in his work on Mexican antiquities says that the Toltecs had paintings representing a garden with a single tree in the midst of it and a woman. It was well understood among the Toltecs that this figure represented the first woman, the mother of the entire human race, who is painted black because she tempted the first man to partake of the forbidden fruit.

Perhaps no more poetic legend was ever written than that encountered in Cholula which ascribes to Suchiguacal the unpardonable sin of gathering roses from a tree, which brought everlasting disgrace upon herself and her posterity.

In his book entitled "American Hebrew" Adair says that the Cherokee and Creek tribes in the far past had cities of refuge which offered harbour and absolute protection to anyone charged with a crime until he was proved guilty. Is it not manifest where that civic custom came from? The tribes living on the borders of the Great Lakes had a traditional account of the Creation, the Flood, and in fact all of the epic events in the lives of the ancient Hebrews as related in the Bible.

How many people know that within walking distance of Lexington, Kentucky, a city lies buried, that catacombs have been unearthed there revealing mummies in as good a state of preservation as any that ever came out of the catacombs of Egypt? Where did the ancient people who buried their dead there acquire the art of embalming if not from the children of Israel before their exodus from Egypt?

Embalming such as the Egyptians and the ancient Americans knew implies a sturdy belief in the resurrection of the body and of course the immortality of the soul. As Ingersoll put it, "The dusty mummies are still waiting for the resurrection promised by their priests."

The history and customs of the Aztec race are replete with Hebrew analogies, for instance, barren women were not allowed to enter their sacred places. Also a mother was excluded from the temples and all places of worship for a certain period after the birth of her child. This was a conspicuous Hebrew custom, as all readers of the Bible know.

On every hand the delvers into America's dim past have encountered evidences following upon evidences that tend to establish the Hebraic origin of the ancient inhabitants of the Western Hemisphere. Both in North and South America, in almost every tribe, the Scriptural stories of the children of Israel reappear in one form or another.

It has always seemed to me to be more than passing strange that the American people have taken so little interest in the archaeology of their own country.

Unearth a statue or a tablet in Egypt or Palestine and the news is spread broadcast throughout the world and read with interest by millions of people. Immediately some philanthropists come forward with a few hundred thousand dollars to finance an expedition to go to the scene of the discovery and dig for more statues.

Unearth the ruins of a temple in Mexico, bearing the signs and symbols that adorned the Temple of Solomon, and the fact will scarcely spread beyond the small circle of scientists immediately interested in the discovery. Ruins, like prophets, are known except in their own country.

Queen Alexandra is not only a doctor of music, but she has acquired remarkable proficiency as a connoisseur of old china and porcelain. She is also an excellent floriculturist, and at not a few important flower shows Her Majesty's exhibits carry off prizes. Flowers have been a life study to her, and she takes the greatest interest in gardening. Another favourite occupation of the Queen is letter-writing. She attends to most of her extensive correspondence, writing hundreds of letters personally

ZEPPELIN RAIDS

While the London newspapers are not permitted by the Censor to give any details of the Zeppelin raids on England, it is notorious in Buenos Aires that the most minute descriptions of the raids and the results, are given in private correspondence, which apparently is never censored. THE HERALD has received two letters from women dealing with the most recent raids, which are full of details of the nature that the Censor does not consider should be known to the enemy. In publishing the letters we observe the spirit and intention of a proper military censorship, by omitting dates, names, and places.

The first letter says:—"On Wednesday we had Zeppelins here. Two passed within 300 yards of the hospital and dropped bombs five minutes walk away. Of course we had been expecting raids nightly and had been kept practically in the dark, having to creep about with flash lights. On Wednesday night we scarcely thought of Zeppelins when about 10.30 we heard the most awful explosions and we rushed to the windows and there was a Zep. almost over the hospital. It looked like a big red cigar. The searchlights were on it and it looked all alight. There were about a dozen most terrible explosions and then big fires began to blaze. All patients jumped out of bed and there was great excitement of course. We were all a bit scared—thought they would be on us any minute. One of my patients got such a shock that he became unconscious. I thought he was going to die, and that gave me a worse shock than the bombs. It was an exciting night. Great fires were blazing in several places over London. Next morning the Matron complimented the staff on the way they had behaved. You will laugh when I say I would not have missed it for anything. The next day I went to see the damage. Houses were burned down and windows smashed for whole streets. I should think there were many casualties. We had over forty brought to us. I don't suppose we shall ever have such a near thing again and we ought to be very thankful. If the hospital had been struck I should lose faith in everything."

The second letter, written from a religious institution, says:—"Since my return there have been many Zeppelin raids along the east coast and inland, and many lives have been lost. The first bad one came as far as—and—about three miles from here. Terrible bombs were dropped and over 40 people were killed. Small raids continued after this until on—when at 10.45 p.m. a huge Zeppelin appeared, so high that it looked about three feet long, though they are over 520 feet in length. This one was revealed right over our Hospice and home by searchlights. Then instantly a most terrifying crash came, that made all in bed start from their sleep, spring to the floor and put on habit and veil and rush to the chapel while crash after crash seemed about to crush us all. We all shouted out our prayers, trembling with fright, until quiet came at 11 p.m. We all, after a prayer of thanksgiving, went up to the top windows, and found the horizon ablaze with terrible fires in (suburbs mentioned). This cowardly warfare is a disgrace to humanity; the lives of poor defenceless people sacrificed for no purpose whatever."

The writer goes on to say that the Zeppelin was seen by everyone for miles around, and there were others which the searchlights did not reveal. She adds that the terror caused by the raid is dying down, and then continues:—"The Government have wakened up. Twenty-five big French airships came over at once and the raiders have been chased back since. Some Italian aircraft are also helping the hundreds of British that are now guarding the sky, and huge guns are being placed in all directions to repel attacks."

THE EQUALITY OF THE SEXES

We are all accustomed nowadays to the idea of sex equality. Its feasibility has been proved in so many ways, most of them severely practical. Literally as well as figuratively woman wears the trousers, as a glance at any illustrated paper dealing with the work of women at home will show. Nor can man claim to be the sole user of the soothing pipe; indeed for years past old Irish marketwomen have enjoyed the solace of the short 'dudheen.' There was, however, one article of male utility which was sacrosanct until quite recently. No woman ever touched a razor—save to touch up a pencil point occasionally, and then always with the firm belief that 'John would never notice it.'

John's own effeminacy must be blamed for what follows. So long as he kept the trenchant steels, one for each day of the week, sheathed in translucent ivory or encased in businesslike looking vulcanite, his razors were reasonably safe. They did not figure on Milady's toilette table, though—tell it not in Gath—an old razor might lie at the very back of the drawer for pedicular purposes. Time, and the ingenious American inventor, brought the safety razor, perfected it, and John fell. Instead of scientifically stropping his blade preparatory to removing his superfluous hair, he inserted a thin sliver of steel and went over his face with a brightly nickelled instrument rather reminiscent of a rake. It was a fall from the days of the Wilkinson or Rogers, but still it was shaving. And Milady had nothing to shave—nothing immediately visible that is to say!

Yet the dainty little instrument in its 'dinky' leather-covered, silk-lined, box, drew the attention of Eve. She bought it very largely, ostensibly for presents, actually because she liked to look at it beforehand, put it together, try it on the back of her hand. Happy thought, why not get one of her own? The Décolleté dress afforded the excuse, and, says an American advertisement, "Milady Décolleté Razor is welcomed by women everywhere." It is, one still quotes the advertisement, "a beautiful addition to Milady's toilette table, and one that solves an embarrassing personal problem now that a feature of good dressing is to keep the under-arm white and smooth." There you have it. The cat is out of the bag, and a new suggestion for a Christmas gift is at your disposal. A harmless vanity, though likely to make the dressing hour still further prolonged. The man who invented the safety razor must bear the blame. One's only dread now is that the custom may grow and the fair sex, enamoured of this new and eminently comfortable way of removing superfluous hair—for a time—be tempted to emulate the performances of their sisters in the land of O Mimosa San. That would indeed be a calamity for mankind, especially if after a month or so, fashions were to change and shaving again become dé modé.

THE MERE MALE.

SOME WOMEN AND MANY THINGS

—The Empress of Russia on one occasion paid £1000 for a handkerchief, the manufacture of which had occupied seven years.

—The Korean wife must have an exceedingly busy time, for besides doing the washing for the whole family, she acts as tailor as well; she makes all the clothing for her husband, her children, and herself.

—The Hon. Elaine Jenkins, younger daughter of the late Lord Glantawe, is a clever business woman. She has since her father's death had a great control in the family in South Wales. She has had practical experience of it for some time, as Lord Glantawe took her into his confidence, and entrusted her with his private business deliberations for quite a long time.

Land of Lilliput.

Conducted by Egeria

My dear Lilliputians,

I am quite pleased to be able to write to you this week as usual, by which statement you will understand that my Lilliputian is getting better, and I can think of something other than hot baths, and ice caps.

But when one sees illness, it makes one think of the terrible sufferings of the soldiers, where it is not so easy to get the things to lessen the agonies of fevers and the pains from lost limbs.

I had a letter from England by the last mail in which it stated that Wimbledon Common is being used for the soldiers, and all its wild beauty being destroyed. In fact all England is becoming a big hospital or parade grounds for our soldiers. Of course you know that everybody is sending clothes and things to the soldiers; but do you know that the Russian soldiers are wearing paper uniforms? You might think the poor soldier who had to wear paper would be miserably cold; but they are not, those wearing it being much warmer than those with the ordinary kind of clothing. You know that the country where paper is used so much is Japan, and it is the Japanese who make "Ramiko" or paper uniforms. And it is made from mulberry bark with a thin layer of silk wadding between two sheets, which is then quilted. When the Japanese were fighting in Siberia they found out the value of this kind of clothing in winter time, and now a company in Yokohama is supplying paper shirts to the Russian army. The only drawback to the garments is they won't wash.

All sorts of stories are told about the disabled soldiers returned to England. One man blinded, has learnt rowing and swimming, and to read with his finger tips rapidly enough to enjoy a book, and he can use a typewriter at a good speed. He is now training for massage and is studying anatomy and physiology—so a blind man's life need not be an unhappy one. Another story is told of a soldier who had become blind, deaf and dumb from the effects of the explosion of the shells on the battle-field. He gradually recovered his sight and hearing, but not his speech. One night he dreamt he was back on the battle-field and he suddenly cried out, "They're shelling us, for God's sake wake up." And since then he has been able to speak as usual.

I think you might like to read all about the Mediterranean in History, so I am printing it for you this week.

The Mediterranean, the sea noted above all others for the beauty and fascination of its shores and islands, the largest of all inland seas, is also by far the most famous historically, none other having played so brilliant a part in the history of mankind.

To the writers of sacred story, the sea on which the splendid argosies of ancient Tyre traded to the limits of the known world was the "Great Sea," for to them the greater seas which we call oceans were practically unknown. To the Apostle Paul, who crossed it so many times, the Mediterranean was "The Sea," for no other was of importance in comparison with it. And in modern times, looking back over many centuries from his viewpoint in the eighteenth, Dr. Johnson summed up its glory and man's indebtedness thus: "The grand object of travelling is to see the shores of the Mediterranean. On these shores were the four great empires of the world—the Assyrian, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman. All our religion, almost all our law, almost all our arts, almost all that sets us above savages, has come to us from the shores of the Mediterranean."

On or near these shores, in truth, are to be found the scenes of all the greatest events in sacred and classic history, for the Mediterranean, as its name implies, was in the very heart and middle of the earth in the days when civilisation was confined to South-western Asia, South-eastern Europe, and Northern Africa.

For ages the known world was essentially the "World of Mediterranean." On its borders nations prospered and advanced, while away from it were to be found generally only ancient decayed civilisations or backward, more or less primitive tribes not yet stimulated to mental activity or inspired by corporate ideals. "Like frogs around a swamp, so have we settled down on the shores of this sea," said Plato; and so it was.

TYRE, SIDON, AND CARTHAGE.

In the earliest times of which we have definite knowledge, Tyre and Sidon, in the Eastern Mediterranean, were great cities of the Phœnicians, the most enterprising and wealthy traders of ancient days. Phœnician merchant adventurers were probably the first people to sail beyond the Pillars of Hercules (Gibraltar Rock and that of Ceuta on the African side) and trade with uncivilised Britain and Gaul and islands far away to the north. Along the coast of Northern Africa they had founded colonies—Carthage, the most famous and splendid—and they and the ancient Greeks, their great rivals, had established themselves on all the borders of the great sea and on its many beautiful islands. In the meantime Rome had been founded by the union of two or three settlements, and gradually (during about 300 years B.C.), by conquest it grew from a dominant city to a great empire, including all the Mediterranean lands, European, Asiatic, and African—all the civilised world of the day. To the Romans, the Mediterranean became "Mare Nostrum," our sea, for no other people could claim supremacy along any part of its shores.

Even when the old Roman Empire crumbled to pieces, during the fifth to the eighth centuries, and new States arose in which had been the wilds of Central and Western Europe, the Mediterranean lost none of its importance as the world's chief sea. Later the Crusaders helped to maintain its supremacy by the impetus they gave to trade with the East. The growing demand for Oriental produce which the Crusaders had introduced to their home countries led to the opening up of many new land routes, European and Asiatic, and as all these terminated on the Mediterranean, its cities retained the monopoly of the world's commerce. Venice, which has played a great part in the business of transporting the soldiers of the Cross to the Holy Land, became a chief centre for the distribution of Eastern produce through Western Europe, and in time rose to be not only the "Queen of the Adriatic," but one of the greatest maritime Powers of the Middle Ages. Genoa being the next in importance of the Italian maritime States.

THE MIDDLE SEA'S "DECLINE."

The last decade of the fifteenth century saw the beginning of the end of the Mediterranean's pre-eminence. Portugal, anxious to find a sea route to the East for trade purposes, sent Vasco da Gama round the Cape of Good Hope, which Diaz (also a Portuguese) had discovered in 1486, to search for such, and he reached India in 1497. Meanwhile, Columbus, working for Spain and thinking that Portugal was not taking the best way to attain what was the great ambition of both countries, started boldly westward to find India, and so discovered a new world.

The changes brought about by these discoveries were among the greatest ever known, and their effects were very far-reaching. The chief trading enterprise of Europe was gradually transferred from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic, and Western Asia and Italy, which had been the great intermediaries between the Orient and the West, lost their international importance. Their day was passing to sunset, and the new day of the States of Western Europe was dawning.

Other factors contributed to the change. The Ottoman Turks had swept into Eastern Europe, and their conquest of Constantinople (1453) and gradual annexation of the Balkan Peninsula and islands, Syria, and Egypt—all the Eastern Mediterranean lands—brought a blight upon these countries. At the same time the Reformation was breaking up the old religious tyranny in Western, Central, and Northern Europe; the Revival of Learning widened the whole field of thought and knowledge, made men realise their own powers, and taught them how to use their powers to advantage; and the Continental States that remained unaffected by the Ottoman conquests or threats of conquest awakened to a new and vigorous life.

Spain and Portugal, France, the Netherlands, and England rose rapidly as maritime Powers, and struggled for supremacy. Sea trade was extended to Guinea, India, and Brazil along Atlantic routes, and it is interesting to note that, to lessen England's dependence on foreign vessels, Henry VII gave special encouragement to shipbuilding, and brought the English navy into being in the sixteenth century.

Thus trade and power marched westward. New centres—Lisbon, Cadiz, Bordeaux, Nantes, Amsterdam, London, Bristol—arose as time passed in connection with the new routes. The difficult and dangerous land routes through Western Asia to the Orient were abandoned, and the Mediterranean, instead of being, as it had for so long been, the world's main thoroughfare, became a sort of cul de sac, leading only to its own ports. The old proud supremacy of the "Great Sea" was a thing of the past.

THE UNIMPORTANCE OF "GIB."

It was significant that the capture of Gibraltar for Britain in 1704 was regarded as of no importance whatever, and Sir George Rooke was displaced for having failed in other attacks which now appear as trifling compared with his splendid achievement at the old Pillars of Hercules. Gibraltar has proved an invaluable possession to us, giving command of the entrance to the Mediterranean, helping to protect our trade therein, serving as an outfitting and sheltering port for our warships when necessary, and a coaling station for these and for our merchant and passenger ships in modern times. But this is a digression, and has carried us beyond the point as regards Mediterranean history.

With the discovery of new lands and new routes came the extension of European empires by the acquisition of possessions abroad, and through this, together with the great commercial and social progress which accompanied it, the new maritime Powers soon left the old States of Continental Europe far behind.

Then followed an era of struggle for colonial supremacy, in which Spain and Portugal were soon superseded, and Britain finally won the first place, holding sway over the newest lands of the New World and the oldest civilisations of the Old.

THE SUEZ ROUTE

As commercial and political relations with the East grew more and more important attention was focussed increasingly on the 70 odd miles of land—the Isthmus of Suez—which separated the navigable waters of the Eastern Mediterranean from those of the Red Sea, thus preventing direct sea communication by the shortest route with Oriental countries. In 1837 an attempt was made to overcome this natural disadvantage by the construction of a road from Alexandria

FRENCHWOMEN'S MESSAGE TO ENGLAND

The women of France have addressed the following eloquent and touching address to the women of England in reference to the murder of Miss Edith Cavell by the German military authorities:—

"To our sisters of England.

"The women of France unite with you in the feelings of horror, admiration, and indignation with which your hearts are filled in consequence of the martyrdom of Edith Cavell. We Frenchwomen wish to assure you that this tragedy has moved us even as it has moved you. Our tears mingle with your tears. Our hands stretch out to clasp yours more tenderly and more firmly than ever before.

"Be assured that our soldiers are as resolved as your noble volunteers to avenge this innocent victim, this model of patriotism, whose sublime end will be an example for ever.

"Edith Cavell was the embodiment of the highest qualities which we admire in you all. She went to execution like a true Englishwoman—calmly, piously, proudly, wearing on her heart the colours of her country. She is our sister, too. Oh! sisters of England, we shall love you better because of her. In her adorable image we shall picture your image.

"All honour to England who glories in such daughters. The women of France will contribute with you to the glorification of that pure heroine. We shall draw closer together in remembrance of her, and the women of France and England will have the strength to accept to the end the hardest necessities of a war which must liberate the world and secure justice for all people against tyrants."

This address is signed by a committee of notable Frenchwomen, including Mesdames Juliette Adam, Alphonse Daudet, Jeanne Deroulede, Raymond Poincaré, René Viviani, Emile Zola, the Duchesse de Rohan, and the Duchesse Uzès.

LEAVING THE WAY OPEN

Herbert was confiding his troubles in a friend.

"Yes, she refused me," he said, with a curious smile; "but she did it in a most encouraging way."

"How was that?" asked the friend. "It doesn't seem to worry you much."

"As I went away she pointed to my footprints on the linoleum in the hall, and said: 'Next time you come to propose to me, I hope you'll remember to wipe your boots on the mat!'" through Cairo to Suez, the original "overland route." This solved the difficulty for passenger traffic, bringing Bombay 5000 miles or more nearer to England as compared with the Cape route, but it was too expensive for merchandise. Napoleon had formed the project of a ship canal during his Egyptian campaign, reviving an idea which had been frequently considered in ancient and mediaeval times, but his defeat prevented further developments. Not until 1856 was the present canal begun, and 13 years were required for the undertaking. In 1869 the Suez Canal was opened for navigation, and the land barrier which had made the Mediterranean a blind alley, so far as shipping was concerned, was thus swept away.

Once more the world-importance of the Great Sea of the Ancients was acknowledged, for again as in the past it became a great highway, the most expeditious and the most interesting route to the luxuriant East. But its beautiful cities can never again claim the monopoly of world-commerce that they retained for long centuries. Civilisation and commerce have spread in the meantime to the uttermost parts of the earth, and the days when men and nations flourished only on the shores of the Mediterranean belong to the remote past.

BELGRANO PRESBYTERIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL

A DELIGHTFUL DAY AT QUINTA AGUIRRE.

Belgrano Presbyterian Sunday School went for their annual outing on Dec. 11, by kind invitation to the beautiful estate of Quinta Aguirre at San Isidro. When mustered at Belgrano Station they made, as regards numbers quite an imposing array, there being not less than one hundred and sixty persons present, including scholars, friends and parents. The Rev. José Felices took charge of the Spanish speaking contingent of the young people. The beauties of Quinta Aguirre have been described before by previous enthusiasts, and may on this occasion be "taken as read" for they are very genuine. The weather was delightful, on the hot side indeed, but the presence of the Arroyo de la Plata induced an agreeable breeze, and as everybody likes to return from such an expedition with the bronzed aspect of the hardy rover, no one really objected very much even to the ferocity of Phoebus. Dissipations of a mild and delightful kind made the time fly, and, among these, paddling in the pellucid shallows of Estuary (or is it River?) was easily first. It is really delightful, especially if you can wash and wipe your feet afterwards, and it adds a realistic tone; it is genuine water anyway, some of it. Throughout the day the sun shone, the breeze blew and the leaves rustled and "dappled" the sward as laid down in the programme, and according to precedent. The weather delivered the goods and the children enjoyed themselves very thoroughly, while those whom "Dream Days" styles "The Olympians" also thawed in the genial warmth and un-bent. Subsequently there was of course refreshments, and as the bard observes:

"How fled the sugar from the bowl,
How sunk the azure cream."
But there was nothing blue at this affair about cream, faces or anything else but the sky which might have furnished material for many millions of "banderas Nacionales." Later came on the Sports, and they and their results went in this wise:

Flat Race.—Girls of 7 and Under.—Alice Ellowson and Phyllis Lee ran a dead heat. Zilla Horton and Doris Hewlett.

Flat Race.—Boys of 7 and Under.—Charlie De Curneux, Laurence Hayter, Peter Lee.

Flat Race.—Girls 10 and Under.—Emily Kelly, Stella Young.

Flat Race.—Boys, 11 and Under.—Harry De Curneux and Willie Murchison.

Flat Race.—Boys over 11.—Charlie Manzano and Harry Kelly.

Skiping Race.—Girls of 12 and Under.—Doris Marr, Maria Teresa Manzano and Amalia Rees.

Flappers' Race.—Girls over 12.—Kattie Murchison; Isabel MacCallum and Emma Murchison.

Three Legged Race.—Boys. George Rau, Harry De Curneux, Oswald Krieger, and Charlie Manzano.

Kangaroo Race.—Boys. — Jimmy Murchison and Willie Murchison.

Mr. Hodge and the Rev. J. Felices, the Rev. J. Stuart Cameron marched their platoons on the station in time for the 5.51 to town after Mrs. Murchison had distributed the prizes to the victorious contestants. At Belgrano the party alighted and dispersed after a delightful day, and votes of thanks to those who had helped to make it so.

Among those, in addition to Mr.

THE DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS

RECITAL AT LOMAS.

At Lomas, on Dec. 9, there was given a second performance of Dr. Stainer's beautiful work, "The Daughter of Jairus."

The Presbyterian Church was filled from the commencement. Several changes were made, both in the soloists of this work and in the second half of recital, which was devoted to more varied items of sacred music.

The preparation for such a recital as Sir John Stainer's work is considerable, and especially when illness steps in and interferes with the appearance of the soloists. Madame Goula's part was sung by a pupil of Mrs. Pamplin, Miss Mildred Cowes. Mr. F. F. Bideleux is still suffering from his throat and Mr. J. W. Colquhoun took his place.

Very much credit is due to Mr. David Neill, who but a few days (in fact hours) before was called upon to take Mr. F. W. Adie's place, who was unable to appear during the whole of the evening's recital.

Considering these matters, everything may be said to have been well organised and rehearsed, with the result than an excellent performance of the work was given.

Mr. David Neill sang exceedingly well, and in both parts of the recital Mr. Colquhoun sang with even more than accustomed energy. Miss Mildred Cowes, who possesses a sweet voice, did not make the best use of it, but a little more experience in oratorio work will, no doubt, make a difference. She sang very nicely, but hardly realised what is necessary for oratorio.

Mr. Llewellyn Hawes had complete control of his organ, the music and his singers, and produced a superfine performance on so small and perhaps difficult an organ.

Hymn No. 365, "Oh Lord of Heaven and Earth and Sea" completed the first half, and during the singing of the hymn a collection was made in aid of the Scotch Presbyterian Church at Temperley, for which object the recital was given.

Two brief organ solos, the first Schubert's Serenade, were beautifully played by Mr. Hawes, and to follow Mrs. Mohr Bell sang Cowan's "Thanksgiving." This is not by any means one of the composer's best works, but Mrs. Mohr Bell sang the song well.

Mr. J. W. Colquhoun in "Nearer my God," and Mr. W. Davies in his 'cello playing, were good.

Mrs. Pamplin was in perfect voice, which filled, even overflowed the church in her chosen song "Like is the heart." It was a perfect rendering of Alitson's work.

Mr. Hawes obtained a remarkable amount of power and of rendering out of his organ, a perfect instrument on a small scale, and much of the recital's excellence rested upon his playing.

The difficulties and the changes necessitated were very successfully overcome.

SERIOUS FIRE IN SAN FERNANDO

$35,000 DAMAGE.

A serious fire broke out on Thursday night in the yards and coal storage buildings of Señor Muffatti, in San Fernando. Notwithstanding the efforts of the Fire Brigade, the fire spread rapidly until the "galpones" were involved and destroyed. The coal yards and buildings were completely destroyed. Señor Muffatti estimates his loss at $35,000. The stores were insured.

No account can be given of the origin of the fire.

Hodge and the Rev. J. S. Cameron, and the Rev. José Felices, who had been very prominent in doing all that pertained to this desirable end were Mrs. R. H. Roberts, the Misses Besie and Nettie Roberts, Miss Beatrice McKinnon, Miss Eileen Campbell, Miss Edith Sly and several other ladies.

A VISIT TO CHILI

BY COL. PALMER

OF THE SALVATION ARMY HEADQUARTERS.

As my duties as a Salvation Army official being responsible for the oversight of our work in Chili, called me to take part in our annual conference there last month, I left Buenos Aires on November 14. The journey by rail was uneventful apart from the great heat we experienced to Mendoza and the usual plentiful supply of dust. My fellow travellers included important delegates from Argentina to the Scientific Congress which takes place in Washington, D.C., North America. Mr. Stimson who was at Pacific Station, greeting this Delegation, greeted us also, wishing us a pleasant journey.

The journey over the Andes was pleasantly cool, in fact sufficient so but on this occasion I noticed much a necessity. It was two years since my previous crossing of the Andes, but on this occasion I noticed much more snow, than before at the narrow parts of the line bearing evidence of the extreme character of the recent winter. We reached Los Andes only half an hour late, so arrived in Santiago the same night.

My duties carried me to Santiago, Concepción, Talcahuano, Valparaíso and Los Andes.

I met many friends, sympathizers in addition to those actively connected with our own work. I was privileged to make calls at the various Consulates and Legations, as also to see representatives of the different daily papers. Generally speaking, all were kind and interested in the work we have in hand.

Our work is but in its infancy, seeing that it is only 6 years since our pioneers began the operations. At present we have stations in Concepción, Talca, Santiago, Valparaíso and Autofagasta and in three towns in addition to our regular religious work, we have opened Asilos for men, and have been enabled to co-operate with the local authorities in real and I hope practical attempts to grapple with the Social problem. Before leaving here for Santiago we were favoured with the visit from the Chilean Minister accredited to the Argentine Government. The said Minister after inspecting our work among men, women and children, gave me an introduction to a prominent official of the Santiago provincial government, recommending that similar work to that we are doing here would be beneficial to Chili as a country.

In conversation with different personages in Chile I gathered that because of its population being less extensively cosmopolitan than in the Argentine Republic, there is hardly the same necessity for such extensive Social work there, but it was generally conceded nevertheless that Chili has its social problems and miseries which require solving.

I raised questions with various people pursuing the different walks of life in National, Municipal, Social, Religious and other branches. As to the general condition of things owing to the European war, all were agreed that things generally had suffered, but that now there was some slight improvement in business affairs, the nitrate and copper fields being more vigorously worked now and I understood the United States of North America are good customers in this direction.

In connection with the people housed in our Institutions it may be interesting to know that to mention one only, viz. in Santiago, that during this year 20,268 men have been accommodated at night at a very small figure and 14,381 of them were Chileans, the rest being spread over 17 different nationalities.

In conclusion I would like to say that I had the pleasure of visiting the American Colleges for Boys and Girls in Concepción affiliated to the Methodist Episcopal Church, as also the Boys College in Santiago, attached to the Presbyterian Church. In each of these Institutions a good work is going on.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

France surprised the whole world with her complete disapproval of the idea that she was a decadent country in a military sense. She has demonstrated that not only was she prepared to meet the savage German attack, but that in arms and equipment generally she is ahead of her enemy. France has also shown how quickly she can adapt herself to changed methods of warfare, and it is no disparagement to our British inventors to say that France has taken the lead with many ideas. In our first picture this week we show the new French infantry wearing the steel helmets which have again and again proved their efficacy. These two men are also specially equipped in other ways for trench warfare. One is accoutred as a fusilier and the other as a "bomber" or "trench clearer." Britain is now proposing to provide her troops with steel skull caps. The keenest interest in the war this week lies in the Balkans campaign, where undoubtedly a crisis exists. Most of our pictures therefore deal with this campaign. The bridge over the Save was destroyed by the Serbians to impede the German advance on Belgrade, but it is questionable whether the demolition accomplished much. In these days there are few obstacles insurmountable to a well equipped army, and rivers do not provide the problems they once did. In the following picture we have an artist's impression of the scene when the Serbians had to retire and get their heavy ox-drawn artillery safely away. On the ridge the light field guns hold the enemy in check. It will be remembered that most of the Serbian heavy artillery is manned by British gunners, and the last picture of this week's series shows Admiral Troubridge with a range-finder. The next picture depicts the landing place of the British forces at Salonica, on what, it transpires, was, and is, really Serbian territory, the small piece of the foreshore having been held since the last Balkan war under treaty by Serbia. In the camp scene the British soldiers are observed making a stone pathway to enable them to move about dry-shod in case of heavy rain. A remarkable demonstration was witnessed on the occasion of the memorial service at St. Paul's Cathedral London on October 29. The artist of the picture we give has faithfully portrayed the moment when the scores of nurses prayed "We give Thee hearty thanks for that it hath pleased Thee to deliver Thy servant Edith, out of the miseries of this sinful world."

ST. ANDREW'S SOCIETY

ITS PRESENT ACTIVITIES.

St. Andrew's Society has not been feasting of late, but that does not mean that it has been quiescent. Always beware of the Scot when he falls silent, and that it is not true that he never fights till he sees his own blood is proved by the fact that some five dozen of the St. Andrew's Scots have gone up against the Philistines and are now, let us hope, busy hewing them in pieces. The Secretary of that Society has communicated the following facts of interest: The recent appeal for the Benevolent Fund has been a great success, and so has the collateral appeal for funds for the Scottish Red Cross. Substantial cheques from all parts of the country having come in, the camp members doing brilliantly, and accompanying their kind contributions with warm letters of sympathy.

To all and each of the sixty (or so) who have gone up against Amalek, the Society intends to send a recuerdo which is an excellent idea. The report, shortly to be issued, will show that the Society has accomplished great things in these times of tribulation, and every Scot who desires to contribute to these good causes and, to the upkeep of the four beds in the Scots' hospital in France, should send his shkel to the Treasurer who sits at the receipt of custom daily (a' lawfu' days that is) at 761 Avenida de Mayo, under the sign of Señor J. A. Aird.

A WAR CONCERT

At Prince George's Hall

THE PATRIOTIC SPIRIT

Given something light, possessing a patriotic flavour, the every-day Briton will respond wholeheartedly to the demand for his support and enthusiasm. That was shown once again at Prince George's Hall on Dec. 11, when the British Society's War Concert was submitted to a large audience.

Candidly speaking, the entertainment was a triumph for its organisers. There were blemishes—some inexcusable; others slight—but it is the whole that must be surveyed at times like these, and, as a whole, the Concert was delightful and appreciated.

Professor Stark's orchestra opened the proceedings with a patriotic medley, "Upholding Freedom's Flag." The inspiring strains of some of Britain's best patriotic songs admirably heralded a strong programme which met with general favour.

After the national anthems of Argentine and Great Britain had been rendered, Mr. Stanley Parker aroused enthusiasm with "Boys of the New Brigade." He was followed by fifty-five little pupils of Madame E. B. Reed and Miss O. Hughesdon-Smith, who gave several national choruses in a dainty manner that made an instant appeal.

Mrs. H. R. K. Richards then gained applause for a tuneful song, "Till the Boys Come Home."

It was at this stage that the entertainment took a sterner and more impressive line. Mr. R. H. Morgan recited Kipling's grand poem, "For all we have and are." The audience were distinctly moved and demanded an encore, which was given, preparatory to the advent of Mr. F. F. Bideleux, whose rendering of "Britannia Rules the Waves" did full justice to the great old song. Mrs. J. B. Munks, with "God Bless Great Britain" also struck the popular note.

The first portion of the programme concluded with scenes from the life of Florence Nightingale, represented by nurses from the British Hospital and arranged by Mrs. Jean Evans (matron). The tableaux were extremely pretty, but the finale was spoiled by the vagaries of the curtain.

The call of the drum is one that has been heard from the beginning of time; it was heard again last night when a march of that name, composed especially for the bands of the New Army, opened the second portion of the programme. There was nothing particularly original in the composition; it might even be considered tawdry; but it was impressive and anything better calculated to arouse the emotions of those who heard it could not have been chosen. "The Call of the Drum" made way for an ever popular figure in the Rev. H. Westby Brady, who announced that he was "Off to Salonica in the Morning." The announcement was greeted with cheers, as was the statement that he was about to kill the Kaiser. These intimations seemed to be given in all sincerity, but the bulk of the audience could not help hoping that they were not correct, for Mr. Brady will probably be required for many other concerts.

When Mr. Brady left the platform—either for Salonica or the dressing room—the children once again appealed to the audience. The choruses "Minstrel Boy" and "March of the Men of Harlech" were prettily sung; and the strathspey and reel by Miss Dorothy Gray and T. Paton; and Masters G. and R. Boyd brought well-earned applause.

An old favourite was resurrected with success when the "Soldiers in the Park" (song and chorus) was given. The work of resurrection fell to Mrs. Mohr Bell, in military garb, and well she did it. A pleasing stage picture by members of the United Club added to the effect of the number.

Mr. A. B. Grinham, surely the best English character actor in Buenos Aires, followed with "The Veteran's Song." Mr. Grinham, who was accompanied by a nurse and handled an old musket tenderly, brought out the best that was in the song. He was deservedly recalled.

Although called upon at very short notice, the members of the United Club gave an inspiring military display. Their work was not always perfect, but its strength and the appeal which it made to the audience were more than sufficient to discount minor troubles due to lack of time for rehearsal. This number was as well received as anything in the programme. The railway porter's poem, "The Day," was well rendered by Mrs. Robert Andrews, whose reputation as an elocutionist is well known to the public.

Then came Mrs. H. R. K. Richards again with an almost unrecognisable version of "Yip-I-Addv-I-Ay." Her repeated assertion, "We are going to win, to win," met with instant approval. Mrs. Richards knows how to sing a song of this type; she has all the mannerisms of the popular English comedienne. The song was a distinct "hit."

A military tableau, accompanied by a Christmas carol, was also well received, and served as an excellent prelude to a sympathetic rendering of one of the oldest and best of British ballads, "Home, sweet Home." Mrs. J. B. Munks was very good indeed in this item.

Brightness and enthusiasm were added to by Mr. F. F. Bideleux, who sang "The Lads in Navv Blue" in a breezy manner suited to the song. The United Club furnished a number of "bluejackets" who assisted Mr. Bideleux as a picturesque stage-setting.

"God Save the King," sung by the entire audience with a fervour rarely heard in this Republic, concluded a programme eminently suited to a war concert held on the warmest of evenings. There was little real music, but there was much entertainment of the lighter variety, also stage-craft superior to the average. This latter part of the work was a credit to Mr. R. H. Morgan, who added to his many laurels. Mr. A. Holder, as business-manager and general organiser of the programme, also worked hard and had no small share in the success achieved. Mrs. Heslon and Mr. F. Allsop acted as accompanists.

A similar concert would probably be welcomed on many more occasions. It was a type to make sad people happy, and a welcome relief to the endless chain of ballad concerts submitted to the public during the season.

The children who helped in the good work are as follows:—

Amalia Rees, Cecilia Rees, Elizabeth Eccleston, Doris and Evelyn Brown, Dorothy, Nita and Sylvia Gray, Lucy Lett, Hettie and Lily Orton, Amalia and Kathleen Reynolds, Gladys and Karel Van Wassenaar, Tassie Paton, Maisie Mackintosh, Gladys Harvey, Adèle Shephard, Hilda and Edward Turner, Mildred and Charlie Mace, Emma and Catty Murchison, Jimmv. John and Willie Murchison, Doris Blodwin and Olwyn A. Iwan, Margaret Gibbs, Nena Davies, Claude Davies, Fred and Edmund Browne, Gilbert Logan, Edward, Norman and Edgar Hogg, Percy Anderson, Frank Roberts, John Gebbie, George Wilson, James and Ritchie Drysdale, Henry Elliot, Tommy and Arthur Jones, Gordon and Ronald Boyd.

The catering for the artistes was admirably carried out by the Alexandra Tea Rooms, of Calle Cangallo.

CALLS TO THE COLOURS

British Recruiting Posters

COLLECTION AT PRINCE GEORGE'S HALL

At Prince George's Hall there is a collection of about two dozen of the Recruiting Posters which have been, and are being used to attract to the colours, the very large numbers of men necessary to supply the wastage of war, and to increase the Army sufficiently to maintain full pressure on all fronts. As at least three millions of recruits have been so attracted in the last eighteen months or so, it is evident that the Posters must have their share of the credit attached.

A Poster should to attain its object, which is publicity, be striking and direct, artistic and making an appeal easy of comprehension. Some of the posters in this Exhibition fulfil these conditions, others fulfil some of them, while one or two scarcely rise above the deadly monotony of the common handbill. But they all mean well and are issued by the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee with intention to appeal to all sorts and conditions of men, and to generate in them the frame of mind, a kind of patriotic steam, which shall direct them to the Recruiting Office.

There is of course, a residuum of narrow, greedy, selfish egoists, cold-blooded and self-centred, both among the moneyed and the working classes whom no appeal will ever move but an appeal to their material interests. It is questionable, however, if such are of any military use except as members of the Sanitary or Pioneer Corps. The Posters are calculated to make a broad attack on the feelings and consciences of as many kinds of people as possible, and it may be of interest to consider them individually and seriatim.

At a considerable amount of trouble the posters have been mounted and hung on the pillars (the easy and resourceful "Dex," pot being taboo) screens and stage front.

Sir R. Baden Powell designed (but evidently did not draw) one in four colours with a man and girl munition making in the foreground, at whom an exceedingly empty and fatuous looking Nut stares with an air of imbecility, while a boy scout and a nurse make a link to a soldier with fixed bayonet and a seaman with a 4 inch gun under a flag. It is well drawn, but has the fault of being too complicated and requiring a little attention and consideration.

Next to it is an excellent one, on a bandlike strip are the Union Jack, Tricolour, Russian, Belgian and British flag again. The lettering across it asks persuasively, Why not Join The Army?

Next to this is another on which the artist has displayed a rather mixed state of mind. In the middle distance some typical English thatched cottages (week-end type), are backed by a Futurist landscape of exceedingly steep hills of forty-five degrees, which are however cultivated all over; the only cattle visible stand on a small piece of level ground and a gigantic Highlander in the foreground, very correct, but inappropriate to the scene, appeals to "Your Country's Cause." One can scarcely blame the enemy for making the representative British soldier "a Kiltie" on all occasions when our own posters stick him in the middle of Surrey or Devon as native of the soil. On the stage front appear the granite chin, steel eyes and close mouth of Lord Kitchener inset on a black background with an extract from his speech "Men, materials, and money" in yellow lettering and "Enlist To-day." This is simple, striking and direct. An appeal to "Come over here, Boys" is very good, though it has technical defects. A half length of a soldier shading his eyes with his hand, appears against a map of Southern England, coloured pink, and Northern France, yellow. The man himself is in shades of brown and grey. His cap has no chin strap and the rifle is, by its length, the new rifle but mounted with the old bayonet. The litho artist is usually conspicuously ignorant and careless of military detail, but the Recruiting Committee ought to know better. In another, greenish khaki ground white letters ask with a very personal air "Why aren't You in khaki?" while in orange, black and green "The Women of Britain" are required to show cause why they "Won't help to send a man to the Army to-day?" with some very true and dreadful reasons adduced from Belgium.

Messrs. Spottiswoode print an artistic St. George (badly armed) tilting at a terrific green Dragon, which however has evidently never studied Self Defence, and is giving the Saint all the chances. It mentions, for the lettering is not big enough, that "Britain needs You." Here however is a sure draw, The Flag, brilliant in colour, correct in Heraldry and drawing with a green border, and the striking words in white "It is Our Flag." "Fight for it, Work for it." This is the real stuff and delivers the goods. It ought to pull in the wavering by the neck in short order. There are several reprints from speeches, excellent in their way, but rather broadsides than Posters.

One small but very good bill represents a darkening sea and distant coast in the red flare of a dying sunset against the glow of which the funnels and tripod masts of a Dreadnought are visible. On the darkest shadow the figure of Nelson is spectrally outlined with the words "England Expects, Are you doing your duty?"

Of the gentleman in khaki, who one thinks at times to his extreme disgust is impertinently "Tommy" to excess there are numerous further representations. The busts of six laughing soldiers in khaki, bear on their cap badges the emblems of Line, Royal, Engineer, Artillery, Guards, and Service Corps units, and a cordial invitation to "Join the glad throng that goes Marching Along." There is a striking pictorial admonition also to "Fill up the ranks, Pile up the Munitions."

Without doubt, two of the very best posters are those, already well known, of the "Come along, Boys" in marching order, correct from cap to puttees, life-like and convincing, and its companion of the three Highlanders marching at ease. They are top hole and need no exposition.

There are also others. The very good poster in khaki, red, white and blue which, under a Jack tells you "Men, to delay is dangerous when your Country needs you—Enlist now."

A largely smiling soldier in khaki assures you that he is "Happy and Contented," then asks searchingly "Are You?" Meaning that, if you are, you should not be, and that Khaki's the only wear. This by no means exhausts the list, but will give some idea of the variety and the different methods of "getting at" the prey. To criticise at all may seem ungracious, but not to do so would be an injustice to the half dozen designs which overpeer the rest. The Exhibition is an interesting one, and is convincing evidence that, if all the Nation is not awake, the slumberers can now only be the dead or, those who are of no more value than they. May they still do good work and bring victorious legions to The Flag!

Sports and Pastimes

THE TURF

PALERMO

There have been very few days at Palermo this past season like Sunday. The book has rarely been so successful, nor have so many favourites got home. Five out of the eight races were won by public fancies, two by second favourites, and only one outsider got home, that was Oblea, when she just beat the strongly fancied Angeolina by a short head.

The heat was intense, but the racing interesting enough, albeit without any outstanding feature.

From the first to the last race there was no reason why backers should not have made money, money was absurdly easy to find, although perhaps in somewhat small amounts.

There were one or two points concerning the classic race, won by Last Reason that call for comment.

Petite Chose, who ran third, showed herself as going off, an important point. This fine sprinter, of the past, has produced races over this distance that would have made Last Reason cough, so fast were they, but there is now but little doubt she has been put off her pace by being entered into races of different distances. Last Reason's victory was under these circumstances perfectly reasonable. We are not used to this fine 6-year-old over sprints, but he really on past running had only Petite Chose to beat.

Diamant and Juvenal and La Sonambula only showed up the sprinting weakness of this year's products. Pan Pan—a great horse—is being disgracefully treated after a fine year's record. Felpilla of course is fast, but her late running over other distances and even over sprints against Petite Chose have not shown her in a good light. Last Reason has been in such winning form and did the 1200 in 1.11 dead the other day, that his victory could be well expected.

It was really surprising to see how very easily he went away when called upon. For a moment it looked as though a good race would be seen between him and Felpilla and Petite Chose, but not a bit of it. When asked he completely left the others standing and won as he liked.

Posadas fairly left Beethoven standing still in the first race, and apparently had this cross tempered horse well annoyed by taking the lead, just in front of him, because when it came to the finish Beethoven chucked his job, and even allowed Tata Dios to beat him out of a place.

Posadas won in a hack canter, after making all the running, in the good time of 1.37 3/5.

Piridina, a hot public fancy, also galloped away with the second race at the expense of Fidelio and Juliano. The last named made the running, with Fidelio 2nd and Piridina 3rd. They reversed the order in the run home.

Lescant, the debutant, failed entirely, and disappointed the public considerably. He will run better next time, and—so will Dolfo.

How Chiribiribi was beaten out of a place by Debutante was surprising, but that Eureka won the race, was not, because one glance at her was sufficient to tell that she was a totally different animal than when last out. She looked fit, and no longer an over-run weed, and as suggested in our Sunday notes, she was a winner "if" fit. Bolin's performance was poor. He is going off, and a rest is wanted.

In the sixth race Salvadora, the favourite, put up no sort of show whatever, neither did Cotagaita, nor Fesluca, both fillies being expected to do so.

Angeolina was beaten by the shortest of heads by Oblea, who has in the past been so fond of getting left at the post.

Saavedra won his first race at Palermo, since his reappearance, but he did not ride well. Tombola ran third, and paid a handsome 28.70 dividend. It was an exciting race.

The surprise of the seventh race was the fact that Don Federico was very nearly beaten by Fachinal. Don Federico has not yet shown himself to be much of a horse, and he will have to improve immensely to do any good.

This race he was expected to win in a canter, but was only half a head in front of Fachinal at the end.

Vicente Lopez ran third, and once more showed his consistence.

The logical candidate, Palo Errao, won the last event, as he should have done, but Rivero did not ride any too well, and nearly let Gringuito do the trick. Rivero paid too much attention to Royal Drop.

It is interesting to note that the meeting saw Domingo Torterolo enter the second century of wins, saw Quinteros back in the saddle, saw no change in the table of wins of leading jockeys, and generally provided little excitement.

LA PLATA

Some good racing was seen at La Plata on Sunday, the main feature of which was the high dividends paid out. Favourites as winners were conspicuous by their absence, and the only one to support public opinion was Black Ronald in the first race. Garfio won the chief event in a canter, by streets in front of Piquete and Fox. There was nothing of particular interest in this meeting.

LET FLY

A Famous Racehorse

ARRIVAL IN BUENOS AIRES

The arrival of the s.s. Deseado in this port on Dec. 10 had an especial interest for sportsmen in this country on account of the fact that the famous English racehorse Let Fly was a passenger on board.

As announced exclusively in THE HERALD a few days ago, this three-year-old horse by White Eagle—Gondollette has been acquired by the well-known Australian trainer in this Republic, Mr. Edmund Fraser. It is satisfactory to learn that the horse has stood his sea voyage well, and on arrival proceeded at once to Mr. Fraser's establishment.

It is intended that, should the horse progress well in this country, he will be entered for such classic races as are permissible and then retire to the stud.

Let Fly was one of the best horses in training in England. As a two-year-old he fulfilled 5 engagements in which he met the "cracks" of his generation, especially Redfern. He won the New Stakes over 5 furlongs, beating Redfern into third place. Stakes £1834 10 0. He won the Exeter Stakes, 6 furlongs, stakes £1181 0 0. Lost the Molecombe Stakes by a neck to Redfern; lost the Champagne Stakes by a head to the same horse, and avenged himself by beating Redfern by a short head in the Dewhurst Plate over 7 furlongs. Stakes £1487 0 0.

The decision of the British Government to suppress all racing except at Newmarket during the war apparently robbed Let Fly of a most successful career.

As the property of Colonel Hall Walker he was entered as a three-year-old in 20 races, which included the Derby, Grand Prix, St. George's and Atlantic Stakes, the Duchess of York Plate, the Great Midland Breeders' Plate, and the Leger.

Let Fly has beaten all the best English blood stock except Pommern, who beat him in this year's Derby by 3/4 of a length, with Rossendal third.

It is interesting to note that White Eagle, the sire of Let Fly, in a brilliant career in England, ran third to Norman III. and Sir Archibald in the 2000 Guineas in 1908, and ran second to Your Majesty in the St. Leger of the same year. Further, that his progeny is good is shown not only by Let Fly's record, but by others. White Prophet by White Eagle ran second in this year's Chester Vase.

Whatever record Let Fly may produce as a race horse in this country, it can be undoubted that as a sire he will be of immense value and prove himself one more English ornament to the Argentine Stud Book.

Mr. Edmund Fraser deserves congratulations on his foresight, and his many friends wish him a successful career with the horse.

LOMAS A.C.

FINAL OF SPRING TOURNAMENT.

On Sunday the Lomas A.C. concluded their Spring Lawn Tennis Tournament.

The weather was intensely warm and favoured by practically no cooling breeze.

However, the concluding games were got through with plenty of enjoyment. The gentlemen's doubles provided an exciting match, and perhaps the best of the tournament.

Messrs. Duncan and Benson were the winners. In the mixed doubles Miss Cribbes and Mr. G. Cribbes beat Miss Rodman and Burbridge.

The full final scores were:—

Mixed doubles.—Miss E. Cribbes and G. Cribbes beat Miss Rodman and H. Burbridge, 6—2, 6—3.

Gent's doubles.—J. Duncan and C. Benson beat D. Cotman and J. Lawrie, 6—5, 6—3.

Gent's singles.—J. White beat G. Cribbes, 2—6, 6—3, 6—3.

On Sunday, Dec. 26, an American Tournament will be held. Play will commence at 9.30 a.m.

BUENOS AIRES v. QUILMES.

Quilmes entertained the B.A. Club on Sunday, and had to admit of a most crushing defeat, without a match, and with only one set to their credit.

However, the play was well enjoyed by the home club. The results were as follows:

L. Knight and F. W. Dodds beat A. Mackill and B. Hoare, 6—2, 5—6, 7—5; beat G. C. and W. Crispin, 6—4, 6—0; beat S. N. Leonard and C. J. Bell, 6—4, 6—2.

L. Jenkins and R. Leslie beat A. Mackill and B. Hoare, 6—5, 6—4; beat G. C. and W. Crispin, 6—2, 6—3; beat S. N. Leonard and C. J. Bell, 6—3, 6—3.

H. Knight and J. A. Gibson beat A. Mackill and B. Hoare, 6—2, 6—0; beat G. C. and W. Crispin, 6—2, 6—2; beat S. N. Leonard and C. J. Bell, 6—3, 6—1.

Messrs. Chase and Volkenning came second with 89. The former is a new player, who will make his mark with sufficient experience. The tournament was well enjoyed and resulted in full as follows:—

BASEBALL

LA PLATA V. ARGENTINO CENTRAL

On Sunday afternoon La Plata defeated the Argentino Central nine at La Plata, score 12-5.

The game was well contested throughout and, besides, was one of the fastest ever played in the Argentine the time being one hour and forty minutes.

The Argentinos were unable to solve the pitching of Wright who had them at his mercy, especially in the third inning with bases full and none out he retired Tuero, Hitlin and Reh-meyer in rapid fire order.

Phillips pitched a splendid game for the Argentinos and the brand of ball he twirled would deliver him a victory in nine out of ten games. However he was a little wild at times giving four free passes.

Sturgeon and Gottman carried off the batting honours for La Plata each hitting safely three times. Sturgeon also played a masterly game at short stop getting everything that came anywhere in his territory. He also was La Plata's leading run-getter crossing the pan four times which was some achievement.

Phillips was the Beavers' leading slugger getting two hits out of three times at bat, one of which was a double. Tuthill also hit safely twice and Tuero, Herrod, Noonan, Houston and Haye each getting one safety. "Home Run" Reh-meyer failed to live up to his name and did not reach first base throughout the game. Wright had his number as well as the "Nanny" of Hitlin who also failed to get a hit.

Herrod caught one of the best games of his career and the La Plata boy showed their fear of his mighty throwing arm.

Hayes played a star game in centre for the Beavers and also laid down a pretty bunt that he beat out in big league fashion.

Noonan at short stop received only one chance which he fielded well.

Houston was in fine form at second base for the Beavers, but that little "bone" he pulled in the sixth inning is excused.

Tuero, ex-B.A. pitcher, held down third base for the Argentinos and showed that he is just as much at home at that bag as he is in the box.

The box score is as follows:—

prizes to the winners at the close of the tournament.

VILLA DEVOTO V. GENERAL URQUIZA.

Played at Devoto on Sunday, with the result that the visitors returned victorious by 7 matches to 2, after some strenuous play.

Messrs. Hortel and Doyer played strongly and well, and won all their matches.

Gould and Lorette beat J. V. Hill and Holtum, 6-2, 6-4.

Gallishaw and Murchison beat J. Hill and J. V. Holtum, 6-3, 2-6, 7-5.

CRICKET

SCRATCH GAME AT BELGRANO.

Sunday's fixture at Belgrano Cricket Club with San Isidro fell through, but to lose an afternoon's cricket was by no means the desire of the Belgrano players, so that the suggestion that two scratch teams should be chosen from club members under the captaincy of Messrs. H. Dorning and E. W. S. Thomson respectively met with immediate favour.

The latter's side went in first, and were apparently in a hurry to get back to the pavilion, all except Mr. R. H. Thompson, who stuck bravely to his task, and when nobody else could do anything against the bowling of Dorning and Garrod, he managed to knock up a useful and highly creditable 34.

Dorning commenced bowling in startling and deadly fashion. In his first over he bowled Curchod, and next ball he dismissed Godfrey, Magrane was run out for a duck, and only Holland and R. H. Thompson made any stand whatever. The side was out for 66, of which Mr. Extras 6, Mr. Thompson 34, and Mr. Holland 15, shows that all the others between them claim 11 runs!

Dorning with four wickets for 16. Garrod with four for 36, shared the bowling honours. Incidentally, too, these two rattled up a fine score together, and the first two overs after lunch were lively indeed. Curchod was quite off bowling colour. In his first over he was twice hit out of the ground, three times sent to the boundary, and the remaining ball went for a single. Twenty-five runs in one over.

The batting still continued to be very lively, and only six overs were sent down before the opposing total was passed.

The first wicket—Garrod's—fell at 93 with his personal contribution of 40.

Ratcliff joined Dorning, and still there was no stopping the run-getting. Dorning had a great time, especially with Curchod's bowling. Besides the above 25 in an over, he later knocked him for 18 in another over, and in all Curchod's first six overs yielded 71 runs.

The second wicket fell at 141, Dorning being caught in the long field for 89. The game then quietened down until the finish, when the innings closed for 271. The bowling averages showed that Magrane and Holland were the most successful, with three for 32, and two for 31 respectively.

BUENOS AIRES C.C. V. LOMAS.

After their late defeat by Lomas, the B.A.C.C. determined upon revenging themselves on Sunday, and so successful were they that they recorded a win of no fewer than 120 runs.

Lomas was not full strength, H. T. Mawson being a noticeable absentee. Batting first on a good wicket, they knocked up 158 runs, chiefly through the excellent batting display of R. W. Rudd, who scored 82. A life was given him at the wicket early in the game, but apart from this he played good and sound cricket, and received an ovation when he returned to the pavilion. Burton 27 and J. B. Campbell 16 were the other scorers, and after the former's departure Lomas collapsed.

G. G. Brown with seven for 58, bowled exceedingly well.

B. A. went in after lunch, and soon showed that they meant business. Brown and Horton, Hearne Sheridan, and Ayling all played free cricket.

The Lomas total was soon passed, with only two wickets down. Hooton held the batting honours, and his 64 was obtained by clean hitting in a shade over the hour.

For Lomas Auld was the most successful bowler with the figures of five for 96.

A PRACTICE GAME.

A practice game, or rather, a practice innings, was indulged in by Banfield C.C. players on Sunday, fielding, batting and bowling by turns.

None of the others met with success. Robinson and Reed shared the brunt of the bowling.

STIMSON CUP.

Mr. Frederic J. Stimson, U.S. Ambassador some little time ago, presented the Argentine and San Andres Golf Clubs with a cup, and on Sunday at San Andres links, the second and final rounds of matches for the cup were indulged in.

Messrs. Brown and May won close matches on the 18th green. Kidd and Dodds halved at the 18th. The game between Bailey and Elortondo ended unfortunately, Elortondo playing a ball and in doing so broke a club rule and giving the match to Bailey.

Mr. Leng at the close of play made a few happy remarks, and Mr. F. J. Stimson presented the cup to the winning team.

Results were:—

S. Dodds 010	Brown 101
Elortondo 000	Bailey 111

ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL

INDEPENDIENTE 2, RACING 1.

As the result of the above match played between Independiente and Racing on Sunday, San Isidro became champions of the First League, for Racing were beaten.

The match was played on the ground of the latter between the following teams:—

Independiente.—S. Miguens; A. Ferro and R. O. Sande; J. Canepa, E. A. Sande and V. Capelletti; P. Garré, A. Zavaleta, N. Capeletti, J. Arrovuelo and J. Venturreira.

Racing.—S. Arduino; S. Ochoa and A. Reyes; A. Betular, F. Olazar, R. Pepe; Z. Canaveri, N. Vivaldi, A. Ohaco, J. Hospital and J. N. Perinetti.

Play was fairly even in the first half and Independiente's one goal, by Zavaleta in combination with Garré was a good one.

The second goal for the winners scored in the second half was the result of a splendid piece of passing between the two above-named players, but the actual score was made by Capelletti.

This success was none too well received by the losing team, and some rough play followed, in which Garré was hurt. Right up to the finish Independiente showed their superiority, and only a scramble in front of their goal just before the whistle blew enabled Olazar to score.

Racing did not receive their defeat at all well, and in many ways proved themselves to be poor losers.

Mr. Hugo de Gondra refereed the game.

AN UNUSUAL ACCIDENT.

An unusual accident occurred in Calle Rio Bamba yesterday morning. Between Calles Cordoba and Paraguay in this street is the Escuela Normal and until this morning one of the beauties of its grounds was an immense tree. Suddenly and without apparent warning this tree crashed down into the roadway, to the great alarm of a large number of passers by. Several persons escaped injury in a remarkable manner and especially a carter Catalino Perez. The tree fell full upon his cart and although bruised by branches he escaped without serious injury. Not so the poor horse, who was struck heavily and killed.

The electric cables of the Lacroze tram route were torn down and until assistance came, the moments were dangerous ones. Traffic in Rio Bamba was completely disorganised.

CATAMARCA POLITICS

NEW GOVERNOR AND VICE-GOVERNOR.

In accordance with the arrangements made by the Interventor in Catamarca, the Electoral College met yesterday. The Democrats unanimously voted for Doctor Guillermo Correa as Governor, and for Don Salvador Castro as Vice Governor.

It was expected that at the meeting of the Legislature, the Democrat majority would elect Dr. Emileo Molino to replace Doctor del Pino as National Senator.

BRIGAND BANDS IN THE CAMP

DANGEROUS STATE OF AFFAIRS IN PAMPA.

At the present time, some of the dwellers in the camp are passing through difficult and unpleasant times. In Pampa Territory, this is said to be especially the case, the country being practically terrorised and at the mercy of bands of unemployed labourers. A large body of peons are said to have possessed themselves of three trains and, there being no sufficient public force to prevent them, they journeyed over the lines getting down as seemed good to them to swarm over and take by assault small pueblos and townships by the way.

These are said to be very dangerous fellows, all more or less armed with revolvers, cuchillos, facons, etc., and led by men ripe for mischief. They have terrorised Vertiz and Spluzzi; in the former 1700 men rushed the town, forced the doors of the butchers, bakers and other shops and helped themselves to what they pleased threatening with their brandished weapons, all or any, that dared to oppose them. They show open contempt for the police firing their pistols in the air and defying them. In one case they beat down the doors of a house and seizing the proprietor threatened him with death till he gave up all his money.

Individuals go from house to house robbing, openly and threatening horrible revenge to any who dare look askance at them. So great is the terror inspired by these miscreants, that, the mere sight of an approaching train sends the population scurrying to shelter and to bar and bolt their doors. An armed and organised resistance would be more efficacious.

Chacareros have been wounded and beaten by these rascals who drink and riot at the almacenes and pulperias along their route. It would seem that a competent force should be despatched against them to inflict severe chastisement before the evil example has time to spread further. The revolted fanáticos in Brazil are an ever present warning of the danger of permitting such risings to gather head and remain unchecked. Meanwhile the camp people have no guarantee or safety.

GERMAN AGENTS

AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Some time ago we had occasion to refer to the fact that certain British Insurance Companies were represented by Germans. Apparently more charges are to be made. The following paragraph on the subject is taken from the "Times of Argentina": "We understand that Mr. Paton, manager of the Royal Insurance Company, and Mr. A. J. David, manager of the Sun Insurance Company, have been appointed co-managers of the branch office of the Northern Insurance Company shortly to be established here. For many years Messrs. Hossmann and Co. were local agents of the Northern, and after the declaration of war, the firm's name was changed to Messrs. J. G. de Boerr and Co., but the directorate of the Northern resolved that the company must be locally represented by Britons. The nominations are of the best."

THE PUERTO MILITAR FIRE

WHO IS TO GET THE ORDER OF THE HALTER?

Advices from THE HERALD's Bahia Blanca correspondent, confirm much of the worst side of the conflagration at Puerto Militar namely, the defective material for fire extinguishing and the scandalous want of prevision, which in a naval establishment of such importance is almost incredible. The estimate made by our correspondent places the losses at over half a million dollars. This is an alternative to the Minister of Marine's $250,000 and the $1,500,000 of La Razón. A watchman first found the fire then the whistle of the Sub-Prefectura brayed the alarm. As stated in the first reports it was found, to the disgrace of the responsible authorities that the fire hose were old, rotten, broken, useless spouting water and no more fitted to hold it than stockings would be. Being a Government establishment one would have supposed that fire drill sometimes, took place but such a supposition would have been obviously incorrect as the state of the hose must have been discovered and that they were less hose and hosiery. The couplings also were all odd ones, so the pipes could not be joined and a good stream obtained.

To "show up" these things the ships outside turned on their searchlights (to show perhaps, that they would work) and in this fine illumination the stores of the Argentine fleet went up in smoke. In addition to the previous statements and the dismal catalogue of losses a few further particulars are now available. The ideas of regularity and order prevailing are not favourably commented on as among the ruins were found stacks of melted sugar and mixed with the remains of kerosene and paint tins and not therefore, even suitable for toffee. A lot of fidcos were also mixed with the petroleum and the contents of the shed, appear to have been mixed up with a splendid disorder. However of course, no one will be hanged, the affair will blow over until it comes to another waste of public money and material.

ADDITIONS TO THE ARSENAL

MAGNIFICENT NATIONAL EXPENDITURE.

Probably in consequence of the recent disastrous outbreak at Puerto Militar, Government has decided that the Ministry of Marine shall order the reconstruction of part of the Arsenal destroyed by fire on October 6, 1914.

The Minister of Finance has therefore been directed to hand over for expenditure on the work the sum of forty-eight thousand pesos and ninety-six centavos (the odd four are on no account to be paid out!) paid into the Treasury last May by the Insurance Companies on account of the destroyed deposits.

The Minister of Finance will, further of his goodness, see provided the needful sum of $8,598, together with the further amount of four cents, and with these imposing amounts at their disposal, the naval authorities are expected to require a new and magnificent annex (in corrugated iron) to the Arsenal to arise Phoenix-like on the ruins of the old galpones. Now we shall not be an excessive length of time!

ST. GEORGE'S COLLEGE QUILMES

PRIZE-GIVING AND PLAY.

Tuesday, Dec. 14

Quilmes in mud and rain and Quilmes in sunshine are not quite the same place. Those who went to St. George's College yesterday saw all things under the best aspect, and except for the appalling temperature, were, while in the School grounds, transported again to Merry England unless the too carefully observing noticed the presence of numerous giant eucalyptus trees, peach trees and other rather exotic growths. It is indeed remarkable to what an extent the public school atmosphere here has been reproduced. It is observable not only in the alert and athletic figures of the boys and their bearing, whatever their nationality, but seems to pervade the place.

St. George's red Cross drooped in the windless heat on the polygonal turret of the Chapel, but it struck a vigorous note of colour, and in the little church itself, in spite of the smell of new wood and the air of "recentness," there is the hush and feeling of old things; one involuntarily looks underfoot for brasses, and expects to see table tombs with recumbent effigies tucked away in the corners. The two stained windows are particularly fine.

Instead of being driven indoors, as last year, by "winter and foul weather," the whole events were held in the open eye of day and under the sun and the green wood trees a delightful background. All who could, that is the majority of visitors, had found seats on the chairs and benches placed on the turf before a proscenium stage and curtain, which stage was for the nonce occupied by Canon Stevenson, the Headmaster, and other gentlemen, those entitled to do so wearing their gowns and hoods. Mr. W. Agar was present and distributed the prizes. All of these were very handsome and substantial volumes, sumptuously bound in calf, with that rich red marbled edging so agreeably reminiscent of the best brawn. In several cases handsome sets of drawing instruments were given, especially to those of engineering proclivities.

In his address the Rev. Canon Stevenson said that the School completed its 17th year with 74 boys, of whom 21 were new entries. It was proposed, if the increase continued, to rent a furnished house near the College for masters and use their rooms as dormitories. The war, unhappily, continued, and they were proud that 20 per cent. of those educated there had offered their services to King and Country. Many were below the age limit, although one under 17 enlisted. He referred specially to Captain Gilbert Robertson, Royal Scots, killed leading his Company at Hill 70. He particularly adverted to the fact that the aim there was to produce good citizens and good men, not forgetting the side of the spirit and the side of morals: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Health had been good, but the Headmaster referred in feeling terms to the tragic death of Mr. Cope last year at Mar del Plata.

Canon Stevenson deprecated the system of permits in connection with National College examinations on which time and expense had been wasted.

Of boys who had left for public schools the best reports were received. Pritchard at Uppingham, Haxell at Lancing College, Lockwood at Malvern, and Stevenson at Haileybury, were all mentioned, as was Jacobs, now at Pennsylvania University. Two Government Scholastic Inspectors called in August and appeared well pleased with what they heard and saw.

It is proposed to start a laboratory in connection with the agricultural science, and an appeal to estancieros was made for the $6000 required.

In sports on St. George's Day, Garrod carried off the field honours, and Kennard II. in the swimming bath. The cricket team was exceptionally good, and the tennis championship had been won by R. Knight.

The Racquet Court Fund was slowly increasing, and though the Shooting Range was not yet open, the idea was not abandoned. Old Georgian Elevens had visited them and were always welcome.

Canon Stevenson likewise referred to the Scouts, several of whom made a smart appearance in the crowd, and to the Carpenters' Shop. As also to the fact that, notwithstanding the war, the School had a full staff of masters.

He also insisted very strongly on the necessity of producing trained intelligences, and boys who could use their brains deprecating excess of "esprit de corps" and "playground virtues."

In conclusion he desired to thank the members of the Staff, the Board of Directors, the Examiners (Miss Browne, Messrs. Chambers and Young), the donors of prizes (Messrs. Lockwood, Herbert Gibson, Leig. Chambers and Chevallier-Boutell), also Mrs. Murray and Mr. Benits for gifts, and the Vice-President of the Board, Mr. W. Agar, there present who at very short notice, had kindly consented to hand the prizes.

When the prizes had been distributed, there was an adjournment for tea, what time various magnificos in fighting cloaks, velvet bonnets, fierce soldados in cuirasses and morions with clattering rapiers appeared suddenly and darted about among the trees. The explanation was that "Twelfth Night or What You Will" was being staged for that occasion only.

The scenery was of a simplicity to please the Elizabethan Stage Society, but very pleasing with its backing of tall trees, palms and dense shrubbery. The cast was as follows:

Orsino, Duke of Illyria, E. B. Morley; Sebastian, brother to Viola, J. D. L. Garrod; Antonio, a Sea Captain, friend to Sebastian, W. B. C. Grant; Valentine and Curio, gentlemen attending on the Duke, E. Ridley and A. Mulcahy; Sir Toby Belch, uncle to Olivia, A. D. Martin; Sir Andrew Agne-Cheek, G. V. Kennard; Malvolio steward to Olivia, F. F. Keen; Clown, and Fabian, servants to Olivia, O. Tudor and J. C. Wright; Priest, P. H. Christie; Officer, J. K. Davis; Olivia, R. A. Dixon; Viola, S. Gildea; Maria, Olivia's woman and Olivia's servant, R. C. Knight and R. Colvill-Jones; Lords: R. Murray, R. Garrod, G. Walberg, and S. Keen; Officers: R. Knapp, F. Kennard; Musicians: G. Lloyd Davies, R. Morley, R. Cooke, H. Gilderdale, S. Coates, H. Warren.

It is really not fair to criticise productions under such conditions, suffice it to say that Mr. Morgan had done wonders with the material at his command. The piece was surprisingly well dressed, and if the characters were a little monotonous in delivery, they were letter perfect. Sir Toby, by the way, looked a little too much like a "discarded unjust serving man" of the Burdolph type, and not enough the gentleman and fellow of infinite jest that he was. Malvolio was clear in speech, and played according to tradition in a red beard.

"in yellow stockings,

And cross-gartered, most villainously."

Teste the Clown, was a duo decimo edition, and Olivia with a strong masculine voice, was an exceedingly pretty girl, as was also Viola. The prompter had an easy time and no one can reasonably ask more, and when the curtain fell, the production might be reasonably classed with last year's "Midsummer Night's Dream." By that time trains were waiting and the assembly dispersed.

DEATH IN PASEO DE JULIO

SUPPOSED FALL FROM A BALCONY.

Deaths from violence in the Paseo de Julio are not circumstances of unusual occurrence, and the decease of Antonio Castellano therefore does not excite the same horror which it ought to do in another locality. The man in question was found on Sunday morning lying outside a fonda, number 1280, where he lived in a room with a balcony about 7 metres above the street. Two persons sleeping in the same room were arrested, but later released as innocent of causing the wounds on the deceased, to the skull, face and body. The theory held is that death was the result of a fall from the balcony into the street.

THE JOYS OF THE OPEN ROAD

A SEARCH FOR LOTUS LAND.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—This is a suggestion to any of your readers inclined to form one of a party to take the road north as far as Paraguay or Bolivia, seeking out some delightful valley "flowing with milk and honey," in which to settle down permanently—or otherwise. The idea is to take the open road on foot; to go by rail is too mechanical. The open road has its pleasures and much experience may be gained which will be useful later on, the railway would give us no such experience, it would land us at the railhead exactly as we leave Buenos Aires, quite unprepared for the sudden change from city life.

I go into no details here, but if there are any ready to consider and discuss the idea, I invite them to send me their names and addresses, c/o the Editor of the BUENOS AIRES HERALD. There are others who may know something of the road and the ultimate destination from whom suggestions and information would be useful, and with the Editor's permission, I invite them to send him their letters for publication.—Yours, etc.,

FORASTERO.

LA PLATA SCANDAL

SERIOUS ALLEGATIONS AGAINST A CRIMINAL JUDGE.

Legal circles in La Plata have become considerably excited over a very serious charge which has been preferred against the criminal judge, doctor Scolbizer. The charge of having converted to his own use certain sums of money of the Gymnasia and Esgrima Club, of which Club the judge is President, was preferred against him on Oct. 10 last, by Señor H. L. Lespada, secretary to the judge in Department No. 1, and has just been made public.

The exact details are unknown, but it appears that the matter has to do with gambling funds, which were entered into a book of which a member, Camilio Lavallen had charge, and which he handed over to the President of the Club.

The details so far as are known are sufficiently unsavoury, and have been considered sufficiently serious for the chief of the jury to hand over the case to Doctor Gordillo.

EXPORT OF WINES

MARKED INCREASE OF BULK.

From Jan. 1, 1915, to September 30, 563,077 litres of wine were exported from the country in barrel, almost entirely to foreign states which have suffered in their own wine industry on account of the war.

This is an increase of 459,829 over the quantity exported last year.

This is only one of the fields in which the National Industries have reaped direct benefit from the war and it is possible that when the good qualities of Argentine wines secure appreciation where they have perhaps never been met with before; there may showing up a steady and regular demand for those classes which carry and keep well, which by no means applies to all. The Andine Provinces from Mendoza to Salta produce wines of excellent quality but some of them are scarcely heard of outside the Province of their production. This is for instance the case with the very rich and sweet wines of Catamarca. The European war has greatly damaged the famous French wine growing industry and the rains have been injurious to Italian production while Spain has suffered also from scarcity and dearth of sulphate, all of which European misfortunes, tend to help the Argentine industry.

It should not however be forgotten that other countries also can produce sound wines and that Australian Burgundies and Clarets and Californian wines of the same types, have for years had a ready market in Europe.

Camp Notes

(By Our Agricultural Editor.)

Mr. Harry Blunt, from Sanquillo, was a purchaser of two most promising fillies at the sales of blood stock on Dec. 10. The animals were bred at Haras el Carmen, and if the same luck attend them as has on many previous occasions characterised this gentleman's connections with horses, then it can confidently be expected that they will be heard of again as prize winners.

With less arrivals at Liniers, former values for cattle have been sustained and medium weighted animals of good quality have been sought after. Heavy fat cows, or other heavy animals for local consumption, have experienced a somewhat slow demand, while previous values for calves, if of good quality, have been maintained. It is reported that good quality steers are still worth 27 cents per pound in the camp. The arrival of pigs has been only moderate, and a fair selling trade experienced for animals of a suitable weight, which were selling up to 34 cents per kilos. Sheep have been forward in smaller numbers, and a firmer selling trade was experienced.

Amongst camp visitors to the City during the week was Mr. George Gordon-Davis, General Manager of the Estancias Cecilio Lopez (Limited), who arrived in town on Wednesday, and left again last night for estancia Las Dos Marias, Lopez, F.C. Sud.

The Western Railway should have a pretty busy time of it when the harvest is over if nothing phenomenal happens to interfere with agricultural interests. In the district of General Pinto, crops are better than have been experienced for years, though on some of the older chacras there is a slight appearance of blight, and opinions differ as to whether this is caused by the late frosts, root-grubs, or the want of proper tillage and cultivation. On the estancia "Salale," which is divided into agricultural holdings, both wheat and linseed present a very healthy look, and every promise is given of a bumper harvest. So far the locusts have been conspicuous by their absence. The grazing camps are a perfect picture to see. Stock are in exceptionally good condition.

Mr. Mark MacCormack, who may be said to be a pioneer in the raising of and improvement of the breeding of cattle in the far-off "Chaco," returned on December 8 from a visit to his camp in that region. He reports everything looking bright and prosperous, and casually mentioned that he had brought down with him 500 head of cattle from the "Chaco" to Resistencia, and from thence by rail to Lobos, F.C. Sud., with only one casualty. The unfortunate animal to lose his life was one that took a liking to the flavour of the poisonous dip, that owners of travelling stock are compelled by the Government to use. Mr. MacCormack made a big commercial success some years ago by bringing "Chaco" reared cattle to his Marcos Paz camp, where they were fattened and sold at very remunerative prices, and then as now his losses by death in transit were exceptionally few.

SALE OF IMPORTED LINCOLN RAMS.

Messrs. Adolfo Bullrich and Co. held a very successful sale of imported Lincoln rams on December 10, when 25 very good quality sheep, the property of Mr. Joseph Shepherd, gave the very satisfactory average of $678. The highest price realised was $2100 for a very good quality ram acquired at that figure by Sr. Alcharron. Bidding at this sale was animated, and no doubt the quality of this consignment contributed in no small way to bring together the large concourse of interested spectators. The same importer announces another sale on Wednesday, Dec. 15, when, as usual with this importer, animals of high individual merit will be submitted for public competition.

A JOURNEY ON THE WESTERN

OPTIMISTIC HARVEST PROSPECTS

Taking advantage of the facilities afforded by the Western Railway Company for inspecting the vast areas of most fertile lands through which their systems extend, I have been able to see a sufficiency of their zone to warrant my most optimistic opinions regarding the forthcoming harvest prospects.

Within a short distance from the Capital and also about Mercedes, an intense system of cultivation is noticeable, to cater for the supply of vegetables for the Capital. Great attention appears to be given to this market gardening, while such lands appear to be handled in a careful and practical way, and their cumulative fertility is maintained by the utilisation of all available manure and also the occasional application of artificial manures. To view these well cultivated fields is a most convincing argument in favour of a suitable rotation of cropping, thereby retaining the fertility of the soil, and working it to the best advantage. The splendid example set by the intelligent and hard-working Italian gardeners could be very advantageously followed in the management of agricultural lands in other parts of this Republic.

It has formerly been the more general way simply to scratch the ground in the manner most convenient, sow the seeds, and the genial climate and productive virgin soil, combined to give a good and profitable yield, but as many of the lands which have now been cultivated for some time are showing signs of exhaustion, it is absolutely necessary that some more practical and intelligent system should be followed by the agriculturists in this country if success is to be attained. The Western Railway have been one of the pioneers in fomenting improved methods of husbandry, and in diffusing instructive pamphlets giving valuable guidance for the farmers in the selection of their seeds or other such-like useful information for the better cropping or cultivation of the soil. Lectures by competent instructors, and the use of museum wagons have also been most freely encouraged for the purpose of diffusing a more scientifically correct knowledge of the relative values of the different classes of grains and their proper treatment. The results of recognised practical experiments in grain growing are also placed at the disposal of agriculturists along this railway system.

Maize, especially the earlier sowings, is looking most promising, and with the recent beneficial rains for this plant, the later sowings will now "come away" all right. On many properties great areas of excellent sound plants are to be seen, but alongside these, where possibly the land has been worked under different conditions, the plants are weakly and light in colour. One of the most striking impressions that one so frequently gets in this Republic is the great contrasts between the quality of the same produce raised on practically the same class of soil, but under different conditions of working. If no thing unforeseen happens to the maize crop, there will be a very big yield in the Western zone.

Wheat is also looking most promising, and in the course of another week harvesting operations will be commencing. Taking the wheat fields all over, the yield this season will be a very satisfactory one, and likely to have a far-reaching effect in strengthening business relations between the large firms in the Capital and the local country storekeepers.

Oats are being cut at many points along the line, and this crop also appears to be generally good, though many fields show a lot of "greens" or second growth which in some countries would be detrimental to the sample, but here their presence makes less difference, as unfortunately the quality of oats grown in this country will never come to be recognised as first class. The heavy rain on Monday afternoon in the Lincoln district had the effect of knocking down many patches of oats, on some of the stronger soils where the straw was high, but notwithstanding, I don't think any very serious damage would be experienced as the result of the thunderstorm, or would any grain be likely to be "stripped" by hail. The oat harvest is commenced on nearly all the properties growing this cereal, and the results will be most satisfactory if the crop "thresh out" to its appearance in bulk from the line.

Writing about grains, it is regrettable that farmers do not show more care in the selection and cleaning of their seeds. Many fields that I observed sown with oats which were nearly ripe, would also show a large percentage of green heads of wheat, which carelessness is too frequently noticeable in this Republic. The great advantage to be obtained from the better selection of approved classes of seeds is very rarely paid much heed to here, and as the great improvement in the live stock of this country has been brought about through selection and the acquisition of the best strains of blood, so will the farmers have to take a closer interest in the class and quality of the seed they sow. When competitions for crop growing have been arranged and all farmers are allowed to compete by paying a nominal fee, then the interest and rivalry awakened for the production of the best samples will serve a good purpose for everyone engaged in agriculture, or the large number of people who are dependent on agriculture in this Republic.

The Garden and Orchard

HINTS TO AMATEURS.

(By the Rustic.)

Garden.—Continue the same practices as already set down for the cure of the garden. Transplant all plants which have developed sufficiently from the nurseries to the beds. For this operation we may repeat our previous instructions, viz., that the plants be taken out with a clod of earth round their roots and placed in the ground which has been previously dug round, and the earth loosened. Press in the earth round the plant, not too heavily, and water immediately. Transplanting should be done early in the morning or late in the afternoon, preferably the latter time. Put supports to chrysanthemums, cactus dahlias, etc., and continue to sow the seeds previously mentioned.

Orchard.—There is not much to be done in the orchard for the present beyond the necessary spraying against the different plagues, which instructions are set down in the respective section. But as winds are strong, it is advisable to revise all supports for holding up heavily laden branches, and others should be put where necessary. Vineyards should be revised and unfruitful branches cut away. Such branches or suckers, as they are commonly called, generally grow out of the old wood, and it is easy to tell them, as they bear no fruit. These suckers are useless and rob the fruit of a large part of its nourishment; hence their name. They should be suppressed periodically unless they are required for the future formation of the plant. This operation should be practised on all fruit trees as well as vines.

Plagues and Insects.—During the past week a serious invasion of "bicho quemador" has made its appearance in the gardens and trees in the streets of the suburbs of Buenos Aires, specially in the northern districts. It is difficult to give the reasons for this sudden invasion in such large quantities, but its effects are unfortunately very noticeable, and it is doing considerable damage. Arsenical sprays for this and other masticators should be employed. Besides we must continue to recommend the sulphate of copper sprays for cryptogams, as the weather continues favourable for their development. Under the General Notes we will deal more extensively on the treatment against the "bicho quemador."

Probable Weather.—As set forth in our last article, our fears of rain, hail and wind being the principle dangers of the present time of the season, were realised. We had the three during the storm which broke on Wednesday, and as a consequence very damp and hot days, and even a slight fog have been experienced. As the weather continues unsettled, it is likely we will have more rain and winds, hence the necessity of protecting trees and plants against the breakage of branches and the falling of the fruit, as well as the spraying against cryptogams. It would also be well to see enterprising fruit-growers taking collective measures against hail.

GENERAL NOTES.

The invasion of "bicho quemador," which has made its appearance, and to which we have already referred, is causing considerable annoyance, not only because of the damage it causes, by eating up all the foliage, and therefore ruining the fruit which will not ripen in consequence, but also owing to its sting which is very painful and raises blisters. It is a small black grub, all covered with black bristles and first makes its appearance in thick colonies round the trunk of the trees, where it remains sometimes for several days and then proceeds to the branches, still keeping in colonies. The pest will attack a certain branch until that is left bare of leaves, and then it proceeds on to the next and so on. Where the grubs are found clustered round the trunk or lower branches it is easy to destroy them by brushing them off with a wire-haired brush, or piece of tin held on edge and once on the ground killing them with hot water. They can also be destroyed by cutting away the branches affected, taking care not to shake the insects off, and then destroy them by fire. But this cannot always be done without destroying the formation of the tree. If the grub has already got possession of the foliage, then it should be sprayed with an arsenical solution.

In our Notes of October 30 we gave the formula for making sprays with Paris green, but in order to assist those who may have trouble in obtaining this article, we give another formula which is just as effective.

Dissolve half a kilo of white arsenic and one kilo of quicklime in 12 litres of water, and boil for 40 minutes, calculated from the time the water commences to boil. Slake apart 1 kilo of quicklime in 4 or 5 litres of water and add this to the solution above mentioned. For applying to robust plants such as fruit trees, etc., dilute the whole in the proportion of one to 30 parts of water, but for more delicate foliage, the proportion should be one in 50. Apply this with a sprayer to the foliage which is being eaten by the grub. It is no use spraying the grubs themselves, as the arsenic only has effect on them when they have digested a certain proportion. The lime is necessary to counteract the caustic effect of the arsenic on the foliage, and the solution should be prepared just before using. If allowed to stand for any length of time certain alterations take place which will be destructive to the plant. We hope that these simple methods will be followed by all who have this plague in their properties, and thus save them from destruction.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"In Ignorance," Buenos Aires.—In answer to your letter re the white scale which has appeared on your peach trees, this is most likely to be the "Diaspis Pentagona," and will surely destroy them in one or two years, according to the force of the invasion. You should send a small branch with the scale on it to the Defensa Agrícola, 524 Florida, for them to make its diagnosis, or to the writer, care of THE HERALD. If it is the "Diaspis Pentagona," the most effective cure for it would be the "Prospartella," but unfortunately the season is too advanced to apply it, as it can only be diffused from July to September. As a check to the expansion of the plague, you can cut away and burn all smaller branches badly attacked and spray with kerosene solution, the formula for which appeared in our issue of October 16, or with sulphur and lime solution, for which I can give you the formula if you will communicate with me.

The "Prospartella Berlesci How" was discovered some years back in Italy, I believe, and seeing its splendid results, the Government appointed a National Committee to make propaganda for its distribution, and the result has been that the peach tree plantation in the Tigre and other districts which were practically destroyed, have been renewed, and the growers have taken courage again in consequence. It is a minute wasp, which lays its eggs in large quantities in the bodies of the Diaspis (one in each), and when the worm is hatched it feeds on same and destroys it.

The Defensa Agrícola have special cultivations of the wasp, and in the proper season will provide branches with these cultivations gratis to anyone who will apply for them, by letter or personally, stating the extent of the plantation, etc.

These branches should be attached to the most infested parts of the plantation. One, two or three trees per hectarea, on which branches with "Prospartella" have been attached, will be sufficient to form centres of production, but the more there are the better. The effects will not be noticed during the first year, but the second and third show the results, and after the third year the plantation can

SALE OF PEDIGREE LINCOLN RAMS

Messrs. Casares Hnos. y Diehl commenced operations on December 9 in their new premises by selling consignments of Lincoln rams from many of the principal importers and breeders in this Republic. There was a large and representative attendance of buyers and a fair selling trade was experienced for the greater part of the animals on offer, though the extreme values recently ruling here were not attained on this occasion. The first animal to enter the ring was a magnificent Lincoln ram, imported by Messrs. Sidey and Poels, and bred by Messrs. Dean and Sons. This animal undoubtedly possessed great merit and was a bargain to his buyer Sr. Lopez Lecuba, at the moderate figure of $1,600, though this figure was exceeded at a later period by another specimen in this consignment which realised $1900 to Sr. Landa. The animals sold at this sale were consigned by such well known breeders as Sucesión de Manuel J. Cobo, La Belen y Las Barrancas; Messrs. Raul Etcheverry and Co., La Celia; Estancias Cecilio Lopez Ltd., Dos Marias; Gregorio Villafañe e Hijos, San Gregorio; Patricio Smith, La Mañana; besides the support of many of the principal importers. Commencing operations under such favourable auspices augurs well for the future success of the latest entry into the ranks of cattle salesmen in this Republic.

VICE-CONSULATE IN CONCORDIA

(To the Editor)

Sir,—After reading the letter from your local correspondent dated Dec. 5, I understand the tub thumping which is going on.

Advertisement is good for Pear's soap, but should not be indulged in by some people.

Your local correspondent is in a quicksand, and it is useless to struggle. The facts are not as he states.

During the time that Mr. Robinson was vice-consul he needed assistance owing to severe illness. Two friends came forward, first Mr. S. W. Roberts and then Mr. T. B. Morley, and both were animated by a desire to help a friend in a moment of need, but neither of them could accept the position of vice-consul, even if it were offered to them—which it has not been.

In the letter which I am referring to, your correspondent states that after the resignation of Mr. Robinson, Mr. T. M. Morley (sic) was duly authorised, etc., etc.

I repeat what I said in my previous letter, viz. that when Mr. Robinson resigned, the vice-consulate was closed, the approximate date being June of last year.

Yours, etc. GABRIEL.

be considered saved. Of course no insecticides of any description should be used on the trees during the time the prospartella is doing its work, and care should be taken when pruning not to destroy its colonies.

MENDOZA GRAPEHARVEST

A GOOD, AVERAGE CROP.

In these dry and thirsty times, it is natural to cast a glance at the prospects of the national wine harvest for the incoming season.

Some Mendoza growers have given their expert opinions to the effect that a reasonable and moderate harvest of good quality may be expected, although not a bumper crop, not one of the overflowing yields of some years, which even the inhabitants of the Metropolis may have heard of, when grapes made a sensational fall of five cents a kilo. In fact, there will just be enough comfortably for the home market and to provide for Paraguay, which is not too exigent. In weight it may roughly reach twelve million quintals of grapes, the cost of gathering and transport of which will be about 40 centavos per quintal. Apropos this is about the figure usually charged per kilo retail, so there is evidently still a modest profit left somewhere for somebody in the grape business.

The total cost of gathering and transport for the crop may then represent some five million pesos, while the growing will be about as much again. Anything beyond this represents profit for somebody—probably the middleman or some of the innumerable diddlers and parasites who manage to attach themselves more firmly to an industry than any bicho can ever do.

UNITED STATES HARVESTS

A RECORD YEAR.

The value of the principal crops of the United States for this year is officially estimated at five and a half millions of American gold dollars, or half a billion more than the value in 1914, which was then the record year.

The production of wheat was the largest ever known in any country, namely, 1,002,029,000 bushels, worth $932,888,999. Oats were produced to the enormous total of 1,517,118,999 bushels, worth $532,599,822, and corn gave 3,090,509,000 bushels, worth $1,913,025,071. Barley, rye, buckwheat, cotton, tobacco and rice were the other crops contributing to the enormous value of soil products.

PRICE FOR A FAT BULLOCK

An Australian record in the price paid for a fat bullock was put up at Burnie (Tasmania) recently. The animal was a purebred five-year-old Durham, and the purchasers Messrs. J. J. Jacobs and E. G. Clark, each of whom carry on a butchering business in Burnie. Bidding began at £60, and quickly rose to £90. Before £100 was reached bids were not confined to £1. From that figure the price steadily increased, and when £113 was called the animal became excited, and forced its way through the crowd. On being brought back he continued restless; but that did not interfere with bidding, and finally £120 was reached. Van Dieman's Land Company was the seller, the animal having been bred and fattened on its Circular Head property. The bullock weighed 2891 lbs.

Concert at the Port.

The English School Prize giving and Christmas concert were held at the Port last night. Although the attendance was not large yet there were quite a number of people present. The first half of the programme was taken up by the children, who all filled their parts in an excellent manner and at the same time reflected credit on their teacher for his patience and perseverance in so training them. Some very clear, if short recitations were also given by the children, "My Shadow" by Teeny Robertson being much applauded, as was Florrie Kelly's piano playing and singing of a patriotic song. The recitations of the girls were certainly much better given than those by the boys, as the latter rushed through them as rapidly as possible. During the interval tea and refreshments were served to all those present, and Mr. Harding Green afterwards spoke a few words on the progress made by the scholars under Mr. Holman's direction and expressed a hope that the number of them would go on increasing. The prizes were then presented to the children by Mrs. Harding Green. After the interval those present had the pleasure of hearing Miss Graham sing again. Owing to the lateness of the evening other singers did not have time to respond to the encores given them. Among the artistes were Mrs. Smithers, who sang for the first time in the Port and was much appreciated, her song being "My Dear Soul"; Mr. Smithers, who is well known in Buenos Aires, sang "The Deathless Army"; and Mrs. Kelly, who has been absent in England for some time past, received much applause for her song "The Sunshine of your Smile." Mr. Holman gave a "sermon" entitled "Old Mother Hubbard" which caused much amusement; and Mr. S. MacDougall played a violin solo. As a termination a very entertaining farce, entitled "Quiet Apartments" was given by Mr. Holman and some of his pupils. One sketch entitled "John Bull" given by the children was very well done. Roland Mortimer appeared in the name-part. A very pleasant evening was brought to a close at 11.30 by the singing of "God Save the King."

The investigation of damage to New Dry Dock.

As reported last week considerable damage has been done to the bed of the new dry dock by the surface water breaking through the top covering of concrete. The emptying of this dock is now completed, and the Minister of Public Works has chosen a commission of engineers to investigate the matter and report on the damage done and the filtration in the dock.

A Spanish Globe Trotter.

Among the visitors here is Sr. Vicente C. Castilla, who started out in 1913 on a journey around the world in order to obtain the prize of 109,000 pesetas ($15,000 m.n.) offered by the Spanish Geographical Society. This gentleman is 32 years of age and he proposes to finish his trip in 1920. He carries several documents with him stating who he is and what he is doing, and has already passed through Spain, Portugal, France, French Algeria, and Morocco. From the Argentine he intends to proceed to Chili from where he will take ship for the Asiatic continent. Two of the conditions imposed are that the land journey must be done on foot and he must live by the sale of picture post cards.

Items in Brief.

The steamer Yorkmoor is shortly expected here with 2,600 bales of hessen from Calcutta.

At the beginning of this month there were some 183 cases in the local hospital here. Last month outside assistance was given to 529 men, 279 women, 837 children, and 597 eye cases were attended. The ambulance was used 35 times free of charge, and twice when paid for.

On Wednesday last after a very hot day, a splendid rain fell practically all over this district, varying from 10 to 30 millimeters; and in Algarrobo on the Southern line to Rio Colorado, where the rainfall up to the present has been very little this season, as much as 45 millimeters fell. In some parts a little damage was caused by this rain to the oats which are now being cut, but on the whole the rain did much good everywhere.

An application for the changing of the hours for despatching of parcels by the Custom House at the local Post Office has been made by the authorities to the Post Master General. These hours now are from 7 to 10 a.m., and the National Bank, where the stamped paper required for this work is not opened before the latter hour.

A thriving business in the theft of bicycles is in progress here. Up to the present the riders have been accustomed to leave their machines on the side walk handy for anyone to pick up and ride out of sight long before they are missed.

In the enrolment of conscripts here from Dec. 1 to Dec. 9, 483 men presented themselves, out of which number 26 were declared medically unfit for service and 71 were passed to the Servicio de Auxiliares.

District Notes.

On Dec. 19 a sale of land consisting of 325 hectares and divided into two parts is to take place at the station of Buratovich. This land is situated about seven leagues from Medanos and in the midst of a wheat and alfalfa zone. Good water can be got at from 4 to 6 meters. The reserve price fixed is to be $12,240 m.n.

A sale of land for workmen and speculators is to take place on Dec. 19 at Villa Rosas. This will consist of 22 small plots alongside of the paved road leaving to the Port.

Several residents in and near to the station of Mascota have applied to the traffic superintendent of the Southern railway for the erection of a yard for trucking animals there, as now they have to send their stock to one of the two stations on either side and this naturally puts them to greater expense. A cyclone passed through the town of Hiuca Renanco on Thursday last blowing five roofs off and wounding several people.

The general prospects of the harvest in the Saldungaray district are said to be very good and with the exception of five or six chacras the average yield is estimated at 10 per hectarea.

Like several other camp towns, Coronel Dorrego is now being invaded by men out of work waiting for the harvest to come on, and who are a source of trouble and worry to the residents by the persistent begging and, given the slightest opportunity, pilfering.

In the district of Villarino there is every prospect of there being a very good grape harvest this year as up to the present the vines are in excellent condition everywhere and in some of the quintas in Mascota and Medanos many of the quinteros are hoping to make as much as two thousand dollars out of their small quintas by the sale of their fruit. They calculate the yield of each vine at 5 kilos, which will be sold at ten cents the kilo on the ground.

The general direction of roads have notified the department of public works that it has been decided to open a road alongside of the line between the stations of Estomba, Cabildo and Adeli Corti in order to allow a straight road between Bahia Blanca and Coronel Pringles. This question has been under discussion for the last ten years and the work was delayed on account of one man protesting against its being made through his property. This new road will shorten the journey between these two towns by over five leagues.

Devoto Tennis Club (Buenos Aires) v. Cordoba Athletic Club.

The tennis team of the Devoto Tennis Club of Buenos Aires arrived in Cordoba Saturday morning for their match with the Cordoba Athletic Club. Messrs. Macdonald, Newell, Reeves, Kirby, Tebbutt, Tarver and Johnston represented Devoto. The visitors were met at the Station by a delegation of the Cordoba A.C. consisting of Messrs. Dunbar, Hughes, Sadleir, Morton, Schultz and Babb. Motor cars were subsequently employed and a spin to Sarmiento Park and the Zoological Garden undertaken. An inspection of the "Exposición Granje" was also made and the different exhibits there were greatly enjoyed by all. The return trip was then made to the Hotel and after breakfast a visit was made to the Telephone Exchange where Mr. Hugh Wilson explained the working of the automatic system. Automobiles were again requisitioned and a trip made to Calera where the visitors were very much interested in the Hydraulic Station of the Cordoba Light and Power Company. After an inspection of the Station and Reservoir a visit was made to the Athletic Club Courts where the match was to take place on the following day. At night a banquet was given the Devoto men by the C.A.C. at the Plaza Hotel and after a very pleasant meal and some witty speeches it was decided to visit the National Observatory where Mr. M. L. Zimmer explained the operation of the intricate machinery and telescopes and a glimpse of Jupiter was also taken advantage of. Carriages were then taken to the Hotel.

The match was scheduled for 9.30 a.m. and shortly after the appointed time Captains Morton and Tebbutt made the necessary arrangements for the playing of the singles, which took place in the morning, one member of each team playing a "best in three" with their opponents and each match counting a point. The singles resulted as follows:—

Zimmer beat Tebbutt 6-3, 6-3.
Marks beat Macdonald 6-3, 6-2.
Babb beat Tarver 6-2, 6-2.
Schultz beat Kirby 4-6, 6-1, 6-1.
Dunbar beat Newell 10-8, 6-0.
Johnston beat Morton 6-4, 6-4.

Marks and Babb defeated Kirby and Tarver 6-2, 6-1; Newell and Johnston 6-0, 6-2; Tebbutt and Macdonald 7-5, 7-5.

Morton and Zimmer defeated Kirby and Tarver 6-2, 5-7, 6-0; Newell and Johnston 6-2, 6-4.

Dunbar and Schultz defeated Newell and Johnston 6-1, 6-2; Kirby and Tarver 6-2, 6-0.

Total:—Cordoba 7 points, Devoto 2 points.

The match resulting as follows:—

During the afternoon Mrs. C. C. Lewis assisted by Mrs. Charles Davis and Mrs. F. Lindeman gave tea in honour of the visitors.

The Devoto men invited the local club to join them at the Plaza where an excellent "spread" was greatly enjoyed by all present. An early start was made for the Central Argentine

COAL IN SAN JUAN

POSSIBILITIES OF VALUABLE FIELDS.

A discovery the value of which, should it fulfil the first impressions, cannot be overestimated from this country's point of view, has been made in the province of San Juan.

Bituminous deposits, traces of petroleum and anthracite have been reported and have given rise to the idea that coal in considerable quantities is present thereabout. Careful exploration has duly confirmed this supposition. As is usual, in this Republic perhaps more than in other countries, the most optimistic views are being taken concerning these discoveries. National finances are once more going to become all that is desirable through these wonderful riches, this veritable Eldorado, and so on; and yet, if the reports are carefully examined, nothing beyond traces of bitumen and anthracite have as yet come to light.

These indications are suggestive and no more, and point to carboniferous deposits of value over a very considerable tract of land.

It can be suggested that before too much enthusiasm is expended on the discovery, it is just as advisable to catch one's fish before eating it. At the moment, the wonderful and glowing accounts of this new Eldorado and source of national riches are without any foundation except in a most optimistic imagination.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY TO CHILI

DR. ROMULO NAON'S NEW APPOINTMENT

It was announced yesterday afternoon that the President of the Republic had offered to Doctor Romulo S. Naon, late Argentine Ambassador in the United States, the leadership of a special embassy which the Argentine is sending to Chili.

Dr. Naon has accepted this special Embassy, and as Ambassador Extraordinary will leave Buenos Aires for Santiago de Chili on Dec. 19. A senatorial ratification of this appointment will be requested to-morrow by the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

No statement has been made as to who will accompany Dr. Naon on his delicate mission.

Station where a reception was held in the special coach which was placed at the disposition of the tennis team. Mr. Newell rose to thank the ladies of the Cordoba Athletic Club on behalf of the visiting team for their kind hospitality and perfect luncheon and tea which they had so kindly provided.

It is expected that a return match will be played at Devoto during the month of January next, when the Buenos Aires boys promise to get part "of their own back."

Billiard Tournament at the English Club.

Another enjoyable billiard handicap is drawing to a close at the English Club and the majority of the second rounds have been finished. Last week Lang was successful in his match against Morton, the previous match between Davis and Morton which was won by the latter being declared void as they were drawn to play against each other.

Rural Exhibition.

The "Exposición Granjes" which is now being held in the building erected especially for the purpose at Chalet Crisol, is attracting much attention. No entrance fee is charged and numerous instructive and interesting exhibits are on view.

December 13.

Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Morton, accompanied by Miss Florence Morton, will leave town on Wednesday for La Cumbre, where a stay of some weeks will be made.

Mr. and Mrs. V. R. Sadleir, of San Vicente, have returned from an extended visit to Alta Gracia.

The billiard handicap at the English Club is commencing to "drag." The semi-finals stage has not yet been reached, due to the fact that some of the players absent themselves when their opponents are present prepared for play.

A letter has been received here from Lieut. E. H. Colman, formerly connected with the Central Cordoba Railway Company in Cordoba, also former Hon. Secretary of the Cordoba Athletic Club. Our old club member is now with one of the flying squadrons of the British Army engaged in taking new flying machines to France and bringing back the damaged ones. Colman reports a narrow escape on one of his flights when returning from France propelling a damaged plane. He was obliged to descend, and, luckily, landed safely on Dover beach. He is enjoying the best of health, and the snap-shot which he enclosed portrays him in his uniform of Lieutenant.

We are now passing through a terrific heat wave accompanied by a hot north wind, and it is hoped that a rain storm will soon arrive in order to cool off the atmosphere, which is almost stifling.

I regret to report the illness of Mr. Percy P. Schultz, who is confined to his bed with influenza.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hughes expect to go to their summer home at La Cumbre early in the coming month, for an extended stay.

DAY BY DAY IN ROSARIO.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Dec. 8.

The visit of the British Minister on Saturday was welcomed by many as an opportunity of renewing his acquaintance. I understand that Sir Reginald expressed himself as advocating that special efforts might be made on behalf of the Officers' Widows' and Families' Fund, the claims of which were apt to be overlooked.

Miss A. M. Gilbee, headmistress of the High School at Alberdi, is journeying down to Buenos Aires on Saturday with the candidates for the Cambridge examinations. It will be recalled that last year all the pupils entered from this School passed, one with special distinction.

Mrs. T. H. Marston, Miss Brewer, and Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Knight left Liverpool on Saturday, the 4th inst., on the s.s. Desna.

Mr. J. W. Marston has received a commission in his own regiment, the Liverpool Scottish.

On Friday the breaking-up entertainment at the Spanish School in connection with the S.A.M.S. will take place. All interested are heartily invited.

To-day being a feast day, rain fell in torrents during the whole morning. The only consolation is that it was very welcome in most camp districts.

I see some one has been having a cut at provincial correspondents. My experience has been that the provinces do not know how to treat correspondents. At home there is a certain etiquette, based on common courtesy, to which reporter and reported have come by custom to conform. In general one misses it here—speaking from the standpoint of the former.

The breaking-up sports in connection with St. Bartholomew's School will take place on Saturday, the 11th inst., at Plaza Jewell. The School Concert is fixed for the 22nd.

Bishop Every is expected down here on Sunday on a short visit, but will not be able to attend the bazaar owing to previous engagements.

Mr. and Mrs. Barnard and family left here last night on their way to England.

Mr. Barnard's place as storekeeper on the Pacific Railway is being taken by Mr. Morris from Junin.

A daughter was born to Mr. and Mrs. J. MacCoubrey on Tuesday last.

Mr. E. West is now back again from England on his annual visit to Bahia Blanca.

Mr. J. H. Cassels, who has been a well-known resident down here for some years past, has now finally taken his departure for Buenos Aires.

A large number of the members of the Port Athletic Club and their families attended the picnic held to-day at Quinta Godio.

The annual picnic of the Centro Social Society is to be held on Sunday on the Naposta at Spurr.

MISS ADELA VERNE

BY THE WAY

A Daily Survey of Events

Another of Them!

If the war has revealed one important fact—long suspected by some of us—it has laid bare the weakness of the British House of Commons. Place-hunting as a profession appeals to many men, and the growth of mere Liberalism has led to the introduction of an unsavouriness into English politics that is a danger to the well-being of the nation. Granted that the old system of pocket-boroughs was bad, it should nevertheless be remembered that the average member of Parliament in those days was a man of disinterested motives; politics appealed to him as part of the great game of life, as a social asset. To-day, however, the tendency is for entry into the legislative chamber to become more and more a commercial venture; either a man desires to obtain comfort and £400 a year, with the prospect of a highly-paid ministerial appointment later, or he seeks to further a business cause by representing it in the House. Instead of the old, not too intelligent son-of-the family, we to-day have a keener witted but smaller principled type of man. And many of these people can well be done without. The irony of it is that during the present war, the real weaknesses should have been found on the Liberal and pseudo-Liberal (otherwise Labour) benches. All the "cranks," enemies of England, and mean spirited little people were in former times loyal supporters of the Government. Mr. Arthur Ponsonby and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald (or is it MacDonald Ramsay?) are two notorious examples of the anti-England type; instead of seeking for means to win the war, they try to discover plans to end it. Mr. Mason, of Coventry, is just as objectionable. Mr. Burns, the mute traitor of Battersea, has already been pilloried. And last comes Mr. R. D. Denman, M.P., for Carlisle—also a member of the "Union of Democratic Control." Mr. Denman has been disowned by his constituents and in other times would probably resign. But £400 a year is not at all a bad thing for professional politics in war time, so Mr. Denman sticks fast. These men, strange to say, are of the gang which consistently opposed all measures for the strengthening of the Navy and rejoiced in the reduction of the Army. Were England a less civilised country, they would probably have been roughly handled long ago. As it is they are legislators—the heaven-sent rulers of the British people.

Way Down in Mexico.

Germany has afforded the United States many interesting problems during the last sixteen months; now she has furnished yet another. What will be the attitude of Woodrow Wilson to von Papen's decision to settle in Mexico? What can Wilson do? It is very doubtful, indeed, if anything can be done by the State Department to prevent von Papen going whither he pleases; but, from the standpoint of the States, the presence of von Papen in Mexico should be the reverse of pleasing. It has already been asserted with some show of authority that Germany was responsible for the fermenting of revolutions in Mexico, and that she is engaged in yet another venture of the kind; it is also well known that to cross the border into U.S. territory is not a difficult task. Why, then, should von Papen not supervise the policy of sedition in Mexico while at the same time controlling the acts of the bomb-men across the frontier? Von Papen's task appears to be simple; that of the United States Government difficult.

FUTILE TALK OF PEACE

FRIDAY, December 10, 1915.

Once more there is talk of peace being brought about, not by the pressure of military success on one side or the other, but by what is apparently assumed to be the simple process of arguing about terms, and arriving at an amicable agreement under which all belligerents should cease hostilities. When we hear this kind of talk, or read of such ideas, we begin to wonder whether the people indulging in the discussion really know what the nations are fighting about, and appreciate to what an uncompromising extent the Allies, and particularly Britain, are committed to see the war through to the stage when an exhausted and beaten Germany yields, not because she desires peace, but because she must escape annihilation. We cannot say that this will be Germany's fate, but if Britain is not pledged to assure Europe that never again shall such a war be possible, then we would like to know to what Britain is pledged.

In maintaining this point we do not lose sight of the fact that Germany may deliver back to Belgium all that Belgium had before the war; restore to France all that rightly belongs to France, and in every other way yield every demand which the Allies are fighting to enforce, and that she may do this without being beaten in a military sense, but is it quite sane to believe that she will do this as the result of argument, unsupported by overwhelming force? Yet this delusion appears to have taken possession of certain minds. In those minds there seems to exist an idea that all the Allies have to do is to point out to Germany that the war has lasted long enough; that it is time peace and concord reigned over the earth once more, and that in a perfectly amiable way Germany will consent to giving the Allies all they have fought for, and the world shall be precisely as it was before the war.

The people who think in this way are of two classes. There are the confirmed pacifists, and the blind patriotic egotists. The first have about as much of substance on which to support their point of view, as the latter. The pacifist has always believed that argument and agreement make for peace; the other class are under the delusion that victory is already won, and Germany is nervously anxious to grant any terms, by which her utter defeat may at this stage be avoided. We need not trouble with the pacifist. He is generally a peace-at-any-price man, and it is unimportant to him whether Belgium is effaced, or whether Germany is allowed to grow mightier and more offensive than ever, so long as peace exists. The other individual has received his answer from Germany. Yesterday he was under the belief that Germany was about to announce terms of peace. To-day Germany tells him through the Imperial Chancellor that if the Allies care to put forward proposals compatible with Germany's dignity, Germany will listen to them.

We must confess that this does not support the idea that Germany is on her last legs, and though it may sound quite unpatriotic we are very much afraid that if the Allies at this juncture told Germany precisely what they want in the way of terms and asked her to agree, the enemy would merely laugh at them. As a matter of hard fact, Germany's announcement is about the most severe rebuff with which peace-talkers have yet met, for surely it needs no discussion to prove that she is clearly not in the mood to listen to the only terms which the Allies could suggest, compatible with their dignity and their honour. Yet one section would have us believe that Germany is amiable and tractable, and the other persists in inviting us to share in the delusion that she is beaten and dejected.

Just what Mr. Asquith had in mind when he answered the question of Mr. Phillip Snowden in the House of Commons, it is difficult to tell from his answer. It looks to us just the sort of answer that might be expected from a politician, and possibly for that reason it means nothing. As a strong man, a man of action and courage, and as an uncompromising enemy of Germany, Mr. Asquith would have said quite plainly that when the Allies had accomplished all they had pledged themselves to accomplish they would fulfil their obligations to one another, and jointly impose peace, not discuss it. If, however—he would have added—Germany cared to anticipate that moment and accede to all the terms framed long ago by the Allies, she could be sure of peace within twenty-four hours. In the matter of peace there does not appear to us to be any question of compromise or bargaining. Therefore what is there even for the belligerents to discuss? Britain is pledged to do certain things, and so are France, Russia and Italy. Can they, with honour, leave Belgium to Germany, or Serbia to Austria? Can they leave Germany a great military power to run amok once more? Can they buy her off? They can do neither with any honour to themselves, and until Germany cries for peace and peace only on the Allies terms, the war must go on.

THE PEACE MOVEMENT IN GERMANY

SUNDAY, December 12, 1915.

There are persistent and highly credible reports of a rapidly growing movement in Germany for peace. One series of messages of Dutch origin assert that on the occasion of the German Chancellor's recent speech before the Reichstag an organized demonstration was made in favour of peace, vast crowds of people taking part in the movement. Now we have the report of the London correspondent of the "New York Herald" that "opposition to the war (in Germany) is assuming vast proportions," and that nine-tenths of population of the two empires are of the same mind as the German socialist Scheidemann who has demanded peace. Unfortunately this statement is accompanied by the announcement that women as well as men have been bayoneted while making demonstrations, and that the Junker party is stronger than ever. The same correspondent adds:—"So great is the power of this party that Germany will not yield until she is forced to do so by force of circumstances which will happen when her enemies impose upon her conditions more severe than those under consideration at present."

We regret very much to be forced to point out that very little comfort can be derived from a message of this nature, because it is so obviously contradictory. If the people of Germany and of Austria-Hungary are completely in the power of the Junkers (the militarists), then it is quite obvious that the fact that nine-tenths of the people are for peace counts for nothing. We are disinclined to believe that there is such a widespread desire in Germany for peace, but that point is quite immaterial for the purpose of argument on the question of whether Germany will sue for peace, on the terms of the Allies, or on her own terms. In such questions the mass of the German nation do not count. Germans may call themselves democrats, or socialists, or whatever they choose. They may boast of their culture and their civilisation, of their religious, political and civil liberties, and seek to put themselves on a par with the people of other enlightened countries, but the unpalatable fact which they have to swallow is that they have absolutely no voice in the settlement of the question of peace or war, nor, in fact, in any other great question involving the destiny of their country.

Under the Prussian system of disciplinary government, which we call militarism, the higher affairs of state are completely out of the hands of the German democracy. The Reichstag can be over-ridden at any time. When a state of war is declared to exist, or even when it is declared to be imminent, all power automatically passes into the hands of the military authorities, and the few ministers who are responsible, not to the people, but to the Kaiser. It cannot be denied that the system has certain advantages, especially when it exists in a country whose ambitions can only be furthered by resorting to the use of a machine which the democracy are not permitted to handle. When the Kaiser at the outset of the war asked the people to lay their hands in his he may have been quite sincere in seeking the united support of his people, but it was after all merely a formality. The hands then gripped were not to be withdrawn at will, and it is certain they will not be released if the intention of their owners be to lay them on the great military machine and stop its action.

It is obvious that until the Junkers, or the military party, want peace, or admit the people's right to demand it, Germany will not have peace, and all talk to the contrary is idle. The eyes of the Junkers see only the Star of Victory. They know that in a military sense Germany is by no means beaten. In their obsession and egotism they may not perceive the possibility of final defeat, and it is quite certain that until they do they will yield no vestige of their power to the peace party. Of course, if the latter be really as large as it is said to be, and can grow still stronger, it may force the militarists to give way, but the only form of force possible is that which a successful revolution represents. And how can a revolution be successful when the revolutionists are mere unarmed citizens, and the Junkers control a mammoth army?

And to be quite frank about it, it must be admitted that the Junkers can present a very good case to the people should the latter show signs of impatience. As the correspondent referred to says, the militarists will not yield until obliged to do so by force of circumstances which will give the Allies the power to impose more severe conditions than can be discussed at the moment. When that moment arrives the war party will be under double pressure, that from without, and that from within the empires, assuming that the peace party has not already been annihilated by the process of which some of its disciples have already had experience. Looking at the question fairly and squarely, we cannot see that there is much to hope for from the German peace party. The Allies have to go a good deal further than they have gone. They must themselves smash the machine which the Junkers alone are allowed to start or stop. In other words they must force peace on Germany, not expect to have it granted by Germany.

THE UNITED STATES - WAR OR PEACE

TUESDAY, December 14, 1915.

The sending of the American Note relative to the sinking of the Italian steamer Ancona, to Austria, leaves available only two contingencies consistent with ordinary conceptions of national honour—either Austria must apologise for her crime before the world, or the United States must fight her. We can see no other issue to the diplomatic conflict which has been entered upon between the two countries. There have been many strong notes from America to Germany, notes which in normal times would have been accepted as ultimata, but in this instance the United States either means war, in the event of non-compliance with her demand, or she is courting the contempt of the world should Austria procrastinate or defy her, and should she then calmly recede from the determined attitude she has taken up.

To prophesy what will happen is difficult. The note itself requires little argument or explanation. Austria is told as plainly as words can indicate that the United States has investigated all the evidence available, and has come to the conclusion that the sinking of the Ancona, deliberately and in atrocious circumstances, is utterly unjustifiable. It goes on to say that the crime was inhuman and barbarous to such an extent that the United States Government cannot believe that the Austrian Government can seek to justify it, and that it must have been committed in defiance of instructions. It is well to bear in mind that no explanation is asked for. Apparently the United States wants no discussion as to whether or not the commander of the Austrian submarine acted rightly or wrongly; justifiably or otherwise. It demands, plainly and peremptorily that the Austrian Government shall disown the act as illegal and indefensible, that it will punish the guilty officer, and grant indemnity to American sufferers by that act.

It would be impossible to imagine a diplomatic communication of greater strength and virility than this one. It is an ultimatum, and nothing that can ever be said by any American jurisprudent can give it any other character. Austria must repudiate the act of one of her warships at once, or—The United States Government does not state what the consequences will be, but no sane being can deny that a distinct threat of drastic action is implied. The question is whether Austria will accede to the American demand, or rather whether Germany will do so. For after all Austria's actions are entirely dictated by Germany. It is asserted that Austria, already tired of the war, and of domination by Germany, would if given a free hand, assent to the demands of the United States. But she is not free, and even if she be really desirous of meeting the United States in this matter, she can do so only if Germany consent to her making the necessary repudiation. Should Austria refuse to be directed in the matter by her ally the effect of such independence will soon be visible in the breaking down of the rigid union which has hitherto characterised Austro-German relationship.

It may be argued that Germany will be a consenting party to Austria meeting the demands made by America, because Germany knows that for her and her allies, bonds, treaties, and promises can be broken whenever occasion demands, and that it may be well to satisfy America now without either Germany or Austria being bound to alter their conduct in the future. This, however, is mere sophistry and if the United States is now determined that Austria shall repudiate the Ancona crime, or fight, then the United States means that the repudiation shall be genuine and its effects permanent. If Austria with Germany's approval now apologises and later on repeats the offence, then by all the honour that a nation holds dear, the United States must then declare war on her.

This is assuming, however, that Austria will genuinely or otherwise repudiate the crime and make the necessary amends as demanded by the United States. Supposing, however, that she refuses? In that case we can see no other course for the United States to pursue with honour but to declare war on her. The American people have shown remarkable patience in the present war, and with some degree of justification the world at large has wondered what amount of insult and disrespect the nation would stand. If the Cabinet were composed of men like Mr. Roosevelt there would have been war long ago, and even now it is highly probable that it is his robust influence which is impelling the Cabinet to act so vigorously in the Ancona case. Whether the government at Washington is really firm on this occasion in its demands on the Teutonic outlaws we cannot say, but of this we are certain, that the American people who hold the same point of view as does Mr. Roosevelt on questions of national honour, will never tolerate any retreat from the position which the Government has now taken up. Austria must either give America prompt and complete satisfaction, or America must fight.

THE BALKANS DISAPPOINTMENT

WEDNESDAY, December 15, 1915.

No matter how we may look at it, the situation in the Balkans has resolved itself into a bitter disappointment from the point of view of the Allies. Information available at the moment of writing states that the British and French troops have entirely evacuated Serbia, and are now concentrated on Salonika, while the Turks and Bulgarians are threatening to attack them there. This attack, however, is likely to be met vigorously, and it is reported that Greece will be forced to join the Allies and protect herself against a hostile invasion. From this latter fact the keen optimists may take some comfort, but for our part we are not inclined to place much reliance on the support of Greece, which will probably only be given to get the Turks and Bulgars out of the country, and will extend no further.

From a military viewpoint the development of the campaign designed to protect Serbia is undoubtedly one of the most serious setbacks of the whole war. We have frequently pointed out how desirable it was that the Allies should preserve in this field some liberty of action and freedom of manoeuvre because the Balkans presented up till recently the only front on which the Teutonic alliance was readily vulnerable. Now, however, this advantage has been lost, and we are very much afraid that when the time comes for an offensive by the Allies they will encounter a similar condition of affairs to what prevails on all other fronts and there will again be a deadlock. It may not please some people, but we have to credit the enemy with some degree of forethought, and certainly a high capacity for preparation. It is not reasonably to be supposed, therefore, that the Teutonic forces will fail to take the fullest advantage of the time gained between the retreat of the Allies and their subsequent advance, to fortify a strong defensive line against which the Allies will be compelled to batter for many months at great cost to themselves.

Politically we cannot help feeling that what has happened in the Balkans is discreditable to the Allies. Against the military command and the army itself we cannot fairly utter one word of criticism. A small force of British and French troops, reinforcing a badly strained and partially disorganised remnant of the Serbian army, has really done all it could have been expected to do. In fact it appears to have done considerably more than it was right to ask it, and that the retreat in the face of overwhelming numbers has been conducted with so slight a loss, speaks volumes for the skill of the command and the fighting qualities of the men. The Irish Brigade has been unstintingly praised for its great heroism, and it is indeed pleasant to read that under most trying conditions the famous regiments mentioned have once more demonstrated their magnificent qualities and upheld their glorious reputations.

But in writing of the skilful handling of the retreat and the self-sacrificing devotion of the brave Irish, we cannot be expected to count these as virtues to offset the woeful blundering of the Government and the crass stupidity of the politicians, who doubtless would be glad to keep the public preoccupied with stories of heroism at a moment when the public might justifiably look to the proper authorities for an explanation of the causes leading to the retreat. Months ago the Government was warned that a desperate crisis was possible, and that prompt action was necessary to avert it. Mr. Asquith himself said that the Government recognised the danger, and was determined that brave Serbia should not be left a prey to the nefarious designs of Germany, Austria and treacherous Bulgaria.

It might well be asked to-day to what extent the Government has kept its pledge? We ourselves could not conceive that little or nothing could or would be done. We believed that the Allies, and particularly Britain had learned their lessons from Turkey and from Bulgaria, and that never again would they be caught unprepared. We forsook our critical attitude for the moment and accepted the statements that strong forces were on their way. We believed that the campaign would be promptly and effectively conducted and we were wrong—deceived like the general public by the idle talk of supposedly responsible persons with whose utterances it is considered to be a crime to differ.

We do not know what Serbia thinks of the manner in which she has been defended from her "nefarious enemies," but we can imagine it. She will doubtless wonder where the hundreds of thousands of men are that she had a right to expect. Rumania, likewise is also pondering deeply over the question of what justification the Allies can urge for her to join them, and doubtless she is already determined that until they can show more strength than they have shown she will remain strictly neutral. What interests us more than these speculations is, however, what steps the British Government intends to take to meet the newly threatened campaign of the Teutonic alliance against Egypt and possibly India? Is this threat to be treated with contempt like all others, or is it to be taken seriously and properly met? A swift and determined attack on Egypt by way of Asia Minor, involving the destruction of the Suez Canal, is not an impossibility to be laughed to scorn. It is a very grave probability, and for our part we shall not feel satisfied that it will not succeed until we learn emphatically that Britain has half a million men and all necessary equipment in Egypt to meet it. In view of what has transpired it is quite apparent that delay and tinkering methods are not to be thought of. Britain must act and she must act swiftly and decisively.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY

THURSDAY, December 16, 1915.

A highly significant cablegram published in our issue yesterday embraced the gist of an announcement made in the House of Commons by the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, concerning the activities in South America of German firms whose trading operations are mainly designed to assist the enemy. Lord Robert Cecil stated that these firms would be put on the "black list" as a warning to British firms not to do business with them. This announcement is we believe merely the precursor of a definite statement of policy by the British Government on a highly important subject involving not alone the activities of enemy concerns, but those of some supposedly British houses also.

The whole question of the trading relations between British firms and Germans, is one on which "The Herald" has always taken a definite and forceful stand, and it gives us some satisfaction to know that even late in the day the British Government is bringing within its official purview a subject that undoubtedly calls for particularly close attention. We can claim that we have been largely responsible for arousing public interest in the general question, and we have materially assisted to bring boldly into the light certain transactions that needed publicity. One such case was that of the steamer "T. R. Thompson" loaded with British coal, by British colliery-owners, and dispatched to Buenos Aires for the enemy. Our efforts have not always been favourably viewed in certain quarters, and more than once when we have been inconveniently persistent—in the opinions of some people—in making full exposures of gross violations of the spirit and intention of the Trading With The Enemy Act, we have been told that "business is business," and that sentiment and patriotism do not count where dollars are concerned.

Now we believe we are to see a change in the tone of the people who have talked in this way. There has been a good deal of spurious patriotism not only in the United Kingdom, but in local British circles. In some instances it has served to cloak operations that would disgrace the name of British trade, and frequently it has taken the form of complaisant toleration of transactions that called for immediate repudiation by every respectable and patriotic British house. We are aware that a stock excuse in many cases has been that the law has not been quite clear, or that the Government had not expressly prohibited the particular relationship with the enemy, which happened to be under discussion. We take it that this excuse will not hold good in the future under the course of action proposed by the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, for then we shall know with whom we may deal, and with whom we may not, and there will not remain such a wide latitude over which individual conscience may roam.

We have reason to believe that the British Government has lately gone rather closely into German activities in this country. In all conscience it should have discovered enough to make it realise the need for drastic action, not alone against the Germans but against certain people associated with them in transactions, highly profitable to the individual, but highly inimical to British national interests. Through the proper official quarters a good deal that has been written publicly on the question, and much that has been privately reported has been conveyed to the home Government. Quite probably the results of a close investigation of the grain shipping business of the past year have attracted official attention in London, as well as more recent transactions in wool, in which the enemy subjects have been particularly active.

In local business circles there has been no misunderstanding of what a good deal of what has gone on meant. It was fairly obvious that when grain was being shipped in British ships to Scandinavian ports, and in quantities far exceeding all possible requirements of the countries of nominal destination, Britain was not being assisted to end the war, and neither were those concerned in the deals stamping themselves with the hall-mark of patriotism, no matter how much they may have enhanced their reputations for "smartness." We are perfectly well aware that it is not possible to stop German trade entirely, nor yet to stop British concerns trading with the enemy in countries not under British jurisdiction, but a very great deal in this direction can be done. At least we should have before us the knowledge which the British Government has obtained regarding German houses whose main purpose is to assist the enemy, and we should also know the names on the other "black list" which the Government should compile of those British, or so-called British concerns which help the German houses. If this is, as we believe it is, a war to be fought and won not only in the trenches, but in the marts of trade, the sooner that war is properly and effectively conducted in all fields the better.

THE NEW SUBTERRANEAN

DELAYED IN CONSTRUCTION.

Sr. Pedriali, the engineer and manager of the Subterranean, has been credited with a statement concerning the opening of the second "tube" line. This new line, which runs from Retiro to Constitution station, cannot yet be opened owing to a complete paralysation of work, due to lack of material. This especially affects the building of the tunnel.

If a deeper consideration is taken, it will be found that not even the plans for the construction have as yet been approved, but this is apparently a minor detail to progress. Even in the model of the carriages no decision has been arrived at, yet in Bruges—Belgium—there are at the present moment no fewer than 36 coaches completely constructed, ready for shipment.

The war has undoubtedly upset the plans for the new subterranean, the plans which, according to Engineer Pedriali, do not yet exist.

WOMAN'S ATTEMPTED SUICIDE

SAD CASE AT THE DOCKS.

A sad case of attempted suicide was reported yesterday. A poorly clad woman, with a little child in her arms, attempted to throw herself into the river from the western wall of the North Basin.

It was due to a passer-by, Sr. Francisco Vereda, whose curiosity was aroused by the woman's strange actions and the cries of her child, that she was prevented. It was only at the last moment he caught the woman's clothing, and was nearly dragged into the river himself. Help came from a sailor, and the woman was pulled into safety.

After enquiries it was found that the woman was of Russian nationality, named Guadodovsky and 30 year of age. She was in despair at having no work wherewith to keep her children, of which she has two.

Public Opinion as expressed in the Argentine Press.

THE FIRE AT PUERTO MILITAR

(La Prensa.—December 9).

The fire that occurred at Puerto Militar suggests to La Prensa the advisability of commenting on the lack of foresight shown by that important branch of the navy. Some months ago the state bought from the Buenos Aires to Port Belgrano Railway Company their moles and storage depots, paying several millions for the same. In lieu of using these depots as store-houses for the navy, they have been let out to traders for a few cents per ton, while the old naval depots were stored chock-a-block with valuable stores to the evident danger of the whole. If to this is added the deficient fire service, the lack of organisation among the personnel, which though not proved as yet is highly probable, it will be seen that the judge charged with the investigation is bound to affix the responsibility where it is due. The mere fact that bucket chains had to be formed to attack a fire in a warehouse situated thirty metres from the sea gives a fairly clear idea, remarks La Prensa, of the deficiencies mentioned and obviates all further comment.

It is also advisable that the judge should look into the internal condition of the edifice as the fire has left it, since La Prensa understands that an opening was made in a brick wall, being left without any door, when common prudence suggested the installation of a fireproof door at such a spot. In all likelihood it was through this opening that the fire spread to the second half of the warehouse, a very important point to be remembered. Given the valuable nature of the stores kept there, the utmost vigilance was advisable, and though it will doubtless be argued that motives of economy account for many of the deficiencies complained of, La Prensa declares that in the present case such a plea will not stand. Its readers are aware of the severe restrictions that characterise visits to the Arsenal at Puerto Militar, and La Prensa adds that one naturally presumes such careful attention to detail to be supplemental to strict attention to the main factors of fire defence. This appears to have been neglected, and yet once more La Prensa insists on the need for a general inspection department for the navy that shall have the right to supervise the work of commanders and heads of naval departments. Such an office ought to be constituted by the Minister of Marine without loss of time.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S MESSAGE

(La Nación.—December 9).

On very few occasions has a President of the United States read a message so fraught with interest as that of President Wilson. As is well known, he has revived the old custom of personally reading his message to Congress, instead of having it previously printed and read by a functionary. The cable declares it to have been the longest message Mr. Wilson has produced, and, as La Nación remarks, this is quite comprehensible, given the importance of the affairs therein dealt with.

In so far as American matters are concerned, the words of President Wilson are singularly important, showing as they do that it is the policy of the United States to lead American opinion by one path, though, in order to avoid misinterpretation it was expressly stated that this concept of Pan-Americanism does in no way imply imperialism, but rather a spirit of legality, independence, friendship, and mutual service.

This sane tendency of American po-

"MENDOZA JUSTICE"

(La Nación.—December 10).

If the Governor of Mendoza—at the present moment on leave in this capital—were to be pulled up short by the famous question of Bismarck to General Roca as to the condition of justice in Argentina, he would, says La Nación, undoubtedly be dumb-founded and unable to give a categorical answer. For from that Andine province so many grave complaints arise, unquestionably well founded, that in trade and banking circles in the Federal Capital the phrase "have nothing to do with Mendoza" has become generalised. This, La Nación remarks, is a state of affairs that is bound to react very unfavourably on the progress and development of the province, the more so since one of the items on the programme of the new régime was a thorough reformation of provincial justice, wherein even the private lives of the justiciaries was not above reproach. Came the change, and to the surprise of everyone, the new party adopted the ways of their predecessors, affairs judicial remaining in statu quo ante.

Naturally Mendoza justice fell into bad repute, it being currently rumoured that many people, especially those on the legislative benches, enjoyed remarkable tolerance when dealing with the courts, to such an extreme that occasionally sentences were made known to one party in a case prior to their pronouncement by the Court of Appeal. Fraud and delay are at their apogee, says La Nación, one notorious case being that of a hypothecary creditor for $100,000, who despairing of ever obtaining his money, owing to the obstacles and judicial trickery put in his way, committed suicide. There are also syndicates formed to benefit by bankruptcy procedure which is destined to defraud the creditors and leave the syndicate the only gainers, and though three magistrates have been charged, they are probably the least culpable, and La Nación does not hesitate to say that it is merely for form's sake that such steps have been taken, since the Senate, without the least regard for the constitutional practices of the country, refused to hear evidence against them and re-established them in the complete exercise of all their functions. Such procedure tears to shreds all idea of the majesty and incorruptibility of justice, and La Nación calls on the Mendoza legislature to put an end to this state of affairs by using a firm hand against those who employ official influence in such a manner as to damage the fair fame of the province.

licy is, says La Nación, the keynote of the President's speech. "The States of America are not rivals but co-operators, and their ever-growing recognition of the community of their economic and political interests will give them a new value in the political history of the world. Yet whilst believing in ideals, Mr. Wilson realises that force is also necessary, and on that account asks Congress to increase the military and naval defences of the great Republic. Many more comments might be made, concludes La Nación, but a careful reading of the message is its own best commentary. It is a document that does honour to the supreme magistrate who indites it and to the people to whom it is addressed, whilst its final clauses of warning against the German-American element who forget the new country for the old, are worthy of remembrance in other lands where a similar phenomenon may be possible.

SOUTH COAST NAVIGATION

(La Prensa.—December 10).

Another conflict between local ship-owners and the Prefecture of the Port is in prospect, says La Prensa, arising out of the recent regulations passed by that authority relative to the south coast trade and the recent modification of freights. At first sight it looked as though the difficulty had been solved by the shipowners giving up their privileges as postal packets, but, remarks La Prensa, this has not been the case. Piqued possibly by their resistance, the Prefect has exhumed an ordinance of 1907 which prohibits the vessels working in port save during working hours, or on feast days. The motive of this ordinance, say the shipowners, was to protect the crew from abuse, either through undermanning or excessive hours of labour. As a matter of fact the custom, agreed upon between owners and their crews is to pay fifty cents an hour extra for all overtime or work on feast days.

Given the class of navigation necessary on the south coast, the innumerable ports of call that are reached at all hours of the day or night, the ships, in order that their voyage may not be delayed, carry spare gangs of peons for landing work, also launches and barges to facilitate operations, since, as is well known the south coast ports have no facilities whatsoever for this work. The new criterion applied by the Prefect of ports will make the voyage interminable for the coasting boats, and in all likelihood the passengers will be the first to protest against the new difficulties of transport. Deck cargoes too are under the ban of the authorities. They are studying the matter, but in the meantime boats must leave with their deck space empty. There is nothing in the Argentine Commercial Code to prohibit deck cargoes, and the refusal to permit them is bound to react unfavourably on freight rates in general. Finally, says La Prensa, the shipowners are protesting before the Minister of Finance against the new measures of the Port Prefect.

ECONOMY AND THE GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

(La Prensa.—December 11).

More than once, says La Prensa, since the beginning of the crisis, the columns of that paper have expressed its disapproval at the dismissal of public employees which has been put into practice during the last two years as an economical expedient. It has always maintained that whilst it is inadvisable to have in the administration a larger number of employees than is absolutely necessary, it is anything but a good doctrine to cut down the budget by sacrificing the servants of the State. When drastic economies are necessary it is of opinion that it is preferable to adopt the system of reducing salaries, always provided that such reduction is not incompatible with the right of the employee to receive a remuneration adequate to his necessities. The commission appointed to study the question of curtailing the budget has reported that whilst it would be possible to effect large economies by suppressing many Government positions, involving the throwing idle of large numbers of its servants, such a procedure in the present state of affairs would be contrary to the dictates of humanity. If it were desired to economise ten million dollars by the suppression of public positions, it would be necessary, according to the calculations of the commission, to discharge some five thousand employees. Such a measure, adds the Commission might be admissible in years of abundance, when work was plentiful, but in the present state of the country would be little short of cruelty.

La Prensa expresses itself in accordance with these views, and recommends that Congress approve the report, and sanction the reduction of salaries all round, as a measure more efficacious and humane than the alternative of effecting economies by the wholesale discharge of the servants of the Government.

AN ALLIANCE OF NEUTRALS

(La Nación.—December 11).

The result of the investigation by the Nación through its Washington correspondent, as to the consensus of opinion amongst prominent public men in the States regarding the capture of the Presidente Mitre in conjunction with that of the Hocking, Genesee and Kankakee leads that journal to the belief that the time is ripe for the organisation of a league for the defence of the interests of neutral countries. The idea of such a league, says La Nación, was virtually contained in the discourse pronounced before the Pan-American Union, when Dr. Naon, in accordance with the instructions of the Argentine Chancellery proposed to the bureau of the American nations, the advisability of studying the questions arising out of the violation, by belligerents, of Chilean waters, and the interruption of traffic through the North Sea to Scandinavia and Holland. Unfortunately, says La Nación, that expression of Argentine sentiment has had no favourable result. Had the United States, instead of branching off into side issues, made common cause with other neutrals, the reprisals of the submarine against the mercantile marine in British waters, the prohibition of importation and exportation of merchandise for Germany, to and from Holland, and last of all the unexpected abrogation of Article 57 of the Declaration of London, might not have been produced.

In the final peace settlement, says La Nación, all must participate—belligerents and neutrals alike—for all have been affected by the terrible conflict, and it is to the interest of all that the possibility of the recurrence of such a war be eliminated. It is possible that the belligerents, or some of them, will wish to ordain that no voice be heard but their own, and it is precisely to avoid such a contingency that the formation of a league amongst the neutral nations is advisable. In the opinion of La Nación, the solidarity and unanimity of the neutral countries, if happily it could be established, would be a powerful factor towards the ratification of a treaty of lasting and durable peace.

A PETITION BY THE PORT PILOTS

(La Prensa.—December 14).

The pilots of the Port of the Capital, says La Prensa, have presented a petition to the President of the Republic, asking for the suspension of the decree of September 30, 1914, which stipulates that from January 1, 1916, the port pilots shall be incorporated into an official organisation, and furthermore that the scale of pilotage charges shall be reduced by 20 per cent. Hitherto the pilots have worked freely and independently, each enjoying the fruits of his personal labour, and it is felt that the deprivation of these privileges by the creation of a Government administration, paid for and kept up by the pilots, amounts to an infringement of their rights. With reference to the decreed reduction of 20 per cent on the pilotage charges the petition expresses the opinion that the moment is anything but propitious for such a reduction. The high cost of living and the scarcity of vessels—evidenced by the exceedingly high freights ruling—are of themselves convincing arguments against the proposed innovation in tariffs. In comparison with the charges in European ports, pilotage in this port is relatively low. The petition concludes by pointing out that the shipping companies who will be benefited by the decreased tariff are foreign companies whose profits do not remain in the country. To them the 20 per cent reduction is as the proverbial grain of sand, whilst to the pilots it represents an item of vital importance. The companies themselves not having solicited any such reduction, the imposition of such a change would in the opinion of the pilots be an intervention in favour of foreign capital at the expense, and to the prejudice, of Argentine industry.

THE NATURALISATION OF STRANGERS. THE EXAMPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

(La Prensa.—December 13).

The message of the President of the United States at the re-opening of Congress, says La Prensa has touched upon a point interesting to all countries, but particularly so to Argentina. The part of the President's message to which La Prensa refers is that in which Mr. Wilson comments upon the attitude of certain citizens of the Union—probably of foreign parentage—arising out of their sympathies with one side or other of the parties in the present European conflict. Mr. Wilson has raised the voice of alarm which will be heard from one extreme of the American continent to the other. Under the impulse of passion, or moved by motives of vengeance, numbers of citizens, born under other flags, but now, through naturalisation, professing allegiance to the Union have committed acts of violence against the laws, the property, and the industry of the State. The occurrences which have given rise to the inclusion of this subject in the Presidential message are not without grave import for Argentina. In the question of the naturalisation of immigrants this country finds itself in conditions very similar to those obtaining in the United States, and it is justifiable to presume that given similar circumstances the acts produced in the North America would be reproduced here. Without details, says La Prensa, we are not in a position to appreciate the extent of the danger, but that it is a grave danger is evidenced by the importance given to it in Mr. Wilson's message. A modification of the laws governing the question of naturalisation, is desirable, and La Prensa recommends a close attention to the methods adopted in the States towards a solution of the difficulty and the incorporation into Argentine law of such special legislation as may be found necessary to establish special penalties in cases of disloyalty to the State committed by naturalised foreigners.

THE HARVEST AND THE LOCUST PLAGUE

(La Nación.—December 13).

The information which continues to arrive from the cereal zones of the Republic, says La Nación, is of such a satisfactory nature that the prospect of a magnificent harvest seems well assured. In the North and South, conditions are exceptionally favourable, and it is confidently expected that Argentina will be able to export enormous quantities of grain, thus responding to the needs of those countries who are placed in less favourable circumstances. In the North all possible danger to the harvest from climatic or other causes seem to have passed. Such however cannot be said of the southern zones. From many points in the southern districts, says La Nación, we hear the echoes of a widespread dissatisfaction at the manner in which the campaign against the locust plague is being carried on. Some months ago La Nación on making enquiries as to the efficacy of the means to be employed to combat this devastating plague were informed that the campaign was perfectly organised and that the work of exterminating the pest would proceed with clockwork precision. That being the case, the Nación very pertinently asks the reason for the complaints which continue to arrive from all parts of the south. The telegrams themselves, give the key to the situation, and lead one to the conclusion that the boasted perfection of the organisation was more presumptive than real. The system employed in leasing the corrugated iron barriers does not commend itself, the commission acting on the principle that it is much more important to secure payment for the use of the material, than to save the harvest. The guarantee of a third party is asked, and as this is in many cases difficult to obtain, it follows that notwithstanding the admitted abundance of material, many of the agriculturists are refused the necessary assistance. The question, requires the serious attention of the Minister of Agriculture. The country, says La Nación, would not be ruined if the Government failed to collect the rent for one hundred thousand, or even one million metres of barrier, and the first and only consideration should be the safeguarding of the harvest, not partially, but totally.

CLAUSE A.A.A.

(La Nación.—December 14).

An agreement has been arrived at, says La Nación, between the Chamber of Commerce of this country and that of the United States, on which will be based a system of arbitration for the settlement of such differences as may arise over contracts entered into by commercial houses or merchants in the two countries. According to the wording of the agreement, each Chamber will appoint a committee which will in turn nominate a list of arbitrators, from which list both parties to the question under discussion will have the right to select such names as they may desire to represent them. The form of election of arbitrators is subject to such minute rules and regulations as to leave no doubt either as to the sincerity of the proceeding or the justice of the awards. In order to afford ready access to the privileges of this system of arbitration, several abbreviations of the agreement have been formed for inclusion in particular contracts. Thus when a contract is being arranged by letter, the citation of "Clause A.A.A." is understood to determine that all difficulties or differences arising out of that contract shall be submitted to the Argentine American Arbitration. When contracting by cable the inclusion of the word "Arbaires" or "Arbanyork" is sufficient to indicate that the parties agree to submit to the arbitration of the Committee in Buenos Aires, or New York as the case may be.

This system not only affords the advantage of an impartial, economical and rapid settlement of commercial differences, but will save an interminable amount of correspondence between the contracting parties. Some such arrangement, says La Nación, was necessary in the defence of honest commerce, too often prejudiced by the dealing of a few unscrupulous traders. In the States the opinion is pretty general that Argentine commercial houses only pay as a last extremity, whilst here cases are not infrequent of malpractices by North American houses. Such cases have a very harmful effect for the reason, as La Nación points out, that one hears much more about them than about the honest and correct transactions carried out between serious business houses. In future the danger of the recurrence of such lamentable cases will be minimised, the A.A.A. forming a guarantee of correct and straight dealing which will greatly strengthen and foster the commercial intercourse which it is desired to establish between the Argentine and the United States.

GERMAN MINES ADRIFT SCANDINAVIAN COASTS MENACED.

London, Dec. 11.

The recent heavy storms in the North Sea region has caused the innumerable mines sown by the Germans in the Baltic and channels giving access thence to the North Sea by the channels along the coasts of Denmark and Sweden to break adrift, and they are now being washed up on the coast where they explode.

The result has been the loss of numbers of fishing craft and the paralysation of the fishing industry, especially on the east coast of Sweden.

THE UNEMPLOYED

(La Prensa.—December 15).

The disorders and disturbances created by groups of unemployed in the Province of Tucuman, recently chronicled in La Prensa, have, says that paper, been repeated in the territory of the Pampa. According to the information at hand certain bands of unemployed in those regions have adopted an attitude frankly aggressive. The occurrences at Vertiz are a proof of the extent to which these marauders are prepared to go, and at the same time give a clear indication of the absolute want of adequate police protection in that territory. On the arrival of a train recently, in Vertiz, some five hundred individuals descended from the roofs of the coaches, and armed with knives, revolvers and sticks proceeded to sack various business houses. The police, represented by two officials, were put to flight after being severely treated. Commenting on these facts La Prensa says it has repeatedly maintained that the rights of the colonists in these territories are not properly safeguarded. The working population who are contributing to the successful development of those areas, note with surprise that not only does the Government fail to afford them proper police protection, but that at times these regions are selected as the dumping ground of individuals condemned to deportation. The assaults of these numerous bands, who count on meeting little or no resistance from the police, reveal the fact that the territory is at the mercy of these foragers. To cope with the situation the Government have ordered a concentration of police at Realicó, but as a result of this concentration various centres in the vicinity are now without police service. The situation, says La Prensa, is sufficiently grave to warrant the belief that the Government will at once adopt measures to ensure the safety of the colonists and at the same time to punish with the utmost rigour of the law the authors of such acts of vandalism.

THE FRISIA'S CORRESPONDENCE

(La Nación. December 15).

Referring to the cable advice regarding the detention by a British cruiser, of the Royal Holland Lloyd steamer Frisia and the transference to the former of the postal correspondence on board, the Nación expresses the opinion that at first sight the action of the warship appears to be a singularly novel infringement of international rights. The Frisia is a Dutch vessel, flying the flag of that country and conforming in all other respects to the characteristics necessary to establish neutrality. Nothing then could lead one to expect that she could be liable to detention by a belligerent on the ground of having violated that condition of neutrality. Correspondence says La Nación, is neither an armament nor can it be considered as material necessary for military purposes, and has from all time been recognised as exempt from seizure. The constitutions of all civilised States of the world are agreed in declaring it inviolable. The Hague Convention of 1907 adopted a proposition declaring absolutely for the inviolability of postal correspondence on the high seas. The project was adopted by the unanimous vote of the delegates present with one exception, viz Argentina, which abstained from voting. At the subsequent Convention XI, the declaration embodying this approved project was signed by Argentina but not by Great Britain. It would appear that Argentina whilst abstaining from voting nevertheless signed the declaration. Great Britain on the other hand whilst manifesting conformity and agreement with the declaration in principle, did not see her way to compromise herself by affixing her signature. The case, concludes La Nación, will afford diplomacy an opportunity of studying a new problem in the vexed question of international rights.

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN

Wednesday Night's Concert

A large audience, when the paucity of ships in Port is considered, assembled at St. John's Hall last night on the occasion of the Wednesday Evening Concert which had been arranged by Miss Dorothy Stuart Small, who herself took part in the programme, which was as follows:

Pianoforte Overture, Ruy Blas. Mendelssohn. Duet by Miss D. S. Small and Mr. Claude Weston.

Song, the Kerry Dance, Rev. H. Westby Brady.

Banjo Solos, Miner's March and The Darkies Dawn, by Rev. H. Morrey Jones.

Song, "The Sunshine of your Smile," Mrs. R. Hamilton Thomson.

Piano, Invitation to the Valse, Weber, and "A Dream of Love," Weber, Miss Dorothy Small.

Song, "Mairie my Girl," Rev. H. Westby Brady, with encore "Off to Salónica."

Recitation, Paddy's Excelsior Captain Lewin.

Banjo Solos by Rev. H. Morrey Jones, "The Cycle Spin," "Mother McCree" and "Westminster Chimes."

Song, Miss Hamilton Thomson, "Somewhere a voice is calling," Dance, "Nymph of Diana," Miss Dorothy Small.

Several turns promised did not materialise but, as will be seen, the programme was an excellent one and was highly appreciated.

Miss Small is a fine pianist as well as a clever danseuse and her activities in both respects were productive of recalls.

The Rev. Mr. Brady's songs were such as fit his robustly romantic style excellently well and those who have not yet heard the Rev. Morrey Jones as a Banjoist have little idea of the manner in which David pacified Saul. Mrs. R. Hamilton Thomson has a clear rich sound voice which she used to great advantage in songs suitable both in range and style. She was imperatively encored and graciously conceded in request.

Captain Lewin's recitation was dry and eminently amusing.

In her dance "The Nymph of Diana" Miss Dorothy Stuart Small acquitted herself gracefully and exceedingly well in spite of difficult as of lighting and background which mean so much to the artiste. She was required to give an encore and repeated her dance thus closing a most successful concert. The actual terminations were, of course, Auld Lang Syne and God Save the King as the assembly dispersed.

THE FRISIA'S MAILS

REPORTED SEIZURE BY A BRITISH CRUISER.

The Royal Holland Lloyd liner Frisia has arrived at Amsterdam without the mails which she carried for Europe collected at Buenos Aires, Montevideo, Rio, Lisbon, etc. This statement is confirmed at the local offices of the Line for which Mr. W. Allinson Bell is agent, but without any detail.

The telegraphed account states that the Frisia was stopped at sea by a British cruiser but without any statement as to the vessel's identity, which could scarcely be concealed, or the latitude in which the circumstances occurred. The Press comments on the subject moderately, but opines that the circumstance will probably be matter for a protest, as correspondence from Argentina, Spain, Portugal, Uruguay and Brazil is affected.

It is stated that the Minister of Foreign Affairs considers the action as high-handed, illegal and contrary to the provisions of the Hague Convention. Meanwhile, despatches are expected from the Argentine Minister in Holland which may throw light on the affair.

SALE OF IMPORTED RAMS

The Messrs. Bullrich sold within their yard yesterday afternoon a selected lot of imported Lincoln rams, the property of Mr. F. Miller. This gentleman's name has for many years been intimately associated with the improvement of the sheep stock in this Republic, and at yesterday's sale a large attendance of interested flockmasters competed for the big-framed, well-wooled rams on offer. The sale was altogether a very satisfactory one, the top price being $2200.

AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITIONBY BOLSA DE CEREALES.

The Directive Committee of the Bolsa de Cereales in pursuance of their intentions to foment and improve the agriculture of the country, intend to institute a Competitive Exhibition in celebration of the first century of National Independence.

Sr. Eliseo Canevari at a meeting extraordinary presented the suggested plan which was enthusiastically approved and ample powers were conceded for its fulfilment.

The competition and exhibition will take place in the Salons of the Bolsa on July 9, 1916, or other suitable date, for which the manager of the F.C.O. has kindly promised an enlarged space of the hall of Commercial Operations.

The Bolsa de Cereales has now held two competitive Exhibitions, one in celebration of the centenary of Political Independence and the other on October 1913; that to be held however will be of much greater importance, that of the produce of a splendid harvest, and will have a great effect.

This opinion is given in full consciousness that the wheat, linseed, oat, barley and rye may now be considered safe.

Sr. Canevari has interviewed Dr. Calderon, Minister of Agriculture, who has promised to do all in his power to ensure success of the scheme.

Counting on the enthusiasm displayed both by the Bolsa and its eighty correspondents a great success is considered assured.

In order to achieve this it is essential that cultivators shall attend where possible and do all they can to publicly prove the agricultural wealth of the country.

"BARBAROUS AND INHUMAN"AMERICA'S STERN NOTE TO AUSTRIA

Washington, Dec. 13.

The text of the Note from the Department of State to the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister at Vienna relative to the sinking of the Ancona was as follows:

"Reliable information obtained from passengers by the Ancona, both Americans and persons of other nationalities, shows that on November 7, a submarine under the Austrian flag fired a shell at the ship referred to.

"It further shows that thereafter the Ancona tried to escape, but having been overtaken by the submarine it stopped.

"The information also proves that after a short time, insufficient for all the crew and passengers to take to the boats, the submarine fired a number of shells.

"Finally the submarine, torpedoing the vessel, sank her while many were still on board, it being shown that by the shellfire and the sinking many persons lost their lives or suffered serious injuries, among these persons being citizens of the United States.

FIRE UPON UNARMED PASSENGERS.

"We have noted the contents of the report published by the Austro-Hungarian Admiralty on the sinking of the ship; we examined it with the greatest attention and found that the said report substantially confirms the principal declaration of the passengers of the Ancona, in that it admits that the submarine, after having fired upon, sank the steamer while people were on board.

"The Austro-Hungarian Government was informed through the correspondence exchanged between the United States and Germany of the attitude of the United States Government relative to the employment of submarines for attacking merchant shipping.

"The Austro-Hungarian Government was also informed that Germany had expressed its assent to the attitude of the United States in that respect.

"Notwithstanding that the Austro-Hungarian Government was fully apprised of the views of the United States Government, which views were set forth in the fullest terms to its ally, Germany, the commander of the submarine which attacked the Ancona neglected to place in safety the passengers and crew of the ship which he was attempting to destroy, presumably on account of the impossibility of being able to convey her to port as prize of war.

"The United States Government holds that the commander of the submarine violated the principles of international law as well as of those of humanity by cannonading and sinking the Ancona before those on board her had been placed in safety, or without even being given time to leave her.

AN UNPARDONABLE MASSACRE.

"The action of the said commander can only be considered as an unpardonable massacre of peaceful and defenceless persons, seeing that when she was fired at and torpedoed, the vessel apparently tried neither to resist or escape.

"We must add that there exists no other reason sufficient to excuse such attack, and that there was not even any attempt to save the people.

"Hence the United States Government is forced to come to this conclusion: either the commander of the submarine acted in opposition to the instructions that he had received, or that the Imperial and Royal Government neglected to give the submarine commanders instructions to act in accordance with the laws of nations and also with the principles of humanity.

TAKING THE LIVES OF THE DEFENCELESS.

"The United States Government is unwilling to believe the latter, or that the Austro-Hungarian Government has the intention of allowing Austrian submarines to take the lives of defenceless men, women and children. It prefers to believe that the commander of the submarine committed the outrage without authority, regardless of the general and special instructions he had received.

"As good relations between both countries must be based upon common respect for the law of humanity, it is not to be expected that the United States Government can act otherwise than by requesting the Imperial and Royal Government to denounce the sinking of the Ancona as an illegal and indefensible act; to punish the guilty officer, and to pay an indemnity for loss of life and injuries sustained by American citizens in the attack upon the said vessel.

"The United States Government hopes that the Austro-Hungarian Government, appreciating the gravity of the case, will promptly accede to the American demands; and it bases its hope upon the belief that the Austro-Hungarian Government will neither sanction nor defend an act which the world condemns as barbarous and inhuman; which civilised nations execrate; which has caused the death of innocent citizens of the United States."

The Note is dated December 6, 1915.

"IF—," SAYS AUSTRIAN CHARGE D'AFFAIRES.

Washington, Dec. 13.

The Austrian Chargé d'Affaires here stated to-day in the course of an interview that if the facts regarding the Ancona are proved to be as stated in the Note from the United States Government, the Austro-Hungarian Government would undoubtedly accede to the demands made therein.

REVENTLOW RAVESCritical "Examination" of U.S. Note*AUSTRIA AND THE STATES

New York, Dec. 15.

Berlin telegraphs that Count Reventlow in an article in the "Tages Zeitung" in reference to the United States Government's Note to Austria on the Ancona incident, characterised each demand as a hinted threat. He says that this remarkable Note is based upon what is described as "trustworthy information," although it only contains opinions. The demands are however specific, and of the most harsh character.

The first statement that the Ancona did try to escape is contradicted by a later sentence wherein it is stated that apparently she did not offer resistance. He considers that the Note must be regarded rather as a political document than as an attempt to treat the case objectively.

Vienna reports that an article in a Buda Pest newspaper says that there is no inclination to take the Note tragically. After the war is over there will be a big demand in the country for skilled workers, and this will be a grand opportunity for Austrians to return to their native land. Emigration itself will entirely cease.

In regard to the question of an indemnity the United States are reminded that they themselves refused to pay any indemnity when a number of Austrians and Hungarians were killed in the strikes which occurred at Colorado.

ARGENTINE TUGS

REPORTED PURCHASE INTENTIONS.

According to La Razón, a report is current that there is an intention to buy up a large number of local tugs, and that the representative of a strong British Company is at present here to buy as many as possible to be used apparently as patrol boats in British waters. Very large figures have, it is stated, been offered for these vessels, which are presumed to be intended to act against submarines.

How the commerce of the port is to get out without tugs is not stated.

THE WINNEBAGO

REPORTED AT RIO.

A Rio despatch published in a native contemporary states that the Winnebago arrived there yesterday, her first report after leaving Buenos Aires Roads.

The voyage was uneventful, and the captain feels sure that he can make New York without meeting the British cruisers.

STORM OFF RIO

s.s. LUISIANA OBLIGED TO PUT BACK.

A despatch from Rio on Sunday stated that the s.s. Luisiana which sailed at noon, had been obliged to return as on getting outside the Bay, she encountered the full weight of the furious storm then raging, and her cargo shifted. This gave the ship so strong a list as to menace her stability, and it being impossible to regain her trim in such a seaway, it was deemed advisable to make the shelter of the Harbour again.

VANISHED PASSENGER

During the trip of the Mihanovich steamer Ciudad de Montevideo, on Saturday night to the Uruguayan capital, a cabin passenger, Madame Blanche Riemmer, disappeared from her state room. On arrival at Montevideo she could not be found, and is believed to have thrown herself overboard. When last seen she was taking tea in the salon with the greatest composure, but the finding of letters giving directions for the disposal of her clothes and valuables, lends colour to the supposition that it is a case of suicide.

SEAMEN'S LAW NOW EFFECTIVE

Frequent reference has been made in these columns to what is known as the La Follette Seaman's Law (U.S. A.), which became effective as to vessels of that country on Nov. 4, 1915. The law becomes effective as to foreign tonnage on March 4, 1916.

It is claimed that the burdens imposed by that law on American shipping are such as to be prohibitive to the establishment of a national mercantile marine, the need of which is steadily becoming more apparent, as a glance at figures relating to the increase of exports from the United States will show.

The principal features of that portion of the law which takes effect are: The language test, requiring 75 per cent. of the crew in each department of American-owned or operated ships "to understand any order given by the officers of such vessels"; the requirement that 65 per cent. of the deck crews employed on American vessels shall ultimately be able seamen, to secure which rating they must pass physical and professional examinations; minimising the offence of desertion by members of ship crews under special conditions; half-payment of accrued wages to crew members in every port; requiring the collector of customs at any port in the United States to refuse clearance to any vessel if, within six hours of sailing, any reputable citizen, upon information, swears that the provisions with respect to the language test and the full quota of able seamen have not been complied with.

The law takes effect only as to American vessels not admitted to registry under the foreign registry act; as to the latter it becomes effective September 4, 1916. Such parts of the law as apply to foreign vessels will be effective as to treaty nations on July 1, 1916, and as to other nations on March 4, 1916.

ARGENTINE CONSULAR FEES

A NEW PROPOSAL.

In accordance to some preconceived arrangements there is a proposal afoot to reorganise completely the pay of the various employees of the Argentine Consular services.

In the HERALD some weeks ago, some details of staff changes were given, which presumed that the Executive were turning their much needed attention to this body. It now appears that in the coming 'loan' figures for 1916, a sum equal to $590,322 (paper) is included as affecting Consular service.

The matter remains somewhat indefinite, but two laws stated as being numbered 4112 and 4711 are quoted as having authorised an alteration.

FIRM NOTE ON ANCONA QUESTION

Facts Too Clear for Discussion

THE FURTHER NOTE FROM THE UNITED STATES TO AUSTRIA-HUNGARY REGARDING THE SINKING OF THE ANCONA HAS BEEN PUBLISHED HERE. OMITTING THE USUAL PREAMBLE, THE TEXT OF THE NOTE IS AS FOLLOWS:—

"On November 15, Baron Zwiedinek von Sudenhorst, Chargé d'Affaires of the Austro-Hungarian Royal and Imperial Government at Washington, transmitted to this Department of State a despatch from the Austro-Hungarian Admiralty referring to the sinking of the Ancona, wherein it was admitted that the Ancona was sunk by a submarine after her engines had been stopped and while there were passengers still on board.

"The Government of the United States considers that the said admission is of itself sufficient to lay upon the commander of the submarine the responsibility for having knowingly discharged the torpedo in violation of the recognised rights of nations, absolutely regardless of the principles of humanity which every belligerent ought to observe in conducting maritime warfare.

"In the face of the above admitted circumstances, the United States Government holds that its attitude is justified in considering that the details of the sinking of the Ancona, obtained from witnesses and corroborated by the Austro-Hungarian Admiralty, as well as of the number of American citizens killed and wounded in the attack, are of such weight and character as to render their discussion essentially useless.

"The culpability of the commander of the submarine and the indisputable fact that American citizens were killed, wounded, or placed in peril by the illegal act mentioned, are fully proved.

"Both the laws of international right and the principles of humanity, which were so deliberately violated by the commander of the submarine, have been so long and so universally recognised, and the facts are, from the points of view of right and justice, so clear that the United States Government does not feel called upon to discuss them; nor does it understand how the Royal and Imperial Government can question or debate them.

"The United States Government, therefore, has no option but to hold the Royal and Imperial Government responsible for the act of the Austrian naval commander, and to renew the definite although respectful demands presented in the Note of December 6, 1915.

"The United States Government sincerely trusts that that statement of facts, explaining its attitude, may make it possible for the Austro-Hungarian Government to perceive the justice of those demands and accept them in the same spirit of frankness and with the same regard for the good relations which have hitherto existed between the United States and Austria-Hungary as prompted the United States Government in making them."

Mr. Malcolm says that he has returned filled with admiration for the immense and really extraordinary preparations that are being made there. Compared with the French and Italian Red Cross Associations the organisation of that of Russia is enormous, and is equally efficient and ready.

He was greatly impressed with the care bestowed upon the wounded, particularly the wounded Germans.

The Russians, he found, were prepared to fight to the last man, even if they were left to carry on the war alone; but everywhere the conviction existed that the Allies would stick together to the end. He returned impressed with the utmost faith in the Russian army.

Inaction of Allies

BLAMED BY SERBIANS FOR BULGARIAN SUCCESSES.

Rome, Dec. 21.

A party of about a hundred refugee Serbians, chiefly of the upper classes, with several soldiers and Deputies, has arrived here, having crossed Albania on foot. They suffered great hardships and were several times in danger of falling victims to the hordes of wandering Albanian tribes.

They report having left some thousands more behind them, destitute of everything, and they appeal for help to the Americans.

The attribute the disaster of Serbia to the action of the Allies in confining themselves to diplomatic negotiations instead of anticipating hostilities on the part of Bulgaria by sending troops. Had this been done while the Austro-Germans were occupied in the campaign against Russia, the Serbians could have marched to Sofia, bringing in Greece and Rumania to the side of the Allies. Dilatoriness and hesitation at Paris and London enabled the Teutons to organise with the Bulgarians the campaign which has given the results known to the world.

Near to Success

ALLIES' ILL-LUCK IN THE DARDANELLES.

New York, Dec. 21.

The Vienna correspondent of the Associated Press says that, according to the opinions of the highest military authorities, if the Allies had continued the bombardment of the Dardanelles during March last, they would have been completely successful. The forts had only twenty cartridges left and the Turkish army was utterly demoralised, while the Sultan and the Government were ready to flee to Asia Minor.

However, for some unknown reason the Allies suspended operations, giving the Turks time to recover and obtain further supplies of ammunition.

GERMANY "FEELING" FOR PEACE

Chancellor's Admission in the Reichstag

RUSSIA SAID TO BE THE STUMBLING-BLOCK

Breakdown of Mr. Ford's Mission

New York, Dec. 22.

It is reported from Berlin that the Imperial Chancellor speaking in the Reichstag said that he had left the way open for the Entente to give an expression of the same goodwill as that contained in his own utterances. Had they responded, a common ground for discussion would have been found.

However he did not think that either side had ripened into readiness to enter into discussions, consequently Germany was prepared for a long war. Germany felt morally stronger after having given the world to understand that she was ready for peace.

The Chancellor expressed surprise at the tone of the American Note to Austria. He said that if he had to answer it he would ask the State Department to amend its style of language before replying. The violence of its language was uncalled for. He hoped that the negotiations would end satisfactorily.

RUSSIA, THE STUMBLING-BLOCK.

New York, Dec. 22.

A telegram from Berlin says that Hungary is willing to give pledges to Russia that the Dardanelles shall remain open to Russian commerce as a condition of peace.

Berlin considers that Count Apponyi's statement in an interview at Buda Pest was important, not only because of the dominant position he occupies in Austro-Hungarian affairs, but also because he is the leader of the International Peace party. It is understood why Russia wants assurances, and Berlin cannot see why guarantees should not be given.

Russia is believed to be the stumbling block to an early ending of the war, and there are no prospects of an early peace.

Mr. Ford's Mission

PROBABILITY OF FAILURE.

New York, Dec. 22.

A despatch from Christiania states that Mr. Ford continues ill and appears to be disheartened by the results of his efforts to bring about peace.

A Mr. Lloyd Bingham, one of the party accompanying Mr. Ford, has died here from congestion of the lungs.

MR. FORD DISAPPOINTED.

Christiania, Dec. 22.

The general opinion here is that Mr. Ford realises the hopelessness of his plans obtaining any results, and that he will bring them to an end in a perfunctory manner.

It is possible that, unconsciously, he has been disappointed by the lack of warmth in his reception here, which is however in no way due to hostility on the part of the Danish authorities.

Taken to Five Towns

ADVENTURES OF SERBIAN TREASURY FUNDS.

Marseilles, Dec. 22.

The sum of 18 million francs representing the funds of the Serbian Treasury has arrived here on the way to Paris to be deposited in the Franco-Serbian bank. The French Government has told off a strong escort to guard it on the way.

This money has had an eventful history. First it was hurried from Belgrade to Nish when the town was threatened with an attack by the Austrians; then from Nish it was transported to Monastir, whence, being in danger of capture, it was taken to Salonica. Finally it was thought wise to again remove it to Paris, where it will remain until the end of the war.

44 Fights in the Air

ARTILLERY ACTIVITY ON THE WESTERN FRONT.

London, Dec. 21.

A bulletin issued by the War Office referring to operations on the Western front, says:—

"Various portions of the German trenches have been bombarded from our centre and from the southern sector.

"The enemy's artillery bombarded us yesterday afternoon at Ypres and Saint Jean. He also displayed much activity against our lines and support trenches north-west of Ypres. We replied by shelling his trenches at Zonnebeke, Zandvoorde, Ghelvelt and Taubrielen.

"In the morning the enemy canonaded our trenches opposite the quarries north-west of Hulluch, but we silenced his fire.

"Several German aeroplanes made great efforts to prevent our men from reconnoitring their lines, but without success. During the day there were 44 aerial engagements. We brought down by our fire two aeroplanes which fell behind the German lines, and others were obliged to come to earth. One of our machines is missing."

Australia's Splendid Spirit

NO COMPLAINT AT DARDANELLES FAILURE.

Melbourne, Dec. 22.

Mr. Foster Pearce, Minister of Defence in the Australian Commonwealth Government, in a speech in Parliament declared that Australia would rally to the support of Britain with further contributions of men, determined to fight to the end.

There were no complaints uttered about the withdrawal from Gallipoli after the heavy losses sustained there. Australia voiced neither criticism nor complaint concerning the sudden withdrawal of troops from the beaches of Anzac and Suvla. Far from cavilling at this move by the British military authorities, Australia declared that it would not lessen her determination to see this war through; and it would have no effect upon the new effort to raise men for active service.

[Note.—It will be remembered that von Emmich was popularly supposed to have shot himself over a year ago when he saw how many men he had lost in the assaults on Liege.]

Greece's Attitude

SENTIMENT VEERING IN FAVOUR OF ALLIES.

London, Dec. 22.

Despatches from Athens report that during the last few days there has been a radical change in public sentiment. The officers of the Greek army are still in favour of Germany, but the bulk of the army does not conceal its aversion for the Central Empires and especially for the Bulgarians.

It was the Germanophil element alone that took part in the general elections on Sunday last.

From Salonica it is reported that the lines of the Allies and their enemies are separated by a distance of 30 kilometres.

Overrun By Spies

AMERICA ABOUT TO ADOPT SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

Washington, Dec. 21.

It is stated that a Bill will be presented to Congress conferring certain powers on the Government for the protection of State secrets. The Bill is to be treated as urgent. Its application will probably lead to a number of sensational and unlooked for arrests.

It is known that Washington is overrun by spies.

"Wild-cat" Finance

GERMANY'S DASH FOR BANKRUPTCY.

Amsterdam, Dec. 21.

The German Socialist newspaper "Vorwaerts," reviewing the speech delivered in the Reichstag by the Minister of Finance, Dr. Helfferich, says that with the new credit of 10,000 million marks, the total debt will reach to 40,000 millions, the annual interest upon which will be 2,000 millions, while it will require 500 millions more to redeem them.

The paper considers it essential that the Imperial revenues be more than doubled to meet the obligations for current expenses. Before the war broke out the state of the finances gave cause for anxiety. In 1909 taxation was increased by 500 million marks, yet the Budget did not balance. In 1913 taxes on private fortunes were levied in the form of a non-recurrent contribution to supply funds for armaments and cover the deficit which existed.

The paper arrives at the conclusion that the maintenance of the present system is impossible. As for taxation upon importations of provisions and raw materials, many articles will increase in price after the war is over, so if the tariff is continued it will cause an artificial increase and will incapacitate Germany from competing in the world's markets.

The interests both of consumers and producers demand the abolition of taxes on importations, and the time has therefore come for the Government to declare what course it is steering.

SOCIALIST OPPOSITION.

London, Dec. 21.

It is known that the Reichstag has adopted the new vote of 10,000 million marks for war expenditure. The vote was opposed by nineteen Socialists, whose spokesman declared that the endeavours to open negotiations for peace had been brought to naught by parties on both sides who are in favour of the annexation of territory.

TAXATION OF WAR PROFITS.

Amsterdam, Dec. 21.

It is reported from Berlin that the Reichstag has approved of the credit of 10,000 million marks requested by the Government for meeting war expenses.

The Bill for taxing industries which profit by the war passed its third reading. This is expected to yield a considerable sum.

THE GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATION.

New York, Dec. 21.

A despatch from Berlin says that a Bill introducing a "post Bellum" tax on war profits, requiring the companies and corporations to put aside 50 per cent. of such profits, was under discussion in the Reichstag to-day.

It appears probable that there will be further discussion as to the methods whereby to recover undue or excessive profits.

The reports as to the enormous profits made had resulted in a popular movement in favour of special taxation; but the Government felt itself compelled for technical reasons to adopt a general taxation of all increases and profits.

LIVING IN LUXURYCOMFORTS FOR GERMAN PRISONERS IN ENGLAND.

London, Dec. 18.

Owing to the prisoners' concentration camps in France having become overcrowded, a number of German prisoners are now being sent to England. A statement to that effect has been issued by the War Office in explanation of the presence of several hundred men of the Crown Prince's army at Dorchester.

The prisoners were interviewed by several correspondents of neutral countries, when no complaints of any consequence regarding their treatment in Britain were made. They are well fed and clothed, and the only work at which they are put is cleaning their quarters. Some hundreds of them have volunteered their services at various trades, building huts, etc., for which they receive pay. They are supplied with hot and shower baths, laundry, gymnasium, schoolroom and hospital.

Among them are several victims of gas used by the British. It is observed that the gas affects the kidneys as long as two months after inhalation.

The following official announcement has been issued by the British Government:—

"The British troops at Suvla and Anzac on the Gallipoli peninsula have been successfully removed, with all their artillery and baggage, to other spheres of operation. The movement was effected with trifling losses."

ABANDONMENT OF GALLIPOLI CAMPAIGN?

New York, Dec. 20.

The announcement that the British have been withdrawn from Suvla and Anzac on Gallipoli peninsula and transported to other fronts, though not unexpected, has caused some impression. It is not quite clear whether the British have definitely abandoned the campaign against the Dardanelles, or whether only a part of the land forces have been withdrawn.

"TOE" OF GALLIPOLI STILL TO BE HELD BY BRITISH TROOPS.

London, Dec. 20.

The Prime Minister has announced that the transfer of the British troops from Suvla Bay and Anzac was done in pursuance of a decision reached by the Cabinet some time ago. He declared that the great success of the operation reflected the highest credit on General, Admiral, Staff, and all ranks of the army and navy. The "toe" of Gallipoli will continue to be occupied by the British.

The future destination of the troops withdrawn from the peninsula is unknown, but the supposition is that the Entente has determined to abandon the defensive in the Balkans.

Mr. Asquith refused to discuss a question raised by Mr. Byles as to whether the recent debates in the Reichstag indicated a disposition to transfer the war from the battlefield to the Council.

ABYSSINIAN AIDCOUNTERSTROKE TO TEUTON PROPAGANDA.

Paris, Dec. 17.

The newspaper "Excelsior" says that the French Government is considering a suggestion put forward by M. Candace, the negro Deputy for Guadalupe, that Abyssinia be invited to cooperate with the Allies, who are to guarantee her independence.

It is argued that this move would be a counterstroke to the activities of the Teutons in the neighbouring Soudan, where they are inciting the natives to march on Khartoum and are stirring the Moslems up against Egypt.

SPAIN PREPARES FOR WAR

HEAVY PURCHASES OF MUNITIONS IN THE STATES

New York, Dec. 21.

It is reported from Gibraltar that importance is attributed to the military activity which is noticeable in Spain.

A decree which appeared to-day provides for 60,000 riflemen to be armed with the latest make of Remington in place of the Mauser.

At all the military encampments large bodies of recruits are to be seen undergoing training.

Agents of the Spanish Government have purchased in New York 20 million rounds of ammunition besides machinery for completing the equipment of the munitions factories.

It is evident that the Spanish Government is striving to place the army on an efficient footing with as little loss of time as possible.

SPAIN'S EXTENSIVE PURCHASES IN THE STATES.

New York, Dec. 21.

The Spanish Government has deposited $30,000,000 to its credit in the local banks for the purchase of military supplies which include 400,000,000 cartridge shells. No arms have been ordered owing to the high prices demanded for them. The Spanish Government is desirous of increasing its own output of shells to a million daily, and for that purpose is purchasing machinery.

DR. HELFFERICH HYSTERICAL

ASKS FOR MORE MONEY FOR WAR EXPENDITURE AND BLAMES BRITAIN FOR CONTINUED BLOODSHED.

New York, Dec. 16.

Telegrams from Berlin give the gist of the speech of the German Minister of Finance, Dr. Helfferich, in introducing the Bill for authorising a further loan of 10,000 million marks.

The Minister laid all the blame for the continuation of the war upon the Allies, saying:—

"As at Belshazzar's feast letters of fire appeared upon the wall, so over the columns of the British Empire it is written that the responsibility for future bloodshed, for the misery occasioned by the war throughout the world, and for the great danger to which civilisation is exposed, will fall not upon Germany but upon those who refuse to recognise the military successes of the Germans which none can dispute. The responsibility rests upon those who, living under criminal illusion, continue to talk of the proposal to annihilate Germany, winning the war by wearing her out."

The new loan will raise to 40,000 million marks the amount for which the German Government has asked in order to carry on the war.

The Minister stated that the nations at war are spending 330 million marks daily, a third of which represents Teutonic expenditure.

DEMAND FOR PEACE

HUNGARY TIRED OF WAR

COUNT KAROLYI'S APPEAL

London, Dec. 17.

A letter to the "Morning Post" dated Buda Pest, December 7, reproduces portions of a speech by Count Karolyi, leader of the Independent party in the Hungarian Parliament.

Being convinced that the Germanic Powers have won all along the line, he was anxious to know why the Government could not make peace, and demanded the resignation of the Government if it was not prepared to fulfil the wishes of the people.

The Count declared that neither the Monarchy nor her Allies can demand more from Hungary. She had given incontrovertible proof of her loyalty to the Emperor by sending her sons to maintain the integrity of the Empire. It was due to the Hungarian army that the war had been brought to its present state, permitting the Central Empires to claim compensations. He continued:—

"We made war in order to punish Serbia. That has now been done. We did not want to make conquests. Our task is finished.

"We now want the recognition of the political unity of Hungary, the attributes of a national State, economic independence, and above all, peace.

"Our position enables us to offer peace to our enemies, who are badly beaten, and therefore it can be no humiliation to do so.

"The Government has committed many sins, among them being the establishment of the censorship as a hiding screen. The Independents are justified in demanding that the Government shall accept the wishes of the nation, or resign."

IMPOSSIBLE PEACE TERMS

GERMANY'S DESIRE FOR "SECURITY."

Amsterdam, Dec. 17.

Some of the local papers publish reports from Berlin which state that the military party in Germany in discussing the possible terms of peace, insist that Germany must hold certain strongholds in order to maintain the security of the Empire. The western frontier should be along the Meuse through the fortresses of Bel-fort, Epinal, Lunéville, Nancy and Toul. In the East the line should follow the Narew, Niemen and Vistula

NEITHER WAR NOR PEACE

SUBJECTS FOR DISCUSSION AT THE VATICAN.

Rome, Dec. 17.

The story of a small incident between the Archbishop of Cologne and an English Cardinal comes from the Vatican.

Cardinal Hartmann, on meeting the English prelate, said:—

"Your Eminence, let us not talk about the war."

To which the other replied:—

"No, nor of peace either."

The comments upon the incident lead to the conclusion that the peace campaign does not meet with the support in the Vatican which has generally been believed.

BANKRUPT DUKE

DUKE OF MANCHESTER DECLARED INSOLVENT.

London, Dec. 17.

The Duke of Manchester has been declared insolvent.

GERMAN PLANS FOR INVASION OF EGYPT

THREAT INCREASES IN GRAVITY DAILY

Rome, Dec. 16.

In military circles it is stated that the threat of an attack on Egypt by a Turco-German force is becoming daily more serious.

The construction of a double-track railway from Damascus to the Egyptian frontier is being rapidly carried out and will probably be completed by January 2, when there will only be another fifty miles to reach the Sinai peninsula, which will permit of the concentration of troops in that region.

It is stated that 300,000 Ottoman troops under German officers have been assembled at Alexandretta, Aleppo and Homs.

German engineers are placing a system of pipes to convey water across the desert, and are accumulating material for bridges across the Suez Canal.

Spies report that the Germans are urging the Senussi to attack the west of Egypt, and are also attempting to persuade the Abyssinians to enter the Soudan. German officers are reported to be acting as propagandists and as organisers and instructors of the Abyssinian army.

The newspapers say that if after the lesson the Entente has received in the Balkans, they allow themselves to be taken by surprise in Egypt, they will deserve no sympathy or success.

AUSTRIAN BRUTALITY

TORTURE AND MURDER OF PRISONERS.

Rome, Dec. 16.

A number of Russian prisoners in Austria who have been compelled to work at trench digging and erecting defence works for their captors have succeeded in escaping into Italy.

They tell a moving tale of the cruelties to which they have been subjected. Those who refused to obey orders were tortured in various ways; sometimes being starved for three or four days, beaten, hanged with the wrists tied behind the back until they became insensible, etc. A hundred and fifty of them were made to witness the barbarous execution by untrained cadets in the Austrian rifle companies, of four of their companions.

ITALIAN CONTRACT SWINDLES

SENSATIONAL CHARGES IN ROME

Rome, Dec. 16.

The Press notes with approval the severity of the Courts of Law in dealing with those who are found guilty of attempting to defraud the Government in catering for the army.

The trial of the firm of Bianchi, Cori and Bisi for supplying the Italian army with boots of inferior quality was one in which the public took great interest.

A sensation was caused by a charge being brought against Colonel Pietro Pasquaro, of the Fifth Army Corps, of being implicated with others in swindling operations. The officer is under arrest.

The newspapers observe that in many cases fraudulent acts on the part of commercial or industrial firms would not be possible without the connivance of those whose duty it is to receive the goods.

VISCOUNT FRENCH

CAUSES OF HIS RETIREMENT

THE NEW COMMANDER

New York, Dec. 16.

The "New York Herald" has received a telegram from its correspondent in London to the following effect:—

"Field Marshal French who is retiring from the command of the British forces in the West obtained magnificent results in the course of the campaign and prepared the way for his successor, General Sir Douglas Haig, who was in charge of the retreat from Mons, one of the most epic feats of the war.

"General Haig has been one of those to whom the final victory has been due in every one of the engagements which have taken place since the commencement of the war.

"Field Marshal French is ill from overwork in the constant command of the army which he has transformed from a small force into a fighting machine of the first order; and he has recommended Sir Douglas Haig as his successor on the Western front. To him also is due the appointment of Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien as Commander-in-Chief of the forces in East Africa.

"The King has conferred the title of Viscount upon Field Marshal French; and the papers say that in granting this distinction to this deserving officer His Majesty honoured himself and the nation.

"It is an act of recognition of the merits of a soldier who, from the time he took charge of the forces on campaign, has made no mistakes, who retires of his own accord owing to the fact that his health, broken down by unrelenting work, does not allow of his continuing to discharge the difficult duties of Commander-in-Chief.

"The British nation is convinced that the army's new Commander will cooperate with Generals Joffre and Castelnau, and that the Anglo-French will shortly commence a general advance which will terminate in the expulsion of the Germans from Belgium to the other side of the Rhine."

GREAT CAMPAIGN IN FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

London, Dec. 16.

The removal of Field-Marshal French from the command of the British forces in France was independent of the nomination of General Joffre as Commander-in-Chief of the French armies and of General Castelnau as his Chief of General Staff.

In military circles it is considered that both these changes are the forerunners of a grand campaign in France and Belgium.

ALLIANCE WITH BRITAIN

PRAISE FROM MARCONI.

Rome, Dec. 17.

Yesterday Signor Guglielmo Marconi made his maiden speech in the Senate, which was heard with much attention.

Signor Marconi, after eulogistic references to the Italian army and navy, pointed out the benefits arising from the alliance with Britain. Based on constant and traditional friendship between nations and Governments, such alliance would have the virtue of definitely effecting the emancipation of Italy from the influence of the two Central Powers.

FALL FROM AN EXPRESS

Tragic Death of Mr. G. McHardy

A WELL-KNOWN LOCAL BUSINESS MAN

Monday, Dec. 20

Genuine sorrow was expressed throughout the Capital yesterday when it was known that Mr. George McHardy, the popular athletic outfitter of Calle Maipu, had been killed by a fall from the Rosario express on the previous evening.

The manner in which the late Mr. McHardy met his end will probably never be known, but Mr. Mackenzie, Traffic Manager of the Central Argentine Railway, explained to a representative of the HERALD yesterday the details of the tragedy so far as they could be conjectured.

Mr. Mackenzie, who has known the deceased for several years, deeply deplores the loss of a friend. He stated that Mr. McHardy was a traveller on the Rosario express, on which train he had a seat in the Pullman car.

OPENED THE WRONG DOOR.

It was between the stations of General Lagos and Alvear, which is the next station to Rosario, that the deceased, after having dined, passed through the dining coach into the Pullman, which was next to the end brake van, and from thence it was possible that he had passed further back, and had opened a wrong door, and had been thrown out of the train on to the line, where severe injuries to the head had apparently caused instantaneous death. He had fallen on the six-foot way, and was on the right-hand side of the train looking towards Rosario. The accident must have occurred at about 10.15 p.m., and only a quarter of an hour from the destination.

SAFETY OF THE TRAIN.

The train is a vestibule train with first-class coach dining-car—Pullman car and brake van. By the term "vestibule" is meant that each coach is connected by a closed-in "concertina" arrangement. So far as is known no doors were found open, and it is not possible to put any other construction on the sad affair than that suggested by Mr. Mackenzie.

Mr. McHardy was missed on arrival at Rosario, and his body was found at a late hour at the place indicated, and was afterwards transferred to Rosario, and yesterday to Buenos Aires, where the train arrived at 6.20 p.m.

CAREER OF THE DECEASED.

Enquiries by the HERALD elicited the fact that the deceased left for Rosario in order to attend to some details regarding extensive new premises which he proposed to open in Rosario at an early date.

This was to have been yet another stage in the development of the business that Mr. McHardy had built up since he came to the Argentine about thirty years ago.

After arriving in the Republic he was for some time engaged in agricultural pursuits. Later he came to the Capital in connection with the laying-out of tennis courts and sporting pitches. So successful was his first connection with sporting matters that he at once achieved a reputation as an expert, and his services were consequently much in request. Better to cater for the wishes of a large and influential section of the English sporting community. Mr. McHardy opened a place of business in Bartolome Mitre for the sale of sporting requisites. His abilities with the tennis racquet were well known, and innumerable cups and other trophies which profusely decorated his home, testified to the success which he had attained in open competitions.

His entry into business was marked by steady and onward advancement, with the happy result that the business continued to grow and prosper under the successive changes for larger and more commodious premises.

Within the last few years, with the shrewd foresight for which he was always characteristic, he made an arrangement with the Ford Motor Car Company to sell their products in the provinces of Cordoba and Santa Fé, and most satisfactory results attended this new venture. It was in the interests of this business that he made his last and fatal journey.

The deceased gentleman was 46 years of age, being a native of Forfarshire, Scotland, where his father is still engaged in farming pursuits. The deceased is survived by a widow and a family of six, who are left to mourn his loss. The eldest son has only a few weeks more to serve as a conscript in the land that gave him birth. Two other sons—whose portraits are given to-day—are at present in North America studying at the Ford Car works. Another son, Stewart, has lately been a great help to his father in the management of the business, while the two younger members of the family, Donald and Daisy, are still at school. A brother of the deceased, Mr. Willie McHardy, is a partner in the firm of George Brown and Co.

Deep sympathy is expressed with the family in their unexpected and tragic bereavement.

On arrival of the train at Rosario his absence, which had not been remarked, attracted attention, and alarm deepened into consternation when no trace of him was discovered except his straw hat and his luggage. The police were promptly informed, and a search of the line was made in the neighbourhood of Alvear, Kilom. 283, at about which point he had left the company. There the body was found on the down line; evidently Mr. McHardy had either mistaken the exit of the coach next to the Pullman for the lavatory door, and walked off the train—as so nearly happened to a traveller on the rapido about a month ago—or he may have gone out intentionally to see what manner of night it was and have been thrown off his balance by an unexpected lurch of the train. A comparison of timings showed that the night passenger train, No. 16, from Rosario to Buenos Aires, must have passed over him some three minutes after he fell. The body, badly cut up, was brought to Rosario by the police, and an inquiry was instituted in due course.

THE FUNERAL CEREMONY

The funeral of the late Mr. George McHardy took place yesterday at the Chacarita cemetery at 3 p.m. The Rev.

The late Mr. George McHardy and two of his sons—both of whom are at present employed in the Ford Motor Works, Detroit, Mich., U.S.A.

HOW THE ACCIDENT MAY HAVE OCCURRED

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Rosario, Dec. 21.

Few members of the local British community have not to-day spoken of the tragic suddenness with which Mr. George McHardy has met his end. He journeyed by the rapido, train No. 3, which left the Federal Capital last evening at 6 o'clock, and is due here about 10.30, under the new timing. He dined with some friends in the comedor, and later, as far as I can gather, he was sitting in the Pullman car. He went out, presumably to the lavatory, and he did not return. The manner of his disappearance must remain a matter of conjecture.

Dr. Fleming conducted, in accordance with Scottish custom, a short service at the residence of the deceased gentleman at Villa Devoto, and subsequently at the graveside as well. The great respect and esteem in which the late Mr. McHardy was held is evidenced by the number of those who were represented or present at his obsequies. They were as follows:—

GEORGE MCHARDY

BY AN OLD FRIEND.

"He was a friend and had helped many."

Many men have at different times and under varying moods extolled the great advantages which this Republic offers to those who reach its shores in search of fortune. New arrivals do not generally come over-burdened with worldly goods, and how frequently does it happen that some kind Samaritan has got to be sought to lend financial aid during the critical stage, before some remunerative employment is found? That greatly lamented gentleman—the late George McHardy—has helped more people financially and by counsel than any other Briton in this Republic. That is a recognised fact amongst the English speaking community, many of whom have at one time or another been indebted to our departed friend. He was always a friend and counselor to those who sought his aid. Although he had reached a prominent place among British traders in this city, he never forgot some of his humbler friends, and nothing gave him more genuine pleasure than doing some good service to his fellow men, whose endeavours had not been crowned with the same amount of success as his own. Kind-hearted almost to a fault this staid Scotsman will be greatly missed by the large circle who were proud to call him friend, and not the least by the writer than whom no one more deeply grieves the loss of an old and true comrade.

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN

SUCCESSFUL CONCERT

There was the usual excellently entertaining concert given last night in the St. John's Mission Hall to Seamen, which attracted every person of the seafaring world, that could be attracted, with the result that a capital evening's entertainment was enjoyed.

Miss Kathleen Knight was in her best vein, and as her poorest sample is good it can be estimated how well she sang last night. Mrs. Richards too, was her brisk self in "When the boys come home" and her daintily sung encore "Sue, Sue, Sue."

"And ut would be har-rd mun if ye 'cud hear-r a grader reciter than Mr. Norman MacQueen," such was an overheard expression.

Mr. Hill was greatly appreciated and encored for his singing, while Mr. Dickie with his banjo well—they were excellent companion in harmony. Mr. Brady was as entertaining as usual in the songs he sang and with the encores he gave.

The programme was:—

Part I.—Song: "Where my Caravan has rested," Mr. Hill. Encore: "When you come down the vale." Song: "My Orange Girl," Miss Knight. Encore: "Bird of love divine." Scotch recitation: Mr. MacQueen. Banjo solo: "Darkies Morn," Mr. Dickie. Encore. Song: "When the Boys come home," Mrs. Richards. Encore: "Me, Me, Me." Song: "The four jolly sailor men." Encore: "Stone Cracker John," Mr. H. W. Brady.

Part II.—Song: "A Little bit of Heaven," Miss Knight. Encore: "Up from Somerset." Banjo: "To the Front," Mr. Dickie. Encore: "The Minuet." A Highland Sermon: Mr. MacQueen. Song: "Somewhere a Voice is Calling," Mr. Hill. Encore: "Two Eyes of Grey." Song: "The Kerry Dance," Mr. Brady.

ROSARIO NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Dec. 21.

St. Bartholomew's School Sports.

On Saturday afternoon the Sports in connection with St. Bartholomew's School were held at Plaza Jewell. It was feared in the early part of the day that postponement would be necessary owing to the heavy rain which fell, but by midday the sun had come out and the weather left nothing to be desired. The storm had cooled, the atmosphere and the condition of the ground were perfect. The parents and friends of the pupils turned out in full force and tea was provided on the ground. Conservatorio Martinoli Pupils Concert.

A most successful concert was given in the Salon of the Savoy Hotel on Saturday, Dec. 18, by the pupils of the Conservatorio Martinoli. It was largely attended and the pupils did every credit to the careful instruction they had received. This Conservatorio is one of the best known schools of music in Rosario and numbers amongst its students many members of the British community several of whom took part in Saturday night's concert. Miss Lucy Baillie was a singer in two choruses. Miss Florence Beane whose piano playing was much appreciated gave Mendelssohn's "Rondo Caprichoso" with great taste and feeling. Miss Julia Nardy's rendering of Melempak's "Scherzo" was very fine, and Mr. Joseph Martin's singing of a selection from the "Barbieri di Sevilla" showed great promise. At the close of the concert diplomas were given to the students who had completed their course.

Closing Exercises of the English Methodist School.

On Friday, December 17, the Breaking-up and Prize-giving of the Methodist School took place in the Church, Boulevard Oroño and Salta. Mr. M. J. Martin being in the chair. The whole performance reflected the greatest credit on teachers and pupils, and both the audience and the performers seemed thoroughly to enjoy themselves.

The death of the Rev. Mr. Turner some months ago has thrown a lot of extra work on Mr. Werner and the officials of the Church and it is wonderful how time has been found to bring the School up to the state of efficiency which it has reached. The number of pupils has increased and the attendance throughout the year has been good.

The programme was as follows:—

Part I.

National Anthem (Argentine), The School; A Four Act Comedy "A Tight Corner" or "The Jacobite Rebellion," The Senior Grades. Scenes: Act. 1 General Campbell's Kitchen; Act. 2 General Campbell's Library; Act. 3 An Old Attic; Act. 4 General Campbell's Library. Characters:—Sir Niel Murray (Jacobite), George Gough; Capt. Battersby (Hanoverian), Stanley Nolan; General Campbell (Hanoverian), Arthur Woodward; Mrs. Elspeth Campbell (His sister), Lillian Rowley; Miss Alison Graham (His niece), Louie Horton; Celia Graham (His niece), Irene Smith; Jamie Graham (His nephew), Harry Smith; Jock A. Shepherd, John Kiehn; Abigail, Cook, Rubina Fohr; Jean, Maid, Florence Rowley.

Part II.

The Marseillaise, The School; A Four Scene Operetta "Little Cinderella," The Junior Grades. Scenes: First, Gathering of boys and girls after the announcement of a holiday. Second, Children playing and gathering flowers in the wood. Third, Cinderella's home. Fourth, Prince Charming's party. Characters:—Cinderella, Margaret Smith; Her Sisters, Katharine McCrindle, Margaret Kean; Fairy Godmother, Joyce Todman; Singer, Elizabeth Frances; Prince Charming, Leslie De La Haye; His Attendants, Alfred Macfarlane, Joseph Hart and James Rowley. Presentation of Prizes and Certificates, The Committee of Management.

Another Fatality.

From New Alberdi comes news of the death of Mr. Jordana, Head Foreman of the Stores deposits of the Ferrocarril Central Cordoba. Yesterday he was engaged in some shunting operations with some mules, when he slipped and fell under one of the wagons, receiving fatal injuries. He was buried this afternoon, amid many manifestations of regret and esteem, for he was well-known among the British community in that part. Mr. Holder, the Stores Superintendent of the F.C.C.C., especially, will miss in the deceased a subordinate of unusual merit.

Anglo-German Hospital.

The effects of the Anglo-German Hospital are being offered for sale by private arrangement, and many things have been disposed of; during the early day of January the remainder will probably be auctioned.

Markets and Crops.

Maize has been a steady market and prices continue to rule firm, as high as $4.80 having been touched this afternoon by several shippers. The supply is getting more and more on the scanty side, and it looks as though this article will not continue much longer to occupy cereal dealers' attention.

New Wheat.—Several samples of new wheat have been shown round the market during the week; they are all very nice quality and good specific weight. Reports from outside continue to speak well of the probable yields, and altogether the indications point to a good season as far as the supply of the 'materia prima' is concerned. How the stuff is going to be shipped, however, is another matter. As high as 120/- has been paid for boats to load up river about the end of January, and even vessels taken at this high figure cannot be considered as definite acquisitions, as they are always liable to be requisitioned by the British Government. I hear, for instance, that no less than six boats, due to load about early January, were thus taken by the British Government on Saturday. Shippers, of course, have no means of guarding against this contingency, and are all inclined to act on the conservative side in consequence.

Linseed.—I have heard one or two disquieting reports about the linseed yield, and the samples are said to be very disappointing. Whatever may be the cause, prices have jumped something like 60 cents on the week—from $11.25 last Tuesday to $11.85 to-day.

The rains have been just the very thing required by the maize, and on the whole the damage to the wheat crops has been negligible. Cutting is in full swing all through the wheat zone.

FOODSTUFFS FOR GERMANY

SUPPLIES FROM THE UNITED STATES.

London, Dec. 17.

The Foreign Under Secretary has informed the House of Commons that it has been ascertained that great quantities of foodstuffs are going from the United States to Germany. The Foreign Office was in communication with Washington upon the subject and has asked whether, in the case of instructions having been given in the matter, it would be convenient to specify what they were.

TRADE WITH THE STATES

Mistakes that are Made

A BISHOP'S IMPRESSIONS

Bishops as a rule are not believed to possess expert knowledge on matters relating solely to business, but there are exceptions; one of them is Bishop Homer Stuntz, who returned to Buenos Aires yesterday after seven months' absence in the United States.

In the course of an interview with a HERALD representative, the Bishop had many interesting things to say on the growth of trade relations between the United States and the South American Continent. Interest in the Latin American markets was increasing, but, he stated, "The trouble is not that insufficient interest is being taken by North Americans in respect to the Argentine and South America, but that the interest is a misguided one. Just now it is extreme, and my fear is that the country may be flooded with goods which it cannot absorb and with a number of agents for these, whose efforts will be wasted." To explain how this keenness on trade development down here had been occasioned was a difficult matter, but there was no doubt about it, it was extraordinary and intense, and the conception which even many hard-headed business men had of trading with this country was amazing and misguided.

In a most entertaining manner Bishop Stuntz gave some instances of this and told how he had been approached for advice. One man proposed to come with an agency for heavy iron castings, another for leather beltings (which were only supplied wholesale by carload orders), another with gas engines, others who on small capital had been told that a fortune awaited them in sheep farming, and that land could be obtained for next to nothing.

At a dinner at the "Knife and Fork Club," the Bishop spoke before some 475 business men, who represented a capital of many millions of dollars, and he said some of the questions that were addressed to him were astounding. No; there was no lack whatever of interest for South America in the States.

Bishop Stuntz mentioned these matters as explaining how mistaken the North American impression was, and suggested much help might be given by a wide circulation of the real facts.

The idea was that Buenos Aires was a city of gold, that an agency, of no matter what class of goods, had only to be opened to ensure success and a fortune. No conception of the country's requirements was possessed (generally speaking) by these people.

Again, the questions of language, customs and conditions were hardly ever considered.

Bishop Stuntz believed firmly in the future relations between the two Americas, but not in this way, nor with the ideas now prevailing.

Speaking of the effect of the war on North America, Bishop Stuntz said that some trades were booming in an almost incredible manner, and instances one case of a firm in Bridgeport, Conn. They held a contract for munitions to the value of $26,000,000 gold, and it would take 2½ years to complete, and was guaranteed even if peace were signed to-morrow!

It was a question whether it were better for neutral countries to supply munitions of war, or for the Powers to manufacture their own munitions years ahead and lay in a stock for the dread day. Of the two evils Bishop Stuntz believed the first the lesser one.

The Bishop then went on to say how he had been occupied during his seven months' absence from Buenos Aires.

From February 10 to February 20 next, a great conference is to be held at Panama, under the name of the "Congress of Christian Work for Latin America." Bishop Stuntz has been elected the President of No. 6 Conference, and for this purpose has been requested to prepare a report of some forty to fifty thousand words on "The Church in the Field," which title covers the foundation, increase, regulation, conduct, necessity and all such-like matters, concerning the churches throughout Latin America. Many weeks of his seven months' absence have been occupied over this report. Immense masses of detail had to be acquired from all localities, and Bishop Stuntz has been travelling through the States, through Mexico, California, and other places, collecting the necessary data, and furthermore has been much occupied in giving addresses in many places. Again, financial support for some of the poorer and more necessitous churches was needed, and in turning his attention to this, the Bishop collected some $12,000 to $15,000. Some four weeks' illness interrupted the work.

These matters are by no means the only ones which have claimed attention. There is a method in the United States of publishing each year a "Mission-Study Text-Book for the Young," which work is used for the year throughout the churches of some 20 different denominations.

It is a book of some eight chapters, and deals with varying countries, Japan, Korea, China, and the like.

For the coming twelve months, beginning in April of next year, the country is South America, and it has been Bishop Stuntz's and his daughter's work to prepare this book. Thus three months were further occupied in its compilation, of which the last chapter will be written after the Panama Conference.

Thus have seven months passed in strenuous work for Bishop Stuntz.

He will be in Buenos Aires only until January 9, after which he will depart for Chili—Lima—Panama (for the Conference), and then again to the States, for the great General Conference of the Methodist Church.

WEDDINGS

CARR—BULMAN.

At St. Saviour's Church Belgrano on Dec. 18 took place at 8.30 the wedding of Miss Hilda Bulman, daughter of Mr. Christopher Bulman, of Echeverria 3669, and Mr. Robert Bertram Carr.

The church had been prettily decorated by friends of the bride who was given away by her father.

Miss Bulman was attractively gowned in white charmeuse silk with Malines lace, full bride veil and orange blossoms and carried a bouquet of white roses.

Her three sisters, the Misses Eileen, Ivy and Olga Bulman were bridesmaids. They wore white foulard frocks with large white and red roses and carried bouquets of red carnations. Mr. S. Williamson was the best man and the groomsmen were Mr. Dannis Tisdall and Mr. H. Bulman. The Rev. T. O. Spanton performed the Marriage Service which was fully choral. Mrs. K. H. Thompson giving a notably fine rendering of "O Perfect Love" as a solo. A reception took place subsequently at Echeverria 3669.

A large number of handsome presents have been received, a list of which will be published later. The honeymoon will be spent at Pocitos. The bride's travelling costume is striped tafetta with white hat and aigrette.

VAN GEUSEU-POUTSMA

The marriage was celebrated quietly at La Plata on Dec. 16, of Mr. P. van Geusau and Miss Nelly Poutsma. The bride, who arrived from South Africa, via Madeira, on the R.M.S.P. Amazon, is a daughter of Dr. H. F. Poutsma, the famous leader of the Nationalist party in Pretoria.

A RIVER MYSTERY

Four Corpses Found

DISCOVERY AT THE ANTE PORT

It must occur to almost everyone who has walked along the Docks or watched the brown waters of the great river tumbling its foam of dirty breakers on the foreshore of mud, that under that Sepia Sienna surface many grim secrets, many dreadful things and many crimes must be hid. It is so in all great ports and assuredly this is no exception. In Britain many numerous verdicts "found drowned" or open verdicts, are returned yearly in such cases and most men may remember cases of river mysteries so strange, so horrible that the imagination of the sensation novel writer cannot surpass them, he can only write round them.

Last year sixteen battered corpses turned up together, a grisly company, in the waters of the upper Parana, a wild land enough. Buenos Aires does not as yet fish out corpses by the section or platoon but, we are getting on for four have been taken up; the bodies of two elderly and two young men off the ante-Port of the Darsena Norte. All are hideously decomposed and practically unrecognisable.

When the second body was met with, the theory was mooted that these might be bathers who had been swept out and drowned by the currents off shore and the Police are making enquiries on the basis of that and other possibilities. When however two more corpses appeared near the same spot, the case was considered to have assumed the aspect of a mystery which might have originated either in a shipwreck or a crime. The matter comes within the purview of the Prefectura General de Puertos and the opinion held there is that the dead men are not bathers as bathing is forbidden at the ante-Port. This reason however, hardly seems conclusive. Another suggestion is that some tragedy has occurred on a vessel some distance out and that the affair has been concealed. It is presumed that the bodies have been about a week in the water allowing for the heat and general conditions, two were naked, one having a single shoe on, the other two were half dressed. It is supposed that the current brought them into where they were found and they may have been employed on some small vessel wrecked during the gales of last week. At present no one has the slightest inkling either to the identity of the men or the cause of their death.

Books for Argentina

GIFT FROM AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR INTERNATIONAL CONCILIATION.

New York, Dec. 20.

The Pan-American division of the American Association for International Conciliation has earmarked a sum of $20,000 for presenting a library of the best books published in the United States to the Argentine Social Museum. If a special room is allotted for the library the Association will furnish it.

It is estimated that the library will cost $5,000, and will probably be delivered in May next. Mr. Goldsmith will undertake to present the library to the Museum.

LOSSES IN THE BALKANS

THE BRITISH CASUALTIES.

London, Dec. 20.

Mr. Tennant, the Parliamentary Under Secretary for War, stated in the House of Commons to-day that the British losses in the Balkans up to December 11 had been 32 officers and 1278 rank and file.

THE CONQUERORS

(AFTER RUDYARD KIPLING.)

"This war will be won by the Men—not by their Leaders."

*Ho, it ain't the noble Gen'ral, 'olding powwows with 'is Staff,
Nor it ain't the Labour Leader with 'is jaw,
Or the 'aughty Cabinet, or the giddy Suffragette,
It's the men, men, men, that's going to win this war.*

They may sleep sound in the 'Ouse, or may tear each other's 'air,
They may change their minds a dozen times a day;
For it won't make no onc quit, though it 'inders things a bit,
And piles the bill up 'eavier to pay.

For it ain't the noble Gen'ral, etc.

They may leave us in the lurch for a 'appy month or more
While they chats abaht the topic of the day;
And when 'alf way to attack, they may likely call us back,
'Aving mislaid reinforcements on the way—

But it ain't the noble Gen'ral, etc.

It's the "pass the Pawsey"* Tommy, wot 'as put in seven years,
'Oo is going to see old Hengland is done right,
It's the eighteen year recruity — wot "wants to do 'is dooty"
And don't look more than sixteen — in the light,

For it ain't the noble Gen'ral, etc.

It's the teacher from the boardschool— wot 'as squeedged 'imself inside
Though 'is bloomin' veins on marches give 'im 'ell;
It's the cove wot crossed the sea, from some far off Colony,
And found it 'otter still — at Neuve Chapelle—

For it ain't the noble Gen'ral, etc.

It's the busman and the porter—the navvy and the gent;
It's the Scottie with 'is 'andy little dirk,
With the Ghurka by 'is side ('ose carvin' is 'is pride);
It's the jockey, and the actor, and the clerk.

For it ain't the noble Gen'ral, etc.

It's the men who've giv' their jobs up — the men who've left their kids
And who know they mayn't come back to them no more;
And it's—more than all beside—them that's done their bit—and died—
Who—in spite of all—are going to win this war.

*No, it ain't the noble Gen'ral 'olding powwows with 'is Staff;
Nor it ain't the Labour Leader with 'is jaw;
Nor the 'aughty Cabinet, nor the giddy Suffragette,
It's the men, men, men, that's going to win this war;
Not the Leaders, but the Men—who'll win this war.*

* "Pass the Pawsey" is the old soldier's polite way of asking for gravy.

THE STORM

SERIOUS DAMAGE AT SANSINENA.

Very serious damage is reported from Sansinena in consequence of the storm on Tuesday, which appears to have wrought great havoc in its passage. From Ignacio Garcia, hail has damaged 80 per cent. of the wheat crop.

At Villa Sauze there was damage to buildings and one death. Galpones and solid constructions were all ruined, and no less than 25 persons are reported hurt, while 8 steers were drowned in a pool.

At Clarita, falling buildings killed two and injured many, and of 4000 hectares of wheat sown half is ruined.

A Special Appeal is made for contributions to the Officers' Families Fund.

CORDOBA'S CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

The British Patriotic Committee of Cordoba have issued the following manifesto and Balance Sheet to local residents:

At the present season the thoughts of all Britishers are turned to the Homeland and the gallant army and navy who are at present engaged in defending it from attack, and the Committee think that they would be interpreting the feelings of all British residents in an effort to raise a special Christmas and New Year subscription to alleviate the suffering and assist the dependents of those who are so nobly sacrificing their lives for our Empire.

With this object special subscription lists have been issued and will be circulated, the proceeds of which will be sent to the Prince of Wales' National Relief Fund and the British Red Cross Society.

Lists are open at the following addresses: G. E. Morton, Talleres, F.C.C.C.; Banco de Londres y Rio de la Plata, Plaza San Martin; Cordoba Light and Power Co., 155 Rivera Indarte; S. Harris Smith, Ferro Carril Central Argentino; W. Leeson, Ferro Carril Central Cordoba.

The importance of the work which is being done by these two organisations cannot be exaggerated and the Committee are confident that those who are enjoying a peaceful Christmas will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of showing their appreciation in a practical way at this season, of the burdens which are being borne by their brothers.

Yours very truly,

G. E. MORTON, Chairman.

A BRITISH AVIATOR

SUCCESS IN LOCAL TESTS.

Mr. Hubert F. Fisher, A.M.I., Mech.E., gained his certificate as an aviator on December 20 in tests held at the Paillette and Fels School of Aviation at San Fernando, and claims the honour of being the first British pilot to have qualified locally. The certificate, or "brevet" gained by Mr. Fisher, is issued under the conditions governing tests as laid down by the Aero Club Argentino, and has an international value, being recognised all over the world by affiliated bodies controlling aviation. The possession of this certificate enables Mr.

Fisher to enter straight into the Royal Naval Air Service, or Royal Flying Corps, without further tests of proficiency, should he be selected for those important services, and it is his intention to proceed to England with his wife, as soon as possible, to offer himself as a volunteer for aviation duty with the British forces. Mr. Fisher, has for some months had this object in view, and has been studying aviation under one of the best instructors in the country, Mr. A. Jarfelt.

Mr. Fisher is well known in engineering circles, and occupied the position of chief engineer and manager of Messrs. P. Storm's machinery business from 1910 till recently when he resigned to study aviation and equip himself as a volunteer. His "test" yesterday was performed in practically record time for the school.

SEAFARERS' TOBACCO FUND

A smaller meeting of the Seafarers' Tobacco Fund resulted last evening from the unpleasant nature of the weather. Captain Lewin presided, Mr. A. G. Pruden being unable to attend, as he explained by letter, owing to a Red Cross Society engagement elsewhere.

The minutes of last week's meeting having been read and approved, the following donations collected were announced to the Hon. Treasurer, the Rev. H. Westby Brady:—

From A Ship	$25.00
From Corinthian	38.00
From Sutherland Grange	109.00
From Kelvinhead	56.00
From Elstree Grange	71.45

or $299.45 in all, making a total of $6,106.27 since the inception of the Fund.

On the motion of Captain Lewin, it was decided to leave the sum on hand to be dealt with next week. The week's result was considered very satisfactory, considering how few ships are in port, and it was further remarked that non-British seamen on British ships have contributed generously. A number of interesting postcards from the French battle front were read, appreciating the gifts of tobacco and cigarettes.

The following were present: Captain Lewin, Captain Humphries, Captain Harrison, Chief Engineer S. S. Thessaly, Mr. Neilson, of Messrs. W. Deacon, Captain of the Kelvinhead, the Rev. H. W. Brady, Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. E. Beatty, Hon. Secretary.

PATRIOTIC SCHOOLMASTERS

LEAVING MONTEVIDEO TO VOLUNTEER.

At the demonstration and prize-giving of British Schools at Montevideo, on Friday, the Headmaster, Mr. A. S. Cuff, announced his impending departure for Europe. Mr. Cuff was married this year. He addressed the audience as follows:—

"As is generally known, many changes in the work of our Schools are imminent. Mr. Knight, of whose work in the School during the past fifteen months I cannot speak too highly—a great favourite with the boys—and I myself have felt it to be our duty as sound men of military age, to go to England to offer ourselves to our country for military service. A School must suffer temporarily from extensive changes in its staff, but what institution is not suffering in these days? Almost without exception the schools in England are either lamentably understaffed or are being carried on by older men or men physically unfit to bear arms. . . . Fortunately we have been able to make such provision for the future as to enable me to leave with the full conviction that the School will go on in my absence, keeping alive our national ideals and doing its best for the youth of our community. The Rev. Canon Blount, who has so nobly stepped into the breach as Acting-Headmaster, is not by any means new to the task. I can bear testimony to the very efficient way in which he presided over St. George's College for two terms in a like emergency. . . . When I decided to go to England, I felt it my duty to leave the community as free as possible in the choice of successor, and with that intention sent my complete resignation to the Governors. It was gratifying to me, of course, to be asked to return after the war, and I have given Mr. Mitchell Innes a definite promise to do so, if possible."

The chair was taken by Mr. Mitchell Innes, the British Minister, who, after remarking on the improvement in the programme of Speech Day by eliminating the speeches, made a sympathetic reference to the approaching departure of Mr. Cuff and Mr. Knight. A gap would be felt that could not adequately be filled. He declared that it was as hard to find a good headmaster as it was to discover a good Cabinet Minister. Fortunately for the School, he (the Chairman) had extracted from Mr. Cuff a promise that he would return as soon as he had fulfilled his duty to his country. The speaker also referred to the assistant master, Mr. Knight, who had won the unusual combination of both affection and respect of all the boys.

THE ARTILLERY AT LOOS

Trying Experiences While Without Orders

ARGENTINE VOLUNTEER'S STATEMENT

The following letter from Bombardier E. P. Colson, of D Battery, R.H.A., formerly of Monte Leña, Argentina, has been received by his mother, and kindly forwarded to THE HERALD for publication:—

Netley Hospital,

My dear Mother,

I have not been able to write sooner because, as you will have heard from Horsham, I was wounded in the right arm, no bones broken, only the muscles—the wound is healing nicely, but I am still a little stiff. I will try to give you an account of the great advance at Loos:

We shelled the place for four days and knocked their first line trenches to pieces, so that they couldn't use them, then on the 25th, at 6 a.m., the infantry charged, they got pretty badly knocked about by machine gun, rifle and shell fire but the brave chaps kept on and got them on the run; they chased the Huns past the town of Loos, an advance of about three miles, but by some mistake the supports did not come up when required. About 6 p.m. we were ordered to move up in support and we took up our new position at 3 a.m. on 26th, in a field with no cover (except a few sand bags) and opened fire about 5 a.m. but had to stop as we were so badly shelled by the Germans and had to take cover in the Infantry communication trenches. Then we got the order to be ready to retire and tried to get the teams to the guns, but could not limber up as no orders came; the teams were badly knocked about, a lot of horses being killed and wounded; our Infantry were being pushed back and we could see the Germans advancing. We had no orders to limber up and we could not fire, as our boys were all mixed up. It was a rotten position but we stuck it out laughing and joking (there were only two or three who let on that they thought we were done for.) It was bad enough not to be able to fire or retire, but the enemy made things a bit more lively by sending us over gas shells, we can stand anything but that, luckily we only got it slightly as we had helmets with us (we got that gas for three days).

At last we got reinforcements and then you ought to have seen the devil run, they can't stand cold steel and they were pushed back further than where they started from: so it went on until the 29th, the date on which our Head Quarters moved up to the town of Loos.

On the 28th, we shelled a cross road for two hours and made it impossible for the enemy to bring up reinforcements with which to make a flank movement; we had to take on the job because we had not enough Infantry for the purpose, and I am proud to say we made it so hot that they didn't get through. It was very difficult work, as we had our own men on our left and any shot going wide would have hit them. On the 29th they started to shell us heavily; two of our Batteries got it hot and had to shift; we went to the aid of A Battery, and tried to drag one of their guns away, as they hadn't enough horses, but we couldn't move it out of the ploughed land where it was stuck in the mud; we were shelled but got back to our own Battery safely and lay low for about half an hour by which time the Germans gave up shelling, so we started to get our breakfast. We were talking and joking and I had just got my canteen of tea (we hadn't had any for two days), when a big shell fell right in the midst of us. A piece hit me, knocking the tea out of my hand, and two other chaps were rather badly wounded in the legs. Mine is a gentle wound, as the sister calls it. I was taken to the dressing station, then sent by motor car to Bethune. We left there at 11 p.m. and had a train journey of 27 hours to Etretat on the sea coast; we were kept there for five days, then went to Le Havre by bus, and crossed to England by the "Egyptian Princess," landing on the 6th, and jolly glad to get there, for my clothes were all torn and we hadn't had a change for nearly three weeks. You can imagine what a treat it was to get into clean clothes—I remember one day three of us had a wash in a cup of water and the last man wasn't sure whether he was putting on mud or taking it off. You would be surprised at the health of the men; illness is a very rare thing. As soon as we got to the dressing station they inoculated us against lock-jaw, and they have quite overcome that trouble. Your last letters seem to have gone a bit astray, but don't worry about me for I am as fit as a fiddle.

Tony.

NO MORE ZEPPELIN RAIDS

CREWS FROZEN ON LAST TRIP.

ATTRACTIVE DISPLAY AT LOMAS

EXHIBITION OF ART AND NEEDLEWORK.

Tuesday, Dec. 21

It was only necessary to see the display of art and needlework at Lomas last evening to realise what children can do when they are willing and when they are properly taught.

The pupils of the Lomas Girl's College and of the Grammar School for Boys are breaking up for their Christmas holidays, and last night they were occupied in receiving the awards granted for their school work.

Last night was the night for the distribution of prizes and for a concert as well as the exhibition of art and needlework. To-night is the evening set aside for the closing exercise, the reading of the Prize essay, an address by Bishop Stuntz and the presentation of medals.

The function commences at 8.30 p.m. and is as follows:

Organ Prelude, Mr. W. H. Crispin.
Entrance March.
Invocation, Rev. J. W. Fleming, B.D.

National Anthem, the Schools.
School statement.
Song, the Girls.
Address, Bishop Homer C. Stuntz.
Song, the Boys.
Distribution of Medals.

Last night's entertainment contained a series of pleasing items, of songs, piano playing, and recitations by the pupils. There is little doubt that each one of the several teachers have much to be proud of in the intelligence, the willingness and repeated cleverness of their pupils. It was a most enjoyable entertainment, in which the following took part:

Pianoforte Duet, May Shepherd and Mrs. Drummond Stuart.

Part Song, "Dip the Oar," Stephen Tallon, Arthur Wilson, Norman Boxall, Eric Cheetham, Richard Thomas, and Hugo Sleigh.

Pianoforte Solo, "Chant de Bivouac," (Ketterer), Jessie Dodds.

Part Song, "Stars of the Summer Night," by the Senior Girls.

French Recitation, "La Cigale et la Fourmi," Euphemia Orphant.

Action Song by eleven little mothers, "Dolly Dimplecheek," Dolly Hood, Jane Edgar, Marjory Fergus, Edith Rodgers, Annie Hood, Maud Hansen, Lily Clarkson, and Marjory Clarkson.

Six Hand Piece, "Aux Pensionats," (L. Streabbog), May Shepherd, Lily Morony and Dorothy Dawson.

Chorus, "Hunting Song," by the Boys.

French Recitation, "Le Corbeau et le Renard," Stephen Tallon.

National Anthems and National Songs. Nations represented by Hilda Ainscough, Winnie Fergus, Euphemia Orphant, Vida Morony, Nita Richards, Teresa McCargo and Irene Ayliffe.

Distribution of Prizes.

The last item was one greatly looked forward to and a glance back to one's own days at school, when even if oneself is a failure, there is expectancy in seeing one's "chum" carry off something, will be sufficient to tell the nature of last night's prize distribution.

A few brief words and Mrs. Percy Shepherd was engaged first with one and then with another presenting to them their dues for work done.

The prize winners one and all received their share of applause and congratulation.

Prize List.

Preliminary, Marjorie Clarkson.
No report of last night's proceedings would be either accurate or justifiable without special mention were made of the art and needlework samples exhibited.

At a glance it was necessary to be assured twice over that what was to be seen was the work of children. In some cases it was perfectly beautiful, and in all quite exceptional. Examples of needlework, embroidery, macrama work, drawn thread work, canvas work, and the like were set out to advantage amongst paintings, sketches, drawings, and many other things. One tiny picture of a landscape was exceptionally attractive, and worth the weight in gold of its gilt frame.

The Lomas joint schools are proud and have reason to be proud of the magazine "The Gleaner." This work of the pupils is published, but it is the original copies, the hand written, hand drawn, hand painted copies which are such exceptional little works of art, besides the interesting and "milestone recording" contents.

The teaching staff have a great deal to be proud of both in their own work, and in the response received from their clever pupils, of which the schools now possess 70, and must extend before more can be accommodated.

BELGRANO DAY SCHOOL

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

Tuesday, Dec. 21

At the Dr. Smith Memorial Hall, (Principal, Mr. Green), yesterday afternoon, the prizes of the Belgrano Day School were presented by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Every, who made a brief speech of introduction, subsequently bestowing the prizes gained upon the following:—

Form V.

Languages.—1, B. Feeney; 2, E. van Peborgh.

Drawing.—1, R. Judson; 2, J. van Peborgh.

Form IV.

Mathematics.—G. Kimber.
All English Subjects.—1, G. Kimber; 2, C. Wilkins and G. Chantrill.

History and Geography.—G. Kimber.

Form Prize.—G. Kimber.

Drawing.—1, H. Judson; 2, J. Keenan and A. David.

Spanish.—R. Roberts.

Form III.

English Subjects.—J. Ballantine.

Spanish.—J. Ballantine.

Drawing.—J. Perkins.

Form II.

Arithmetic.—E. Pixton.

English.—A. Leitch.

Form Prize.—A. Leitch.

Neatness.—Seniors: R. James.

Junior: C. Wilkins.

Cambridge Local Certificates, 1914.

—Preliminary: G. Macgowan; Junior: H. Macgowan.

The Church, in which the ceremony took place, was entirely filled with parents and friends of pupils, who now number about fifty boys, fine physical specimens they are, and their mental attainments appear conform, as the facility with which several spoke English, French and Spanish in turn exemplified.

A short programme of music, recitations and exercise then followed:—

Form II.: Canto del Grillo.
French recitation by Van Peborgh: "L'un ou l'autre."

Spanish, Form III.: Escena Comica Dandolo Feeney.

French recitation: "Death of D'Assas," by G. Kimber.

Merchant of Venice, Trial Scene, by Form V. In this dramatic effort, which closed the programme, the entire cast were letter perfect. Shylock was particularly articulate and confident (doubtless because he had "the bond" in hand) and showed a relentless and strong spirit, while Portia and Graham were also notably distinct. The Duke was strikingly dignified.

On the conclusion Mr. Green announced that next term would open on March 6, at more commodious premises in Zapiola, the School having quite outgrown the accommodation of the Hall attached to the Church.

GIRTON HOUSE SCHOOL

Tuesday, Dec. 21

Last night at Girton House School the breaking up for the holidays took place. There would also have been a prize distribution but for the fact that those children who had won prizes generously determined that the money should be expended on behalf of the Serbian refugees, a lesson of self-abnegation which is part of the curriculum and is creditable to all concerned. The handsome sum of 45 dollars resulted.

Mr. Hardman addressed the pupils on behalf of the Principal, Miss Hassell. Several pupils had been singled out for special notice also: Miss Nora Botting not only for her results but for kindness to the younger pupils, to whom a ring was presented; Miss Isabel Codd, Miss Ines Pollard, Miss Sylvia Hyman, and Frank Roberts. The romping and general celebration concluded with "God save the King."

A CHRISTMAS APPEAL

THE ARGENTINE PHILANTHROPIC SCHOOLS AND INSTITUTES.

(To the Editor)

Sir,—Our most urgent appeal in 17 years is that which we are compelled to lay before our friends and the general public to-day. A number of causes, all of which are well known, have created a condition which during the last twelve months has imperilled the very existence of these Institutions. We are passing through the acutest experience of need which we have ever known. Many arrears have to be met, and many present needs supplied. What ever happens we may not shirk our responsibilities in this work. All must be steadfastly borne, and every demand must be firmly faced. 5,800 children, who receive the best which they will ever receive in their life, both intellectually and morally (as well as in material ways) represent far too great a trust for any carelessness, or light dismissal of heavy responsibilities, or avoiding of strenuous efforts, to be thought of even for a minute. This great work requires at once $150,000. The sum at first sight may seem a large one, but the work which asks for it is very large, and the more it is known the larger it is seen to be. Other ages have had their peculiar characteristics and problems; it is our lot to live in an Heroic Age, an Age of Sacrifice; it calls for great things everywhere, and while many are seeking to respond heroically to many calls created by this terrible war, I would implore a really heroic effort in response to this appeal which is on behalf of the greatest work of child-redemption in the Argentine, and which contains a living and growing promise of splendid results for the future.

Yours, etc.

WILLIAM C. MORRIS.
Director General.

BRITISH CEMETERY

OPENED AT LA CUMBRE.

(To the Editor)

Sir,—Some of your readers will be interested to know that the long and deeply felt need of a Protestant Cemetery, is now supplied for the district about "La Cumbre." It is situated on the right side of the Railway, about a mile from "La Cumbre," in going up towards "San Esteban," near to the Catholic Cemetery. The ground was the generous gift of Sr. Manuel Rios, and the subscriptions towards expenses are published below. We are indebted to Mr. G. G. S. Lumsdaine of Cruz Chica for arranging the transfer of the land with Sr. Rios, and for the work he has done in enclosing it in order. It is intended to have the "Title Deeds" made out to the Diocesan Association, who hold Personeria Juridica.

I annex a statement of accounts and am

Yours, etc.

YOUR NAME PLEASE?

AN INTERESTING BOOK OF SIGNATURES

The St. Andrew's Society of the River Plate possess a most interesting book, allegorically illuminated of the signatures and names of those who have taken part in the St. Andrew's Day Celebrations dating from the year 1899, says a correspondent. Included are those of the present President of the Argentine Republic, and a number of well known Argentine Ministers and Deputies, past and present British Ministers, and Consul-Generals, Bank and Railway Managers, heads of practically all the principal professions, commercial and industrial firms, estancieros, and of many other aspirants to similar positions in this part of the world. The names of members of the Society and sympathisers, who have this year subscribed to the Benevolent and Scottish Red Cross Fund; are being entered in this book. It is not yet too late to have "your name." The President of the Society, Mr. D. C. Anderson, Calle Maipu 52; the Hon. Secretary, Alex. W. Grant, Rivadavia 1255; any member of the Committee, or the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. J. A. Aird, Avenida de Mayo 761, will be pleased to receive "something" from you along with "your name."

So far the appeal has been liberally responded to, and it only requires a few dollars more to make a total of "four thousand."

PRINCE GEORGE'S CONSERVATOIRE OF MUSIC

ANNUAL CONCERT AND PRIZE DISTRIBUTION.

At the American Church Hall last evening, the 18th year of the Prince George's Conservatoire of Music was celebrated by a concert, and by an annual distribution of certificates and prizes given away by Mrs. Field.

Professor H. G. Wellby, the Principal, has much to congratulate himself upon, as it is due to him that the past year, with other years, too, has been so successful.

Before the presentation of the prizes, a concert was given by the pupils of the Conservatoire.

No more pleasant musical evening could have been spent, and there were one or two items deserving of special mention.

Owing to absence, Miss E. Wright's position in the programme was taken by Mr. A. Biagi, with a pianoforte solo, which claimed most deservedly an encore.

Miss Marjorie Wellby's piano playing too, was of exceptional brilliance, and the encore called for was the beautifully played No. 9 Nocturne of Chopin. It was a performance of great merit.

Miss Vera Shaw excelled with her violin playing, and was recalled, and the number of other enjoyable items were numerous.

The programme was as follows:—

1. Trio (violin, 'cello and piano), Trio in D (Ch. Dancla), the Misses Shaw Wilkinson and Millar.

2. Piano solo "Rondo in C" (Clementi), Miss Budden.

3. Piano solos, "Visions of an unknown land" (1 Golden Dawn, 2 Whisper of the moontowers) (G. Lind), Miss Phyllis Sturgeon.

5. Song, "From Paradise" (Guy D'Hardelot), Miss L. Lacey.

6. Piano solo, Tarantella (Venezia y Napoli), (Liszt), Miss M. Millar.

7. Song, "Caro mio ben" (Giordani), Miss Mortlock.

8. Piano solo, "Gipsy's Lament" (George Aitken), Mr. F. Hansen.

9. Song "A perfect day," Miss M. Nugent.

10. Piano solo, Mélodie "Chrysanthème," Miss Marjorie Wellby.

11. Song, "Au Printemps," Miss V. S. Shaw.

12. Piano solo, "La Fontaine," Miss N. Arnholter.

13. Violin solo, "Sylphide," Miss V. S. Shaw.

14. Piano solo, "Reverie D'Automne" Mr. E. D. Colley.

15. "Cello solo, "Berceuse," Miss M. Wilkinson.

16. Piano solo, Andantino, A. Picture, Mr. Rodolfo A. Biagi.

17. Piano solo, "Perpetuo Mobile," Miss M. Millar.

The presentation of prizes followed, when Mrs. Williams Field congratulated the following upon their individual success:—

GARDEN PARTY AT BANFIELD

CHARMING EVENING FUNCTION.

The success which succeeds like itself was the result last evening of the postponed second night of the Garden Party at 1417 Acevedo, Banfield, the residence of Mr. Crispin, who had kindly not only put his house and grounds at the disposal of the fete for the benefit of the Lomas M. E. Church, but had arranged the elements thereof in the most advantageous manner possible. By nine p.m. a large number of visitors had already arrived and more continued to come in.

No better background could be desired than the Crispin Quinta for the purpose, the area extends to over 5000 varas, and is agreeably diversified with shrubberies and some fine trees, which include fine specimens of variegated holly. In front of the house a forty-foot spruce had been converted into a gigantic Christmas tree, and the coup d'oeil from the entrance embracing this, the numerous beflagged erections and the vista of Chinese lanterns, which made effective colour on the velvet blue of the night, was exceedingly pleasing. Electric lamps had been lavishly used throughout the grounds, each Chinese lantern containing a powerful globe, and the whole installation and lighting effects were the work of Mr. Geoffrey Crispin.

Tea and refreshment tables had been scattered about the lawns and between the shrubs, and there was an excellent provision of comfortable seats, nor had either business nor amusement been forgotten. A stall at which fancy goods of many kinds were on sale represented the first and half a dozen "side shows" the second. These included a mysterious arrangement of strings bearing some resemblance to a reduced giant stride, and might be termed "The Strings of Fate," whereby the skilful might obtain for themselves certain articles of value—for a small consideration; further on were Ping Pong, which requires no description; a species of quoits, with a gaping frog as target, and the time-honoured cocoa-nut shy, at which some ladies displayed a deadliness of aim and delivery which must have seriously impaired the profits of the Institution.

By ten o'clock it appeared as if all the British population of Banfield and the neighbouring pueblos had arrived, although this is doubtless an over-sanguine opinion. The actual results as measured in the prosaic form of dollars, cannot yet be appraised, but ought to be eminently satisfactory. A pierrot troupe was present, and gave a very meritorious open-air concert. They are already known under the collective name of the Birdsigh Songsters; their costumes being black for the ladies, and white for the mere male adjuncts. The concert was given on a stage draped and wreathed patriotically with Union Jacks and banderas Argentinas and its programme was as follows:—"I want to be a Pierrot," Troupe; "Somewhere a Voice is Calling," ("Dove"), Mr. Fairbairn; "Pierrot," ("Jenny Wren"), Miss Bertha Humphreys, "I'm going for a sailor" ("Cuckoo"), Master Steve Tallon; "Sister Susie's Sewing Shirts for Soldiers" ("Robin Redbreast") Mr. P. Shepherd; dance "Castinet" ("Mocking Bird"), Miss Emma Banham; "Little Man" ("Hummingbird"), Mr. W. H. Crispin; "Someone to love me" ("Nightingale"), Miss Lucy Greta; "But it is so" ("Scarecrow"), Mr. J. D. Humphreys; "Good Night" ("Jenny Wren"), Miss Bertha Humphreys. At the piano, W. H. Crispin.

Among the agreeable functions which have taken place in the Southern Suburbs, that of last night certainly holds an honoured place, and the credit of its success must be assigned to Mr. and Mrs. Crispin, and the ladies and gentlemen who assisted them.

2797 marks; Vera S. Shaw, second prize, with 3561 marks; Nellie Arnholter, first prize, with 3693 marks.

Diploma as Teacher of Pianoforte.—Margaret Millar.

SALE OF WORK

AT THE BARKER HALL, LOMAS.

The Sale of Work which was held in the Barker Hall, Lomas, on Dec. 3 and 4 inst., in order to raise funds for the reduction of the debt on the Temperley branch of the St. Andrew's Scotch Presbyterian Church, and the purchase of an organ, brought in the excellent sum of $8,800. The Committee desire to express their gratitude to the numerous friends who in one way or another contributed to this splendid achievement.

The list of those who subscribed, donated articles, and assisted towards the success of the Sale of Work, is so long that it would be difficult to publish it, but those who have helped are asked to kindly accept the grateful thanks of the Committee for their cooperation.

In addition to the many private individuals, the following firms sent contributions: Geo. McHardy and Co., R. Grant and Co., Bazaar Inglés, Alex. Mackintosh of Mackintosh and Co., Auld and Co., Barclay and Co., Ashworth and Co., A. E. Wesley "Tandilera" Tandil, Bagley and Co., La Martona, Anderson and Kay, Feeney and Co., Alex. Colven, Nestle and Co., Walker Ltd., J. and J. Drysdale, Frigorifico "La Blanca," Confiteria Laporte, Armour Cold Storage Co., Harrods, Los Dos Chinos, J. Muallem, Clemente Chiavenna and Co., G. Brown and Co., "La Figura," Campbell and Carlisle, Farmacia Diego Gibson, Robinson, Caccio and Teltamanti, H. Walters and Co., A. N. Guy, James Begg (Moore and Tudor).

The Committee are very much indebted to the Editors of the BUENOS AIRES HERALD and The Standard for the many paragraphs published in both papers, and to the Manager of the F.C.S. for the use of the Hall.

FREE PASSES ON THE TRAMWAYS

THE INTENDENTE'S SUGGESTED REFORM.

Dr. Gramajo, the Municipal Intendente is still exceedingly busy and giving a vast amount of attention to a vaster amount of matter. His latest communication has been addressed to the Anglo-Argentine and Lacroze Tramway Companies requesting that all persons to whom passes are issued shall in future only have these issued to them if their photographs are reproduced thereon in the form of the carnet.

This, Dr. Gramajo points out, will entirely avoid the transference of passes.

The Lacroze Company have fallen in with the suggestion, which will immediately be adopted. The Anglo-Argentine Company adopt the idea for municipal employees only, and will take time to consider the general issuing of passes in this form.

MARTIN GARCIA GERMANS

ESCAPE OF FOUR PRISONERS.

Several Germans have escaped from Martin Garcia, where they were interned after the sinking of the Cap Trafalgar. They are Karl Lesarzill, Magnus Wehsmann, Magnus Jahn and Richard Zeed, all firemen. The Commander of the Isle is to inquire whether the matter has occurred through negligence of the guards. The Minister of Foreign Affairs will take no action beyond noting the fact of the escape; as the escaped are not criminals in the common sense their extradition cannot be asked for.

Meanwhile the Commandant has been ordered to take every means to prevent the repetition of these evasions. The "Kind Ladies and Gentlemen" (German without doubt?) who interested themselves in the lot of these captives should be carefully inspected if they visit the island. Historic escapes have been made in the guise of "an old lady with a green wail."

BRITISH HOSPITAL

DONATION OF CAVELL PORTRAIT

The Committee of Management of the British Hospital held their usual monthly meeting on Dec. 15, the following gentlemen being present:—

Mr. C. H. Pearson, (Chairman); Messrs. A. G. Thornton, R. de Candolle, J. Dey, Hope Gibson, R. H. F. Stuart, A. M. Wilson, A. W. Boote, Rev. Dr. J. W. Fleming and C. Manifold.

The Hon. Treasurer reported that the expenditure for the month of November had been $21,968.70, making an aggregate for the eleven months of $251,311.72.

The number of patients treated during November was 315, as compared with 302 in the same month last year.

A hearty vote of thanks was passed to Miss Zelda Shanfield for that lady's gift of her portrait painting of Nurse Cavell, which will be hung in the Hospital.

The following subscriptions and donations were received during November:—

NEW PORT WORKS

AMERICAN SYNDICATE'S PROPOSALS.

It is stated that representatives of an American Syndicate interviewed the Minister of Public Works yesterday on no less important a matter than the prosecution of the New Port Works, which are at present in a state of suspended animation for reasons which are public property.

They were informed that the question is at present under consideration pending the President's decision, but that they might put their proposals in concrete form, when they will be looked into. The embanking and piling works at Rio Tercero also came under the proposals of the Syndicate.

Mainly for Women

Conducted by "Egeria"

A FAMOUS EDUCATIONALIST

One of the most interesting features to a woman in the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, this year, is the fact that for the first time in its history a woman is president of the educational section.

It is on Mrs. Henry Sidgwick that this honour falls, and there are few, if any, women in England to-day more worthy of the honour, for what Mrs. Sidgwick has done for Newnham College, Cambridge, and the higher education of women generally, is one of the landmarks in the education of our sex.

Mrs. Sidgwick gave a fine presidential address, asserting that it is to intellectual curiosity that the interest taken in education, particularly in physical science, is mainly due. An intellectual curiosity is an important adjunct to the mental processes involved in understanding the world we live in; a valuable aid in the formation of a good judgment; and a great assistance in practical life. Intellectual curiosity and esthetic sensibility are, however, the mainsprings of culture—that is, of some of the highest pleasures we can enjoy.

"The business of most of us is practical," said she, "but what is to be desired is that everyone capable of it should combine practical ability with a desire to learn. And, of course, we must wish that the means to satisfy this desire should be within everyone's reach. Learning is of little value unless it meets a desire in the learner's mind. And here the parents come in. The required attitude of mind is much more likely to be inspired by parents who possess it, than it is by the school. Those children are more likely to grow up with it whose parents combine with the school to stimulate it. Unfortunately the result of compulsory primary education has not been to promote any sense of responsibility in parents as regards this—at least, that is my belief." Referring to Scotland in support of this belief:—"It may be that the school education actually prevailing in Scotland is better now than that of fifty years ago, and that general intelligence is more developed. But parents who felt their children's schooling to be their private concern, valued it more took more personal interest in it, and felt more personal responsibility for their children's progress than parents can do now. And it is a serious question whether the loss of this close link with home life has not had a bad educational effect, taking education in its wider sense; which is not compensated for by possible improvement in the schools. With the greatest zeal, the schoolmaster cannot replace the parents, nor even the parents' influence in producing the right attitude of mind in the pupil. And it is at the very least doubtful whether the better teaching which improved methods secure to the pupil can make up for any loss or spontaneous desire to put his own mind into the effort of learning for learning's sake."

The president uttered a warning against State regulation of higher education. "Bureaucratic regulation may be well adapted to produce German 'Kulture,' but it is not the way to secure the attitude of mind which leads to freedom, independence of thought and culture in the best sense. And it is very apt to lead to want of independence in the teacher."

In moving a vote of thanks to Mrs. Sidgwick, Lord Bryce uttered the same note of warning, and deplored Government interference in secondary schools and universities. One of the real objects of education, he said, was to increase one's capacity for enjoying intellectual pleasures, and to help us to be more creatures of the spirit and less of the body.

HOW TO REST.

Everyone, no matter what their occupation may be, requires a certain amount of rest regularly. Part of this is of course taken during the night, but a part ought also to find a place during their waking hours. Many people make the mistake of thinking that rest is a synonym for idleness, but some of the best and most refreshing forms of rest keep people occupied. It would, indeed, be almost truer to say that rest is a change of work more often than it is idleness. The man engaged in absorbing mental work, for example, may feel immensely benefited if he makes a point of doing regularly some manual labour, especially if this be of a kind that can be done in the open air. The man whose work is sedentary and keeps him tightly to an office desk would be better for a brisk walk, but very often he feels this to be pointless, or he does not enjoy it because he has no companion, but if he exercises his muscles and enforces deep breathing on his lungs by digging in the garden, chopping or sawing wood or any similar work, he will get the needed change and feel much invigorated. This is where a hobby is so valuable either for men or for women. Women are quite as much in need of rest that shall be a refreshment as men. They are often too much tethered to the house by their duties, with the result that they do not get enough fresh air. They also live too much in the narrow bounds of the home, not getting there so much change as a man does by merely going out to his daily work and coming in contact with other people, exchanging ideas and opinions, bearing news, and so on.

Many a woman becomes a nervous wreck more from the monotonous character of her daily life than from the actual labour it involves. She might have saved years of misery if she had but learnt how to rest. Fifteen minutes spent in a comfortable chair with the newspaper after lunch would give her something fresh to think about. A book read just chapter by chapter every day provides something to look forward to, and a sustained interest. It is a mistake for a woman to give up her music, her painting, or anything else in which she is interested on her marriage. She needs recreation, and as she may not always be able to take it in the form of going out to entertainments, certainly that will be impossible if she has children, she should guard against boredom by keeping interest in some pursuit. Rest for certain people and in certain cases really should be as near complete idleness as possible, but this is by no means true of the majority of healthy persons. For them the best rest is a change of occupation which brings into play muscles and mental processes not much used in the work on which they depend for their daily bread, since this it is to be presumed, demands the greater part of their time.

Lady Dorothea Feilding, who has been decorated with the Cross of the Order of Leopold by King Albert, has had also the honour of being mentioned in despatches by a French Admiral commanding Marine Fusiliers, in which he says she is "giving to all almost daily the finest example of contempt of danger and devotion to duty." She is the second daughter of the Earl of Denbigh, and went to the front almost at the commencement of the war. She is able to speak French beautifully, and her work has been principally connected with the French Marine Fusiliers. Lady Dorothea Mary is one of six sisters, who have the name of Mary added to any other name they may possess.

WOMEN IN MEDICINE

The "New York Sun" tells us something about "Women in Medicine":

There are still persons to be found who believe the activity of women in the field of medicine is a modern phenomenon, that the woman physician was never seen and her influence never felt until the present age, yet this opinion is very far from the truth. The history of the woman physician is as old as the history of man. She practised in ancient Egypt thousands of years before Christ. In the eleventh century at the great school of Salerno, she studied in the university on exactly the same terms as men.

The first woman physician in America was Margaret Jones, who was burned to death as a witch in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. We hear nothing of women physicians after that time until Elizabeth Blackwell, an English girl who came to America with her family at the age of nine years and entered Hobart Medical College at Geneva, New York, in 1848.

Miss Blackwell had applied at twelve medical schools before writing to Geneva, but without result. She took the usual course of study and was graduated at the head of her class. She subsequently went to Europe for further study.

Emily Blackwell, sister of Elizabeth, also decided to take up the study of medicine. She was refused admission at Hobart College, but secured entrance to Rush College in Chicago. She was debarred, however, from taking her second term at Rush College, but was received at the Medical College of Cleveland, from which she was graduated. After graduation Dr. Emily Blackwell also went to Europe and studied in Paris and in Edinburgh, under the famous Sir James Simpson.

It was due largely to the efforts of these pioneer women that the practice of medicine was reopened to women not only in America but also in Europe, for they had a direct influence in helping to secure entrance for women to medical schools in England and Scotland. After the return of the Blackwells to this country they found the hospitals all closed against them, while at the same time they were fully conscious of the absolute necessity of hospital associations if their medical work was to be at all effective. This difficulty was partly met by the establishment of a tiny dispensary in 1854, to be followed by the erection of the New York Infirmary three years later. This woman's hospital was opened with twelve beds for poor lying-in women, and the necessary funds were contributed by public spirited citizens, who were solicited by ladies interested in providing women with physicians of their own sex.

After the Blackwells had broken the ice, other women made up their minds to enter the field of medicine. The majority of medical schools refused to admit women, and pressure was brought to bear on those less hostile in order to have female students excluded.

With undaunted courage and in the face of determined and often insulting opposition with very slender resources, the women gathered what small sums they could raise and established small medical schools here and there, to which was added a dispensary and later a small hospital.

The Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, founded in 1850, was the first college in the world established for the medical education of women. It is still a large and prosperous college. The Woman's Medical College of the New York Infirmary was opened in 1865, but was closed in 1899, when Cornell opened its doors to women. The Woman's Hospital of Philadelphia was opened in 1861, and in 1895 the hospital of the Pennsylvania Medical College of Philadelphia was founded, so that Philadelphia has two hospitals founded and run by women.

The Woman's Hospital of Chicago was founded in 1865, and a college for women followed four years later. The fifth woman's hospital was opened in 1875 in San Francisco, and the Northwestern in Minneapolis makes the sixth. A Woman's Medical College was opened in Baltimore in 1882.

The State University of California is open to women and so are the universities of other Western States, so it is no longer necessary for women to open separate medical colleges of their own. Johns Hopkins University, in view of a gift of £20,000 presented by women to the endowment fund of the medical department, consented to admit women to the medical school. In 1899 the medical school of Cornell University was established in New York, and since that time there have always been women students in the classes.

Women are now eligible to the medical societies. On their re-entrance to the medical profession they were excluded almost everywhere.

Almost all the earlier women graduates in medicine were married and brought up families in addition to performing their other duties. The graduates who went west met with less opposition than those who remained in the East.

The famous Dr. Mary Putnam, who subsequently added Jacobi to her name, after being graduated from the Women's Medical College of Philadelphia, went to Paris in 1866 and had the distinction of opening to students of her sex the celebrated school which had been closed to women for centuries. She made a brilliant record, which preceded her to England. In 1873, some time before her marriage to Dr. A. Jacobi, and largely owing to his influence, she was admitted to the Medical Society of New York Country, but was excluded from the Obstetrical Society by means of blackballs, although her paper as a candidate was accepted by a committee on membership and she had received a majority vote.

In 1880 there were 2432 women physicians registered in the United States, although it is said the education of many of them was, owing to the difficulties encountered, irregular and imperfect. In the same year there were 123 in New York city, about fifty in Philadelphia, and about thirty in Boston. Many of the earlier graduates went to foreign fields as medical missionaries, glad to escape the warfare they would have been obliged to face at home. There they have founded hospitals and colleges from which native medical women have been graduated.

Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi and Dr. Angell founded the Mount Sinai Dispensary, which has always had women on its staff. Dr. Putnam Jacobi was also made clinical lecturer on children's diseases at the Post-Graduate Hospital, where one or two other women have held positions.

Mrs. H. B. Irving, speaking in London, said at the present moment women might be said to have the ball at their feet, and she hoped they would know how to play the game and arrive victoriously at the right goal. Women were really just as dominated by the spirit of adventure as were the stronger sex, and young girls who would not have dreamt of even peeling a potato here in England in peace time were quite prepared to go to Serbia or anywhere else sufficiently original and volunteer to cook anything anywhere, anyhow, if by so doing they could escape the dullness of the commonplace.

Miss Iris Tree, the youngest, the 18-year-old daughter of Sir Herbert and Lady Tree, is a debutante of 1915, who has already made a place for herself. Like Lady Diana Manners, and Miss Phyllis Boyd, daughter of Lady Lilian Boyd, who was the most brilliant debutante of 1914, Miss Tree has studied hard at the Slade school, draws well, writes good verse, and has contributed a war poem to the "Times." She bears little resemblance to her sisters, Mrs. Alan Parsons and Miss Felicity Tree—the latter, by the way, has been nursing the wounded in a Paris hospital—excepting that she, too, has light reddish hair and a pale complexion.

Land of Lilliput.

Conducted by Egeria

My dear Lilliputians,

I am sure you are all thinking about this day next week, and I hope it will bring you a great amount of happiness, and that Santa Claus will think of you every one and fill your stockings up to the top.

I saw Santa Claus to-day very busily engaged in filling his pack with buckles and spades and all the joys for Lilliputians at the sea-side. And I saw him trying to fit in a big bicycle for a Lilliputian about 12 or 13 years old. In fact, it was a pleasure to see the old grey-beard going around the shops and filling his pack with beautiful presents for all the Lilliputians who read my letter every week. And everywhere are beautiful flowers; not holly and mistletoe, for in Buenos Aires these English plants are not seasonable at Christmas; but the Cane jasmine whose rich perfume scents the streets, carnations, roses, and other summer blossoms. Our holly and mistletoe we must buy in the shops, and they will serve to remind all of us, who are exiles from home, of the decorations in England on this day week.

Speaking of flowers I wonder do you know the stories of the names of flowers? I will tell you about some of them, and I am sure you will take more interest in flowers when you know what they mean.

The colour of violets indicates the love of truth, and the truth of love. "I would give you some violets, but they all withered when my father died." So says Ophelia to the Queen. The violet, in flower language, is emblematical of innocence, and Ophelia says that the King, the Queen and even Hamlet himself, now he has killed Polonius, are unworthy of the symbol.

Narcissus saw his image in a fountain and fell in love with it. He vainly attempted to kiss it, but not being able to do so, killed himself. His blood was changed into the narcissus flower.

The iris is called the goddess of the rainbow, or the rainbow itself. In classic mythology she is called the messenger of the gods, when they intended discord, and the rainbow is the bridge let down from heaven for her accommodation. When the gods meant peace they sent Mercury.

Wallflower is so called because it grows on old walls and ruined buildings. It is a native plant.

The geranium, according to the Turks, was a common mallow, changed by the touch of Mahomet's garment. The small flowers that make up a geranium head are not unlike the mallow flower.

The tulip is the "turban" plant (Persian, thoulyban, a turban), by which name the flower is called in Persia.

The sunflower gets its name, not because it follows the sun, but because it resembles a picture sun. Three or four flowers on one plant will turn as many different ways.

Strawberry means the straying plant that bears berries, so called from its runners, which stray from the parent plant in all directions.

Hawthorn was chosen by Henry VII. for his device, because the crown of Richard III. was discovered in a hawthorn bush at Bosworth.

There are two kinds of passion flowers grown in hothouses. One is a dark crimson colour and a little different in shape from the pale green one. I once had the pleasure of seeing the crimson passion flower in a hothouse. I should think there were about three enormous plants in a full bloom. I never saw such a magnificent sight before. The roof of the hothouse was covered by the fresh green leaves of the plant, and, hanging from the leaves, like myriads of crimson stars, were the beautiful flowers.

This is what the parts of the other passion flower symbolise in connection with the crucifixion of Christ:—The leaf symbolises the spear; the five anthers, the five wounds; the tendrils, the cords or whips; the column of the ovary, the pillar of the cross; the stamens, the hammers; the three styles, the three nails; the fleshy threads within the flowers, the crown of thorns; the calyx, the glory or nimbus; the white tint, purity; the blue tint, heaven. It keeps open three days (Matt. xii. 40)—the three years' ministry.

The cornel cherry tree is dedicated to Apollo; the cypress, to Pluto; the dittany, to the moon; the laurel, to Apollo; the lily, to Juno; the maiden's hair, to Pluto; the myrtle, to Venus; the narcissus, to Ceres; the oak, to Jupiter; the olive, to Minerva; the pine cone, to Assyrian temples; the poppy, to Ceres; the pine, to Bacchus.

The Canterbury bells is dedicated to St. Augustine of England; crocus, to St. Valentine; crown imperial, to Edward the Confessor; daisy, to St. Margaret; herb Christopher, to St. Christopher; lady's smock, to the Virgin Mary; rose, to Mary Magdalene; St. John's wort, to St. John; St. Barnaby's Thistle, to St. Barnabas.

Leek, the emblem of Wales; lily (fleur de lys), of France; lily (giglio bianco), of Florence; lily (white), of the Ghibelline badge; lily (red), of badge of the Guelphs; linden, of Prussia; mignonette, of Saxony; pomegranate, of Spain; rose, of England (red Lancastrians, white Yorkists); shamrock, of Ireland; thistle, of Scotland; violet, of Athens and Napoleon; sugar maple, of Canada.

Ros is a symbol of the Resurrection; cedars, the faithful; corn-ears, of the Holy Communion; dates, of the faithful; grapes, "This is My Blood"; holly and ivy, of the Resurrection; lily, of purity; olive, of peace; orange blossom, of virginity; palm, of victory; rose, of incorruption; vine, of Christ our Life; yew, of death. The laurel, oak, olive, myrtle, rosemary, cypress, and amaranth are all funeral plants.

Now you know something of the effect different plants and flowers made on the ancients, when they could make each one symbolise something; and I am sure you already know some of these symbols. I wonder will you be interested if I tell you something about a place in Dorsetshire, England, which is known as "The Little Commonwealth." You Lilliputians all know that there are other Lilliputians who have not the opportunities you have of knowing how to behave; they have not the advantages and love and care which parents give to you; and they sometimes do things for which they must be punished. The old plan was to send these young things to prison or to reformatory; but there is now a new plan which is, although an experiment, something of what Christ meant when he said:—"Suffer the little children to come unto Me."

These Lilliputians, instead of being sent to prison, are sent to "The Little Commonwealth," and on arrival they become citizens, with a right to a full share in the making and enforcing of the laws under which this Lilliputian community lives. So you see they are just on the boundary line of the Land of Lilliput and the other Land which is not Lilliput. The man who tells the story says of it:—

Boys and girls have precisely identical rights and privileges.

It is the citizenship which, given full play, achieves the apparently impossible. I will not say that it makes good children out of bad children, for that would be to miss the cardinal fact. What it really does is to give free play to the natural normal balances and restraints which exist within each individual, not less in the child than in the man, and certainly not less in the so-called bad child than in the so-called good child.

My wife and I arrived at the Little Commonwealth about one o'clock in the afternoon, and a quick glance told us that, outwardly at any rate, we had come across something pleasing. Three charming thatched cottages were dotted down at different points of the farm, and all around were spacious meadows and great slopes of hills. Here in the middle was an office and shop, there on one side a new cottage in course of construction—a little larger than the rest.

A young girl came up to us, and, learning who we were, took us across to the nearest cottage—"Bramble Cottage" I think it was called—and there we found one of the families waiting to start dinner. We sat down at the table and enjoyed our meal. All the buying, cooking, serving and everything in connection with the house is under the sole control of the "housekeeper," who is one of the children. Our hostess, the housekeeper of this cottage, was Harriet, one of the first three citizens of the Commonwealth, and the first Judge of the Court where offenders against the Commonwealth Laws are tried and punished.

After dinner, the citizens scattered to their work—some to the fields, some to the carpentry required for the new cottage (the bricklaying had all been done by the citizens, but was now finished), some to the laundry, and some to the domestic duties inside the houses. Another of the citizens had charge of the little ones—little waifs of five, six and seven years who, for one reason or another, had found their home at the Commonwealth. I should like to be able to give the portrait of this young nurse, whose healthy, vigorous body and clearly-marked features indicated a strong and attractive personality. A year or two ago she was at war with the world, sent to an industrial school and expelled from there because she destroyed the discipline of the school; then sent to a reformatory and expelled from there because she destroyed the discipline of the reformatory, and then . . . The next step—the inevitable next step according to the accepted belief—was prison and the life of a "hardened" criminal. But the Little Commonwealth took her, and all was changed. Her strength, instead of being used against society, had found its right place, and in years to come who can tell of what value her help may be in solving the problems with which the nation will be faced?

After a long talk with Mr. Lane, we were invited by the "housekeeper" of the next cottage—"Heather Cottage" I think—to join a small party at tea on the grass; the others of the party were girls whose household tasks admitted of a short breathing space, Mrs. Lane, two of the babies, and an absurd Great Dane puppy, who insisted upon knocking everything about with his sturdy tail. The day was beautiful, and the faces of everyone there showed that glow of content which is the sign of healthy body and healthy mind.

I have left myself very little space to tell you how it all works. How the laws are made, how they are administered, what sort of punishments are inflicted, and how the general life of the community goes on. I am not sure that I know myself. But I know that it does work. And I know that the essential factor is that in ethical matters it is the children themselves who form the judgment and the authority.

I will give one illustration. One of the citizens before he came had been the leader of a desperate little band of devoted followers. After his arrival he waited a day or two before doing anything, and then commenced operations by throwing a potato across the table at dinner at the boy opposite. His expectation was that this trifling act would bring out from its hiding place the hated adult authority, which, judging from his previous experience, he felt sure must exist in every institution. He would be rated for his lack of discipline, and perhaps punished; but he would see in the eyes of his fellows their quiet look of admiration of his courage, and little by little he would gain ascendancy over them. Nothing of the sort happened. There was no display of adult authority—merely the cold disapproval of the

WHERE WOMEN COUNT

To the secret intrigues of women the world owes many of its great wars. There are European statesmen still living who attribute to the actions of three noble dames the Franco-German war of 1870. Two of these ladies were French women, the Countess de Castiglione and the Duchess de Litta, who enjoyed great power and fame in the days of the Tuileries.

The other woman was the wonderful Baroness de Kaula, who was employed by the German Government to move in the high places of the French capital. The Baroness was a most beautiful, captivating woman, and she resided as long as her country thought it necessary near the presidential palace at the Elysee, in Paris. She set herself out deliberately to win the admiration of the Minister of War, General de Cissy, and ere long had the satisfaction of receiving him at midday breakfast once a week.

So cleverly and thoroughly did the Baroness manipulate matters that the day of the breakfast was always that on which the French Cabinet councils were held. The General would go direct from the presidential palace to her home.

During these hours a couple of Prussian officers belonging to the headquarters staff at Berlin, and who were attached to Mme. de Kaula's household under the disguise of servants, managed to peruse the contents of the General's portfolio, which he invariably left on the hall table or in the saloon with his hat and gloves. Stenographic notes were made of the various documents contained therein, and in the same afternoon the German authorities in Berlin were aware of everything that had taken place at the most momentous conferences of the bitterly hated French.

For twenty-five years a Russian lady made a point of spending at least eight months of each year in London, in the interests of the Czar's Government. Mme. de Novikoff was the daughter of a general and the sister-in-law of the late Russian Ambassador in Vienna. In this case, however, the influence was exerted constantly on the side of peace.

Women, indeed, have played an active and successful part at the diplomatic headquarters of most European countries. With the exception of the United Kingdom, there is not a single European Power which does not maintain a highly paid corps of women diplomatic agents, in addition to its regular staff of ambassadors, envoys and attaches.

The celebrated Princess de Lieven was another lady with no pretensions to beauty. Her physical defects were obvious, and yet they did not prevent her from exerting an influence of almost incredible extent and predominance over the successive administrations of Great Britain during close upon thirty years. Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Lord Grey, Lord Aberdeen, and the Duke of Wellington in turn figured in the ranks of her most devoted admirers, and sought her advice both in and out of office.

boy-and-girl public opinion at a silly breach of manners and at the mess made which someone would have to clean up. Such a want of success was an unexpected disappointment, and it was not long before the spirit of the Commonwealth had gained in him a sturdy champion.

All too soon our visit drew to a close. Just before we left, most of the citizens came together, and my wife and I told them stories and answered their questions. Then Mr. Lane whisked us away to Sherborne in his motor-car, but not without a vow registered that we could come again very soon to renew the happy friendship we had made.

Mr. Lane, who is the manager of this community, says he has got those who had been regarded as the most helplessly incorrigible.

Now I must wish you all a merry Christmas.

With love, from

EGERIA.

GARDEN PARTY AT LOMAS

DELIGHTFUL SCENE AT QUINTA ANNANDALE.

Amongst the number of attractive Christmas festivities in aid of some deserving cause is one now being held at Mr. and Mrs. E. Crispin's Quinta "Annandale," at Banfield. Arranged under the auspices of the Ladies Aid Society of the Lomas M. E. Church the delightful grounds of "Annandale" were thrown open in the church's cause on Dec. when a Garden Party and open air concert were held.

Nothing could have been more attractive. Tiny coloured fairy lamps danced amongst the trees. Chinese lanterns swung here and there with an oriental twinkle. All kinds of attractions were dotted throughout the grounds. An aunt sally there, another game here, a beautifully stocked fancy stall, ping pong tables and a host of other attractive features were everywhere.

The gardens were a fairyland and even the momentary unkindness of the weather was insufficient to detract from success, the daintiness and the pleasure of it all.

Music was wafted from everywhere and throughout the grounds one could sit and enjoy delicious refreshments in cosy corners to the tunes of an excellent concert.

Mr. G. C. Crispin was responsible for the lighting effects in the grounds of the quinta and nothing could have been more attractively done, nor more artistically.

To see and enjoy these 1001 attractions—alas not 1001 nights—but only two!—costs only 50 cents and as the evening is to-night and as a promise of fine weather has been given, it behoves all to enjoy themselves and go to the Quinta "Annandale," Banfield. Little ones under 10 with parents are welcomed free and the special attraction provided for them is a monster Christmas tree and a pierrot entertainment. Outside the drawing room of the house, a stage has been built and "therein stands a multitude of good things."

The whole effect of the brightly lit gardens, the stalls, attractions, the music, refreshments and everything was perfection and only praise and thanks will be given to those who suggest to their friends a visit there to-night.

The Fancy Stall was in the capable hands of Mrs. P. H. Shepherd and Miss C. Burgis. The tea—with a capital T—in charge of Mrs. Fergus. While Miss Bloomfield was responsible for drinks and other luxuries.

During the evening of last night an open air concert was given.

Mrs. G. A. Bowditch sang with her usually daintiness and charm and she delighted all with "the sunshine of her smile." Miss E. E. Woodwell played the violin and highly pleasing were the strains, as they came penetrating to all corners of the gaily decorated garden.

Miss Recknell too, sang a delightful song. Everything was arranged splendidly, the choice of music suitable to the night and performances of each item pleasing. Mr. Bevan did not allow the boys when they came home to be forgotten nor did Mrs. Herald, in her best vein, forget to explain how "young Hokey enlisted" and to tell of "the two Huns."

Mr. Fairclough sang "The Storm King" very well. The accompanists Mr. Llewellyn Hawes and Mr. W. N. Crispin did their share, as they always do, to perfection.

It has proved a great success this garden party and as to-night has its great specialties of pierrots and Christmas trees and increased attractions, it is sure to double the success of last evening. Apart from supporting a worthy cause, there is enjoyment in every corner of the garden that should not be missed.

HAYDN'S "PASSION" MUSIC

RECITAL AT LOMAS M. E. CHURCH

Following a recital given in St. Andrew's Church of Haydn's "Passion" music, another was given on Dec. 18 at the Lomas M.E. Church, with certain necessitated change of programme and of soloists.

Amongst those of the audience who have a grasp of the playing of the organ, there was no doubt that Mr. Llewellyn Hawes excelled himself. The instrument at the Lomas church, while being a compact instrument, is small and lacking in a few essentials that those massive church instruments possess. It is in this particular that the organist shewed his control and mastery, for no one could have judged or even guessed that other than the most perfect instrument was played upon. Mr. W. H. Crispin was an invaluable assistant.

These matters, from an ordinary point of view, were unnoticed, and yet in them lay the whole success of the recital and its musical expression.

It was a performance, while excellent in its way, that did not impress, with the perfections of the St. Andrew's concerts.

The second part of the programme was composed of a very fine tenor solo from the Messiah by Mr. David T. Neil, and "O Divine Redeemer" by Mrs. Jessie Pamplin to the cello obligato of Mr. Davies, who also played the cello as a solo.

Lomas Church and Lomas weather do not suit Mrs. Pamplin. Good as she was, perfect in rendering, she has been heard to better advantage in larger halls.

Mr. Colquhoun concluded the vocal part of the programme with "God that madest Heaven and Earth." It must be said that the weather was completely against a soloist and indeed against any vocalist.

The efforts which Mr. Hawes expended in carrying through this ambitious programme only prove what real efforts can do. Many disappointments had to be contended against, and to be even able to produce Haydn's Passion deserves a special congratulation, even without a word concerning the excellence of the production.

The programme was as follows:—

Soloists: Miss E. W. Tyson (Soprano), Miss M. Tyson (Contralto), Mr. D. T. Neild (Tenor), and Mr. J. W. Colquhoun (Bass).

Chorus: The combined choirs of St. Andrew's Scotch Church and the Lomas Methodist Episcopal Church and friends.

Organ solo: "Hymn of Nuns," (Wély), Mr. J. Llewellyn Hawes.

Tenor solo: Recit., "The Rebuke Hath Broken his Heart"; Aria, "Behold and see if there be any Sorrow"; (Recit.), "He was cut off out of the land of the Living"; Aria, "But Thou didst not leave His Soul in Hell," Handel, (Messiah), Mr. David T. Neild.

Cello solo: a) "Andante Religioso," (Thomé); b) "Trauerlied," (Schuman), Mr. W. Davies.

Organ solo: "Andantino," (Lemaire), Mr. J. Llewellyn Hawes.

Contralto solo: "O Divine Redeemer," (Gounod), Mrs. Jessie Pamplin; cello obligato by Mr. W. Davies.

Bass solo: "God that Madest Heaven and Earth," (Sanderson), Mr. J. W. Colquhoun.

Organ solo: "Finlandia," (Sibelius), Mr. J. Llewellyn Hawes.

PROPOSED TRAMWAY EXTENSION

LACROZE COY.'S PROJECTS.

The Lacroze Tramway Company is considering the extension of its system in several directions, and among the lines projected are, continuation to San Isidro of the line which now reaches as far as Bartolomé Mitre. For the carrying out of this, there is first necessary the settlement of certain questions relative to crossing the F.C.C.A. lines. Another line is to go to the Avenida Buchardo, but its starting place is not determined; while a third is to run from the Plaza de Mayo to Belgrano, but by what route is not stated.

UNITED CLUB

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING.

The Annual General Meeting of the United Club was held on Dec. 20 at the Club's premises at Viamonte 666. Mr. Chevallier Boutell occupied the chair. There were some 28 members present and by proxy the total was raised to 38. The Secretary read the report of the Club's proceedings during the past year and this was unanimously adopted. After the accounts had been submitted, it was shewn that there was a balance of $46 in the Bank.

The meeting then proceeded to the consideration of a new committee and the elected members were:—Mr. F. H. Chevallier Boutell (President), Mr. Paul B. Chambers (Vice-President). Joint secretaries: Messrs. F. Wallis and W. H. Owen, while the new members of committee consisted of Messrs. A. Stuart Pennington, R. F. Burney Wall, J. C. Hart, A. Bowen, J. J. Jeffreys (all re-elected) and Mr. Stanley Herald.

After the necessary formal regulations of the meeting had been disposed of, discussion was invited as to whether member's interest in the Club was sufficient to justify a continuance thereof. Many opinions were expressed and the general opinion was in the affirmative. It was a question, as to whether there were enough "live" members or too many "dead" ones to justify a continuance. Such a discussion reflected on no particular persons, it was entirely a question of true interest in the real objects for which the Club was founded or of lack of this. Any suggestion as to being a dead body was protested against and those who recall the work of the United Club were foremost in protest. It was decided that the Club therefore should continue.

Mr. Chevallier Boutell in some remarks spoke of the Red Cross in the Argentine. It had been a hope of his that through the United Club the way would be shewn how really and conscientiously and systematically these things could be done. The President still looked forward to the Club leading in matters of such like interest, matters which to-day called for active effort.

Mr. W. H. Owen then brought forward the question of the continuance of the "United Club Bulletin." Should this go on or be suppressed? Mr. Burney Wall spoke strongly for its continuance and Mr. Ward later remarked that it was unfair that expenses for the publication should fall on the shoulders of the secretaries and requested more interest from the members. Mr. Owen pointed out that the "Bulletin" was self-supporting.

Some discussion followed and ultimately it was decided to continue this official organ of the Club.

Mr. Burney Wall spoke of having approached Mr. Laidlaw, of the Belgrano School, in respect to the use of the swimming baths, for the 15 or so members to whom this would be of benefit. At the moment, such was impossible, but on and after February 15 arrangements would be made towards this end.

The President drew attention to a club meeting next Monday, December 27, and requested an especially good attendance of members with their friends. As for himself he would be there with friends and if members followed his example a good meeting was assured.

The meeting was a "difficult" one. The Press were invited to suppress some details as being injurious to the Club's best interests but it was pointed out that nothing could be more to the interests of the Club than the full details.

Mr. Boutell in finally rising said he welcomed the fullest discussion, but that he longed to "sit upon" both sides and pointed out that members should have trust in their committee and it was proved by an unanimous show of hands, that the committee did have the confidence of the meeting.

QUILMES HIGH SCHOOL

Annual Prize Distribution

THE HEADMISTRESS'S REPORT

It was well that no less spacious venue than the Italian Hall of Quilmes had been selected for the Prize Distribution on Dec. 18 of the Quilmes High School for Girls, for assuredly it would have been necessary otherwise to hold overflow meetings, so large was the gathering. This was no doubt partly induced by the report that a portion of the programme was to be dramatic, and a great production. That report was amply substantiated. The Rev. G. H. Knight-Clarke presided, and Miss Ross's pupils, her friends, their friends and relatives, and the friends and friend's friends, filled the body of the Hall and congested the galleries. The Boy Scouts, now becoming powerful young men, were present as guards, scene shifters handy men and sounders of trumpets without. Among the many who had come from town was the Rev. Dr. Fleming, who like the consistent Scot he is, never grudges trouble when he can be useful.

The Rev. G. H. Knight-Clarke made a breezy and vigorous address, in which he humourously deprecated the fact that he, a mere Sassenach, presided on the platform with Ireland, Scotland and England. He held as to the state of the school, that when it did not fear such searching examinations the omens were of the best. Examinations kept schools in progress and in these and in the great quality or something of "playing the game," he exhorted the girls to join heartily.

In the course of her opening remarks, Miss Ross said that it was evident the standard of work as compared with former years was well maintained, and commented favourably on the Senior and Middle Forms, whose papers were of the same class as the Senior, Junior and Preliminary Cambridge Locals. In both a high percentage of passes with honours had been obtained. She also referred to the work in the various branches in all of which pupils had done well. In the examinations of the Alliance Francaise, three obtained the Brevet de Capacité, and she congratulated Miss Swyny on her success with music pupils. She also referred to the Sports in October, and the successful effort for the Red Cross made in July. Particular interest attaches to the report of various visits from the Inspectors of the Argentine Board of Education. The Head Inspector, Señor Vallegas, examined the school in August, and reported the Spanish work as quite satisfactory, fulfilling all the requirements of the Board. The Sub-Inspector, Señor Lanz, held a detailed examination of every child in the school in the end of October, and found that all the wishes of the Board had been satisfactorily carried out with regard to the Spanish curriculum.

Health had been good, and Dr. Pennington was thanked for his assistance. Miss Ross added that she took this opportunity of thanking Mrs. Dey, Miss Dey, Miss Swyny, Miss Cate, Miss Broughton, Dr. Mulcahy, Mr. Broughton, and Rev. G. H. Knight-Clarke for so kindly presenting prizes for competition among the pupils, also Dr. Fleming for so generously giving up an afternoon of his very precious time to come and present the prizes to the pupils. The Rev. Mr. Knight-Clarke for again presiding at this annual gathering, and the ladies and gentlemen present for coming here to show us their interest and their sympathy in the work.

The Rev. Dr. Fleming before distributing the prizes briefly referred to the general advantages of good education and the importance above of all, of schools turning out Godly and well trained pupils. The list of happy recipients of prizes is as follows:

Attendance Prizes.—J. Curtis, G. Brain, D. Logan, E. Logan.

After "Mi Bandera" had been sung by the choral class, nine athletic young ladies performed a formidable sort of Pyrrhic and Sword Dance with single sticks. The drama cast, etc., was as here follows:—

"Borrowed Clothes."—King Arnold of Steinwalle, Edith Logan; Queen Joanna, Mary MacLean; Rosalind (their daughter), Lily Innes; Olga (lady in waiting), Alice MacLean; Jester, Mary Jonsen; Baron Kurz, Eleanor Logan; Baron Achso, Kathleen Jonsen; Prince Eric of Oberwalden, Gladys Cribbes; Count Thorberg, Jeannie Campbell; George (a groom), Anita Innes; Amelia, Dora Lett; Three Witches: Evelyn Samson, Agatha Savage, Amy Cameron; Cat, Winnie Whyte; Fox, Alice Hessemuller; Owl, Lulu Jones; Shepherds and Shepherdesses: P. Scott, L. Lucas, G. Campbell, J. Locke, H. Cameron, G. Brain, W. Darch and E. Scott; Messenger, Katie Scott; Pages, E. Hessemuller and K. Dalrymple. Solo Dances: Gladys Cribbes, Alice Hessemuller, Marta del Campo and Mary Jonsen; Shepherds' Dance: D. Lett, J. Campbell, M. del Campo, L. Jones.

A. Innes, W. Whyte, M. Jonsen and L. Innes; Hornpipe: K. Scott, E. Lacabanne, E. Paterson, R. Lacabanne and K. Dalrymple; Dance Floreal: J. Campbell, Dora Lett and Anita Innes; Fan Dance: K. Scott, E. Lacabanne, R. Lacabanne and K. Dalrymple.

The Kingdom of Steinwalle seems to be situated to the N.E. of Ruritania and H.M. King Arnold was a gentleman of faith of a most royal presence and a portly. He was not henpecked and kept his long suffering Queen in great order. The inhabitants of this favoured land are singularly good looking, graceful and prepossessing. As to industries, dancing and sheep keeping seem to be principal with a decided preference for the former for a shepherd referred to "the silly old sheep" in a most unprofessional manner. No ovejás, capones or borregos appeared. It is not advisable to trace the plot, what there was of it but, it was in some respects a variant of the ballad of

"The squyer of low degree
Yt loved the king's daughter of Hongarie."

The moral was finally, marry in your own class. In addition to handsome Princes, bewitching shepherdesses a Princess and three amiable witches who certainly had no compact with Auld—! there were their familiars the owl, the cat and the fox, the tester and the scarecrow whose appalling and weird dance (brought about by the unholy spells of "the weird sisters") was a great feature. The dancing was "prodigious" and brought down the house in the Oriental Ballet, the Pas Seul by Mlle. Taglioni, Vestris del Campo, the shepherds dance, dance of the animals (which might have made Charles Lauri envious) and the great sailors hornpipe, magnificently given and three times encored; it was excellent in all for the budding A.B. aged (apparently) 6 to the seasoned salt who had sailed the salt seas since birth—ten years ago. Miss Swyny for the stage management and Miss Hammill for the dances, are to be warmly congratulated and the pleasure and enthusiasm expressed were quite spontaneous. When "God Save the King" ended "the Show" the audience filed out feeling that they had seen something worth looking at. And so they had.

LOMAS HIGH SCHOOL

CHRISTMAS PRIZE DISTRIBUTION

At the Lomas High School on Dec. 18 the annual prize distribution took place, an event which is looked forward to by every school boy and girl in the world.

Last night's function was no exception. Apart from a social evening—a gathering of proud parents—there was a distribution of prizes and diplomas and a very excellent concert given, with refreshments which suited and were gratefully received by every one.

The Lomas Municipality behaved badly, because just at the moment, that is the moment the rain was flooding the streets, they thought fit to take the pavement and road way up and make the same impassable for trams, coaches and nearly so for pedestrians.

Still a large number gathered at the school and a most pleasant evening was spent.

These opened with an introductory speech from M. Eugenio Beavais. He congratulated the school upon its success during the past twelve months and spoke highly of the work of the scholars. Some 200 persons were present when the diplomas were given away.

In the Infant class Alberto Ayliffe,

Ramon Maslera and Juan Strasson were successful. They had been under the care of Srta. Aguirre.

The first Preparatory class prize winners were Ovidio Bianchi, Virgilio Bianchi, Ernesto Nasquirz, Adolfo Ortiz, Ramon Meccio, Geraldo Garcia, Ismael Strasson, and R. Burton.

In the Higher grade the successful candidates were José Majarino, Julio Lalarme, Carlos Lalarme, Gracie Mastos, and Edith Ayliffe.

These classes were under the charge of Miss Lilian Burton.

The distribution was a function to which much applause was accorded.

Afterwards a concert took place and the brilliance of one or two of the small artists was amazing. "Don Teodoro" a small mite was a born humourist in his recitation.

Miss Woodwell was just as pleasing and as attractive as ever on her violin, but to particularise throughout the programme would be impossible.

A pianoforte duet, the National Argentine anthem was sung by all the pupils, "a criollo" recitation an appeal for poor workmen—all these were given amidst much enthusiasm.

Violin and piano duet, The Morning Dance. There's a girl wanted here and a boy wanted there, picturesquely translated into Spanish "Se necesita una niña aquí y un muchacho se necesita allá." A very fine piano solo and other recitations and songs.

The Director of the School, Sr. Ortiz, gave a closing address and away went parents and children full of the evening's events and the coming holiday.

BELGRANO GIRL'S SCHOOL

In spite of the tempestuous weather, a good attendance was present at the Italian Hall Moldes on Dec. 18 afternoon when the prizes of the Belgrano Girls' School (Miss Worrall) were distributed by the Rt. Rev. Bishop E. F. Every, D.D. There was an interesting programme of vocal and instrumental music.

VICTORIA SAILORS HOME

SATURDAY NIGHT'S CONCERT.

The concert held at the Victoria Sailors' Home, on Dec. 18 was a great success and one of the finest of the season.

It was given by the Nursing Staff of the British Hospital and in part in aid of the Edith Cavell Memorial Fund.

Mr. William Field addressed the audience in the interval in a suitable manner. The tableaux were beautifully arranged and every congratulation must be extended to the organisers. A special feature, if such is possible amongst a programme of special features, was Mr. Stanley Perkin's song "Keep the Home fires burning."

The real, rousing concert, a credit to all concerned was the result of the efforts of the Nursing Staff of the British Hospital last night. The programme was as follows:—

Part I.—Piano Solo, "Popular Airs" Sister Mary; Tableau and Song, "Britannia" and "Motherland," Mr. Stanley Parker; Song, "The lads in Navy blue," the Matron; Exhibitions of electric club swinging, Sister Dowling; Piano Solo, "Mazurka," Master D. R. Evans; Grand tableau, Florence Nightingale, "The Lady of the Lamp"; Collection for the Edith Cavell Memorial at the British Hospital. Interval for refreshments.

Part II.—Piano Solo, "Military March," Sister Mary; Song and Tableau, "Brave little Belgium," the Matron; Dance, Gavotte, and Tableau, the Nurses; Piano solo, "Polka Rusa," Master D. R. Evans; Song and Tableau, "Keep the home fires burning," Mr. Stanley Parker; Tableau, "The Red Cross," the Nurses.

THE TURF

PALERMO

Sunday's weather, as expected, turned out beautifully fine, but there was some surprise in store for racegoers to Palermo when the track was seen to be in very fine condition, and shewed no trace whatever of "heaviness." In fact one of the points of the meeting was the average of good and fast times.

Speaking generally the talent got badly hit, only two favourites turned up to help them and one of these Riome, was not backed so heavily by the general public as might be imagined from the fact that she came out favourite with 16,800 odd winning tickets on her. Actually, the public favourite was Passi-Mal. Riome was a tremendous "tip" and to be accurate, was one which was of the "superior" class of information. Riome has run six times and never been placed either before or after, coming out of the losers' class.

It was her fourth to Cortesia on Oct. 10 that led the knowing ones to expect her to win. She won all right, and was thus a sort of blessing in disguise.

There were a few surprises occasioned by the results, and no one on the course was more surprised than Arcuri, when he was beaten in the first event, but all in its proper place. It was the day of the last big classic of the season, all the entries, six of them, went to the post for this event, for which the Eccache "junta" were made favourite, and why this was so is incomprehensible. They are, both Melik and Mustafa, none too good over 2500 metres. Evoe was a much more logical favourite, even more logical than Picacero, from one point of view, but Evoe is not quite so good as he was six weeks ago, and perhaps the talent guessed this.

It was a fine race this Classic, and once more shews what a fine colt Picacero is. Except for sprints, he remains in our opinion, the best of the year, and we have often wondered where he would have been in some other races in which he did not figure prominently, if Mingo or Acosta had been, in the saddle.

We mention these two, and exclude Arcuri, because the latter is a fearful taskmaster to his mounts in a hard finish, and some horses funk this and run badly in consequence. In this race Evoe went away with a lead of 2 lengths before Bombazo, who was two lengths in front of Melik. Then came Picacero, Duc de Fleury and Mustafa last. About the mile post Mustafa ran up, passed the Duc de Fleury and Picacero, and a little further on Bombazo ran up close to Evoe. The order did not change until the straight was entered. Opposite the populars, Picacero closed up a little, but it was not until a distance from the winning post that Ardouin called upon his mount. Bombazo, by this time, had closed with Evoe, and the two were racing for all they were worth with the younger horse gradually gaining. Picacero, however, came along at a great pace and wore them both down, and ran in a winner by half a length, and incidentally with a bit more in hand. Only a head separated Evoe and Bombazo, who ran a gruelling finish. The Duc de Fleury came fourth, and the favourite comfortably last.

Picacero was exceedingly well ridden, and so was Bombazo, and the time 2.36 4/5, shewed that the winner does not of necessity need a slow race to use his finishing powers.

It was this consideration, that of making the pace a cracker, that was in Arcuri's mind when he took the lead. As Evoe is a strong runner from any position, it was expected he would crack the others up. It was a fine race and a fitting close to the season's classics, and Picacero's win was well deserved.

How Posadas lost the first event is not an easy thing to answer. He should have won, of that there is little doubt.

Perhaps it was the fact that he made the pace a tremendous one from the start, and wore himself out too much. He led easily, going at a tremendous pace, and it seemed that Arcuri had the race easily in hand. Chulo, whose successes at La Plata, made him "there or thereabouts" on the book, came along like a steam engine, and surprised Arcuri by beating him on the post by a half a head.

The event was just one of those surprises, which often happen, and in the nature of a fluke win. It was well deserved from one point of view. Barroso saw his chance and took it. Arcuri was too confident. There is no question that Posadas would knock spots off Chulo in 99 races out of a hundred, giving 10 kilos. Of course the event was spoiled by eight scratchings. The time 2.4 4/5, was tremendous.

In the second race, Halagueña (chanceless on the book), flattened out a field by an easy 1 1/2 lengths over Redencion and Old England. The latter made the running from Yerba Mota. Whether this was another case of change of jockey win is not easy to say. Muraña and Pedro Costa had previously held the reins of the winning filly. That the change from these to Navarro was expected to have some results, was shewn by the betting. 2550 winning tickets from a "book" or public point of view was sheer folly, and asking for trouble. The trouble came in the nature of a $20 dividend. What happened to Yerba Mota and Orene, no one knows. Arcuri and Mingo kept each other company, that's all.

Bataclan left the loser's class, by just winning the third event a neck from Bicarbonato with Dosel third, two lengths behind. The win was satisfactory from the G. P. point of view, as Bataclan was backed up to his eyebrows.

Bicarbonato ran as expected, a very good race.

Once more in the fourth event an eleventh hour change of 'prentices gave some indication that the Asteroide Stud were "on the job" with Tata Dios. With Juanico up he had but a poor chance, and no doubt, those who did not notice the change were kept off backing Tata Dios, who certainly had a chance.

How Desastre got third is a puzzle. He made the running from the immensely fancied—unjustifiably fancied—Campanazo. He was only beaten a short neck by Charlotte for second honours. Tata Dios won very easily and shewed he had still plenty of form left.

Gaitero was a complete and hopeless failure, and after his exceptional fine third last time out, he should have done better. $32,000 told their tale. The colt couldn't carry the weight.

After the classic the great surprise came in Riome's win from Salvadora and Passi-Mal. The second filly surprised nearly as much as Riome, because last time out she ran a shocking race. The winner in spite of being favourite, it can be remarked, has done nothing, and not even met the "class" of this event before. So that all one can say is that she has improved out of all running recognition. She provided Navarro with his second win.

Cochita ran poorly, but Canoa might be remembered when it comes to a 1400 metre race again. The race was not interesting, but the public were well enough pleased.

The seventh race went to the logical candidate Solicitud from Espartillar, albeit by only a short neck. Denna (after his suspension), ran a really beautiful race, and by really beating only, beat Espartillar on the post. Solicitud paid a nice price, and won in goodish time, 1.33 1/2 being occupied for the mile journey.

Juggling in jockeys marked the final event. Palo Errao — Acosta's mount, was scratched, and so some indication was given when he was seen out on Facundo II., who had no winning chance on the book. He made every inch of the running, and won easily by a length from Folleto, who was another length in front of Velasquez.

Folleto is an unlucky horse, but how lucky is the outsider in this last event!!! and what a lesson it does teach!

Thus ended the last of Palermo's interesting days this season.

We are to be surfeited with racing during the next few days.

Besides the usual meetings there will be a holiday meeting on Saturday. (Xmas Day), and another on New Year's Day, when the first race amongst the two-year-old will take place, and to which racegoers are looking forward.

It may be incidentally remarked that all the big races of the coming season, will shew considerably reduced prizes, even the National, but more of this in its proper place.

LA PLATA

A splendid day's racing was enjoyed from the shade of the eucalyptus trees at La Plata on Sunday afternoon. The track was heavy, but did not interfere in any way with the excellent sport.

With four winners and two seconds, the friends of the "Herald" felt sufficiently satisfied, and as dividends were good and reasonable, some cheerful backers hit them hard in the paddock.

The feature of the meeting was the number of easy wins. Anything like a stirring finish was only conspicuous by absence. Fox put up a fine performance in the Premio Smasher, and paid a good $7.50 "divvy."

CRICKET

BELGRANO v. BUENOS AIRES C.C.

Recollections of the break in the weather, a glance at the final scores of the cricket match played at Belgrano on Sunday between Belgrano and Buenos Aires, are both sufficient to show what a perfect bowling wicket was played upon.

It was an interesting match, and there was not overmuch to choose between the teams.

Belgrano had the luck, and perhaps this won them the match. Winning the toss they decided to put the visitors in first. Dorning and Curchod commenced the attack. The batsmen, Ayling and Brown, began cautiously on a tricky wicket. Nine runs were scored when Ayling was dismissed for four. Disasters continued. Sheridan was out to a brilliant catch by Trollope. Hooton followed, and with two boundary hits scored the second highest innings for his side.

The bowling was too accurate and tricky, Dorning being especially dangerous. Smyth, Goodfellow, and Hallet soon retired, the latter unluckily, and Hearne was unfortunate in not even opening his score. With Thomas in partnership with G. G. Brown, the excellent innings of the latter was brought to a close. Throughout he had played good and sound cricket, and his 32 was a splendid and invaluable effort.

The whole side were out for 72. Curchod and Dorning bowled unchanged, each capturing 5 wickets for 43 and 23 respectively.

After lunch the Belgrano commencement was equally, if not more disastrous than that of B. A.

Ratcliff was bowled with Brandon's first ball. Five runs later Magrane succumbed. Watson followed him to the pavilion next over. Dorning and Trollope came together, but the latter without scoring was clean bowled by Sheridan. Thus were four wickets down for 5 runs.

However, Holland on joining Dorning, commenced to stop the rot, and both of them played good cricket.

The score steadily mounted until 59 was registered, and at this score Holland was beaten for an invaluable 31. Curchod commenced well and steadily, but at 7 Goodfellow beat him, and again with the next ball bowled E. C. Griffen.

Dorning joined by Hanson scored the winning hit, but after the latter's departure, through an injury to his leg, only 5 more runs were added before all were out to a score of 89, which gave them a win by 17 runs.

The scores were:—

Greaven and Luck beat Wallace and French, 6-5, 4-6, 6-5.

This shows how even the play was, Marmol running out the winners by a very small margin as can be seen by the final results which were as follows:—

Marmol: 8 matches, 21 sets, 191 games.

BELGRANO II v. BUENOS AIRES II,

Owing to the sodden condition of the B. A. Ground at Palermo on Sunday, the above match did not take place.

LOMAS v. QUILMES.

An enjoyable match was played on Sunday when Quilmes entertained Lomas.

The wicket was in better condition than might have been expected, when Quilmes commenced batting.

Williams and Woodhouse faced Cowes and Brown, but the start was feeble, and three wickets fell for ten runs. A. P. Williams played a fine innings, and carried out his bat for a very useful 28. He was well enough supported by both Rowstron and Sinclair. The innings closed for 74, with Wilfrid Cowes (four for 26) the most successful bowler.

Lomas was not at full strength, but due to a fine innings of 41 by S. Burton, they ultimately claimed a comfortable victory with a score of 87 for seven wickets.

C. Sansone captured four wickets for 32.

BASEBALL

ARMOUR GIANTS v. F. A. CENTRAL

The baseball game between the Armour Giants and Frigorifico Argentino Central proved very much more interesting than the score would indicate.

The stroke that put the game on ice for the Giants was a mighty wallop from Wilson's bat in the third inning.

Some fireworks had already occurred in this inning before Wilson arrived on the scene. Galloway brought Stratton home with a clean hard drive through Short. Mason who ran for Galloway and Gottman, who had earned his way to first by a rap to third, were brought home by a healthy swing by Yehle. The stage was almost ready for the leading actor. The final touch was given by Gooley, who worked Phillips for a pass to first.

All the stations were now filled. Wilson picked his favourite bat, and took his position at the plate. The critical moment had arrived. The ambition of a batter is to come on the scene at a moment like this, and clean up those loaded bags, and likewise we might add that a pitcher's ambition in a situation of this kind is to strike the batter out. Phillips, the clever and gamey little Beaver pitcher, looked around to see if his fielders were in position before delivering the ball. Apparently he was satisfied, for without further hesitation he shot one of his swift balls across the plate. Wilson, who had his bat poised in the air at an angle, leaned on the bail, and the crash that resulted had the "Simon pure" ring of a real home run. At the crack of the bat, the runners started, and before the ball was returned to the diamond, four runners had crossed the plate. And one of the boards in the fence, at the extreme end of the field had acted as a bumper for the ball. During the last half of the fifth inning, a situation developed, which looked promising for the Beavers. Rehmyer got a pass. Herrod, who followed, hit through second, both runners advancing a peg. When Gooley failed to stop the ball, Noonan hit to Stratton, who failed to get his man at first. At this critical stage, Hitlin came to bat, was hit by a pitched ball, forcing in a run as the bases were choked. Tuthill, who followed Hitlin, put up a little pop fly, which Wilson failed to hold. As this was a pop fly to the infield, the batter under the conditions should have been called out, but there are moments when everybody seems to forget. What happened here was, instead of the batter being out, he got to first, and Herrod scored.

The position was becoming ticklish. Hayles came to the bat. Three men were on the bases; two runs had already been scored, and nobody out; Hayles is a big fellow, with a healthy swing, a dangerous man at any time, but at a time like this a particularly dangerous one, on account of his long hits. The Giants' battery, Lopez and Galloway, were right there in the crisis. Galloway knows what they don't like, and Lopez delivers the goods. They put the "Indian sign" on Hayes and retired him on strikes. Tuero came to the front with a neat bunt. Noonan, who was on third, sprinted for home, but was out at the plate. Lopez to Galloway. Lopez wiped the slate clean by striking out Houston. These two innings tell the true story of the Armour Giants' leadership, aggressive and crushing attack, and skilful defense.

The run of the play was as follows:

1st Inning.—Giants.

Gooley was retired on strikes. Wilson reached 1st on error by McEnelly. Stratton hit for 3 bases, scoring Wilson. Galloway hit to third, scoring Stratton. Gembs running for Galloway stole 2nd. Gottmann got a pass. Lopez reached 1st through an error at 3rd. Yehle hit to Rehmyer, who made a double play unassisted, a nice play which caused the Beavers to smile blissfully.

Beavers.

Houston hit a slow roller to Stratton, who threw low to first. Runner safe. Houston made 2nd on a passed ball. Galloway made a nice catch of McEnelly's high foul. Rehmyer hit by a pitched ball, Herrod hit to Gembs' garden, scoring Houston. Noonan was hit by a pitched ball, Hitlin hit to Stratton, who threw Rehmyer out at the plate. Tuthill hit to Gooley, who threw him out at 1st. Score end of first; Giants 3 Beavers 1.

2nd Inning.—Giants.

Gembs hit to McEnelly, who threw him out at first; Mason was hit by a pitched ball. Gasley singled over short, Mason was tagged out at 2, and Gooley, trying for third, when Wilson hit to Hayes, was touched out. Good work by Noonan, Hayes and Houston in this inning. No runs.

Beavers.

Hayes was hit by a pitched ball, and Phillips struck out. Hayes stole, Houston made a beautiful home run drive, scoring Hayes, and received a good hand from the spectators. McEnelly struck out. Rehmyer singled stole 2nd, 3rd. Lopez, the Giants' pitcher, showed a little irritation at this stage, on account of the umpire's work, but came back with a smile, and forced Herrod to fly to Gembs for the third out. 2 runs.

3rd Inning.

The Giants' efforts in this inning have already been described.

The Beavers, for their part, were busy, but produced no results. Noonan hit to Stratton, who threw to Gottman for the out. Hitlin struck out. Tuthill doubled, and stole; Hayes was retired gracefully; Wilson to Gottman. No runs.

4th Inning.—Giants.

Tuero now pitching for the Beavers, Gottman singled to centre. Lopez flied to Noonan. Yehle forced Gottman at 2nd. McEnelly to Noonan. Gembs hit to Tuero, who threw him out at first. Nice work. No runs.

Beavers.

Tuero out trying to bunt himself to 1st. Lopez making the catch. Gottman took care of Houston, and Galloway disposed of McEnelly by making a neat catch of his high foul. No runs.

5th Inning.—Giants.

Mason struck out. Gooley was robbed of a hit by Hitlin, who made a beautiful running catch off his shoe tops, falling after the catch, but holding the ball. Wilson's beauty for two bags was lost, when Stratton struck out. No runs.

The Beavers' part has already been described.

6th Inning. Giants.

Galloway was hit by a pitched ball, Stratton running for him, stole 2nd. Gottman was hit also; Lopez hit through short, scoring Stratton. Yehle struck out; Gembs brought Gottman and Lopez home with a rugged drive to right. Mason hit to 2nd, and Gembs tallied. Herrod dropping the ball after tagging him. Gooley hit to Houston, who threw him out at first. 4 runs.

6th Inning.—Beavers.

McEnelley hit to Stratton, who made a nice throw to 1st, getting his man. Rehmyer flied to Mason. Hitlin walked and stole 2nd and 3rd. Noonan hit hard to Wilson, but Wilson was there with a nice stop, and also a nice peg to Gottman for the third out. No runs.

7th Inning.

Stratton struck out. Galloway was hit by a pitched ball. Gottman hit a screamer to left for 2 bags. Lopez was a victim to Tuero. Yehle came to the front, reached down, and picking one of Tuero's nice low ones inches from the ground, planted it back of 2nd, scoring Gottman and Gambs. 2 runs.

Beavers.

Hitlin flied to Gembs. Tuthil out to Gottman unassisted, Hayes walked and stole; Tuero flied to Gottman. No runs.

8th Inning.

Mason flied to Hitlin, who made another good catch. After a session of knocking fouts, Gooley walked. Wilson hit to Tuero, who threw him out at first. Stratton hit to the same spot, and was retired in the same way. No runs.

Beavers.

Houston quickly reached 1st, when Gembs lost his bearings on his fly. A little later Houston running strongly to third, collided with Stratton. Time was called, and after a few minutes Stratton was back on the job. Houston scored on a passed ball, Herrod got to first by grace. Noonan flied to Gottman. Hitlin popped to Lopez. 1 run.

9th.—Giants.

Galloway singled to centre, Wilson running for him, stole 2nd. Gottman hit to Houston, who threw him out at first. Wilson scoring, when Rehmyer threw wild to third. Lopez and Yehle both struck out.

9th Inning.—Beavers.

Tuthil singled. Hayes struck out. Tuero out at first, Lopez to Gottman, Houston flied to Gottman, who dropped the ball. Tuthil scoring. Decisions close. McEnelley struck out.

Final score:—

Giants	17
Beavers	7

Mr. Bliss has a splendid team in the Beavers, and when they strike their stride, they will keep the other teams hustling all the time to hold their own. The game of baseball is a very strenuous game, and calls for so much from a player that he must be in good physical condition to cope with its requirements. Some players when not in fine form, show a tendency to "crab" at decisions, but this is a tendency that disappears as the players get back to sound physical condition.

FOOTBALL

KIMBERLEY v. RACING.

As the result of the last match of Kimberley's season, their position in the First Division of the League is lost.

Racing beat them by 4 goals to nothing at Villa Urquiza on Sunday.

Kimberley played well, but were completely outclassed.

The referee, Señor Luis Gil, lined up the following teams:

Racing.—S. Arduino; S. Presta and A. Reyes; A. Betular, F. Olazar and A. Pepe; Z. Canavery, Marcovecchio, A. Ohaco, J. Hospital and J. A. Perinetti.

Kimberley.—Morando, Florentino and Oyhamburu; Aguirre, Badaracco and Spigardi; Boide, Conch. Pezutti, Georgetti and Perez.

The scorers were Ohaco, Betular in combination with Ohaco, Canaveri, by a very fine individual effort, and in the second half, just before the close, Perinetti.

PRINCE OF TRAMPS

Harry Franck's Four Years' Tour

MAN OF MANY OCCUPATIONS ARRIVES HOME

Many people in the Argentine will remember Harry Franck—prince of tramps, novelist, Consular employee, Canal Zone policeman and a hundred other things. Franck was down here for three months during the early part of 1914, and, in addition to travelling over all parts of the Republic, he was for a large portion of the time, translator and clerk at the U.S. Consulate General in Buenos Aires. He has now arrived home, after a four years' tour through Central and South America. During that time he has walked 5,000 miles and slept in 571 different places. The record of his trip is contained in the following letter which Harry Franck has addressed to THE HERALD:—

"I hope to publish portions of the narrative of the journey just ended, in magazine form during the summer and autumn of 1916 and to have the entire account issued in book form in the spring of 1917, probably by the same house which has published my former ramblings. Although you know a certain portion of it, let me bring myself up to date by a brief resume of the entire journey in question.

"I left Milwaukee, Wis., on September 13, 1911, worked in railroad and labour gangs in Illinois, Oklahoma and Texas, and crossed the Mexican border on October 7. Train and afoot to Guanajuato, where I spent twenty days as a car-boss in one of the principal gold and silver mines for the purpose of studying the mine peon. After covering the State of Michoacan and other portions of Mexico on foot, I spent some time in Mexico City. Zapata's marauders made inadvisable my planned walk from the capital to Tehuantepec. Proceeding there by train, I walked into Guatemala, covered a considerable portion of that country by train, and descending near the frontier of Honduras, walked entirely across that country via Tegucigalpa, the capital, to the port of Amapala, and sailed for Panama. Sighting Salvador and touching at Nicaragua and Costa Rica, I landed at Panama on January 21, 1912, with the intention of sailing two days later for South America. Canal Zone life looked so interesting, however, that entirely out of personal curiosity I took and held for five months a position as Canal Zone policeman.

"On January 18, 1912, I sailed from Colon to Cartagena, Colombia, with Leo Hays, an American and until then corporal of police on the Zone. We ascended the Magdalena river by boat and to Bogota by train. Setting out from that city on August 1, we walked by way of the Quindio pass and the Cauca valley to Quito, Ecuador, a distance of 844 miles. There I remained four months to write up my experiences on the Canal Zone, while Hays continued his trip alone.

"On February 8, 1913, I walked out of Quito and down the crest of the Andes through Ecuador and Northern Peru to Cajamarca, and from there on in the same fashion, following always as near as possible the ancient Quito-Cuzco highway of the Incas, through all the principal towns among the high ranges, avoiding always any approach to the well-travelled coast. This portion of the journey was made under the difficulties of a bad attack of amoebic dysentery combined with fever, and after spending ten days in the native hospital of Caraz, it was only finally on June 22 that I reached Cerro de Pasco and entered the American mining hospital. Failing of cure there also, I descended to Lima and, falling in with good people, was at length able to continue my journey at the end of August.

"Ascending to Morococha and Huanacayo by rail, I walked across to Cuzco, 400 miles. After visiting the remarkable ruins of Machu Picchu and others of that region, I took train to Arequipa, returned to cover Lake Titicaca by steamer and afoot, and on to La Paz. By train and on foot to Cochabamba from which city I walked 800 miles across the Chaco of Bolivia to the Paraguay river, reaching there on February 14, 1914. Descending that stream to Asunción, I covered the length of Paraguay by rail and part of the width by a line under construction. Entering the Argentine far up in the Territory of Misiones, I descended by rail and river steamer to Buenos Aires. There I found the American Consul-General to be an old friend, and became for some three months consular assistant and translator and interpreter in charge of the "outside work" in the city of Buenos Aires and vicinity. By rail I visited all the cities of size in the Argentine, going as far south as the Rio Negro on the 41st parallel in northern Patagonia, and as far north as the sugar-fields of Tucuman. Walking over the crest of the Andes and down into Chili, I visited the length and breadth of the fertile part of that country, again reaching the 41st parallel south near Puerto Montt.

"Returning to Buenos Aires, I crossed to Montevideo and visited all parts of Uruguay by rail, spent some days in one of her great estancias, and crossing into Brazil at Rivera on July 1, 1914, continued by rail to Sao Paulo and Rio Janeiro, with stops at all cities, colonies and points of interest. I was on the point of embarking for the United States from Rio when the European war stopped temporarily all shipping. At this juncture I was offered by Mr. R. A. Linton, a fellow-Michigander with the South American concession for Edison's newly invented "Kinetophone" or "Talking Moving Pictures," the position of advance agent and manager for the tour of Brazil. With two assistants I covered every one of the twenty States of Brazil I had not already visited, playing in 49 different theatres and spending nine months in constant and intimate contact with all classes of Brazilians. In journeying in February, 1915, from Victoria to Bahia on this tour, I took to the sea for the first time since entering South America at Cartagena in June, 1912, although later I covered several other states north of Bahia again by land. On May 1, 1915, having turned the "Kinetophone" over to the one surviving assistant, I ascended the Amazon by river steamer, touching at some 20 ports, and landed at Manaus. From that city I continued by launch on May 20 up the Rio Branco towards the frontier of British Guiana, rode horseback to the boundary, walked and waded the 50 miles of flooded and uninhabited pampa which separates the Brazilian and Guianese river systems, and taking a dug-out and Indian paddlers, descended the cataract-bristling Rupununi and Essequibo rivers for two weeks, arriving in Georgetown 34 days after leaving Manaus. I visited French Guiana, covered much of Dutch Guiana and returned along the coast, partly on foot, to Georgetown. I then ascended, via Trinidad, the Orinoco to the city of Ciudad Bolivar, tramped two weeks across the blazing desert and rock-hills that separate the Orinoco from the Atlantic, rolled four days in a native fishing smack to La Guayra, ascended for ten days in Caracas, the last South American capital, and sailed via Curacao and Puerto Rico on the last day of August, reaching Milwaukee four years to an hour from the time of my departure.

"During the 1461-days' journey I slept in 571 different spots, or in other words moved on an average once in every 2½ days. It was not always cheaper than paying rent. Besides most of Mexico and Central America, I visited every country and colony in South America, and the majority of the States and Provinces of each country. Leaving entirely out of account innumerable side-trips and city explorations, I seem roughly to have walked some 5000 miles, while the distance covered by other means of locomotion is beyond my arithmetic. I have returned from the journey in fully as good health, physically, mentally and, I trust, morally, as when I set out, and seem to have suffered only one misfortune, serious and incurable; that of being four years older than the day I started.

GAS EXPLOSION

At Barracas Works

EMPLOYEES KILLED AND INJURED

Four men were killed in an explosion which occurred at the Barracas works of the Cia. Primitiva de Gas, shortly before 7 a.m. on Dec. 18.

When the first excitement and shock of the explosion was over, it was found that the centre of the occurrence was in the purifying tanks.

A huge shed some 210 yards in length contain these and they are built in two classes, some underground and some elevated about 5 feet from the earth. A purifying tank consists of a metal structure into which gas passes and filters through layers of fine earth, separated by wooden girds at intervals of 2 feet or so, the gas then passes onwards to other mechanical structures and into the storage tanks with which everyone is familiar.

In the purifying tanks and around and about, men are at work, and if the imagination grasps the fact that these tanks are built of $\frac{3}{4}$ inch iron plates each one some 8 feet square, it can be guessed at that an explosion in one of them would be a serious matter. In the case of yesterday's explosion this was so. Some 12 men were at work around the purifier almost at the end of the long series of these in the shed. The effect was terrible. Seven of the men were injured, not so much by the explosion as by the massive iron structures falling upon them.

A full ten minutes after the explosion occurred the fire brigade stationed within 200 yards of the works arrived upon the scene, and officers with note books and "bomberos" with fire and water commenced work. It was apparently necessary to "fire up" on some of the brigade machines.

To be accurate, there was no fire caused by the explosion, there was nothing to catch fire in the iron and brick built structure, and thus the brigade soon had full control of the flames. During this period, employees were working amongst the wreckage and rescuing the injured.

Mr. David Angus, son of the manager of the works, assisted in rescuing three of these which he found in a shocking and absolutely unrecognisable condition. Burnt with the explosion, their skin peeled off at a touch, injured by fallen structures, and unconscious with the effect of the gas. The labour was distressing. One man was blown clean through a hole made in the roof and discovered outside the shed by Mr. Angus. This was named Manuel Arias; he was not seriously injured.

The actual effect of the explosion in damage to the works was not great. A section of the purifying works was completely destroyed, the roof blown to smithereens, even at a distance of many yards the plates of other tanks were found to be cracked and leaking. One of the large storage cylinders suddenly collapsed. The force of the explosion had buckled some top plates and the gas escaped. This cylinder was on a level with the compressor house just opposite, also with the metric house and out of these the windows had been blown. Broken glass was everywhere in the streets 200 and 300 yards away.

The most remarkable thing was that the wall, a brick one some 15 inches in thickness, which was actually front of the structure of the shed immediately in vicinity of the tank that had exploded, had not collapsed. There was not even the sign of a crack. That the force of the explosion passed that way can be estimated from the fact that the woman Arias was blown through the roof in that direction.

The injured men were taken to the Argerich and Rawson hospitals. Since admittance this morning four of them have succumbed: Carlos Conti, the head man, 35, a bachelor; Gena-ro Gabriel, 40 married; Ricardo Valarino, 22, bachelor; and Tomás Rinzar, married.

José de Jorge and Manuel Arias are badly injured but their condition is satisfactory.

One peculiar and sad case is that of Gabriel who leaves a widow and 7 children. He only obtained work in the Gas Company the day before the explosion. His working number was 13.

The damage is fully covered by insurance and the determination of the Company, above the legal rights of the men, to pay for and do all possible for the injured and those dependent upon them is a praiseworthy one.

Until a careful examination has been made no absolutely definite cause of the explosion can be stated. The electric switchboard points to a short circuit, and this is the most probable cause.

"The great concern of the company is the loss of life," said Mr. Angus, junr., in an interview with a HERALD representative yesterday. "The damage is comparatively slight, but it is impossible not to feel very deeply for the victims of such an accident."

THE GAS EXPLOSION: PARTIAL DESTRUCTION OF PURIFYING SHED.

Through the open space in the centre of the building a man was hurled by the force of the explosion.

MUSEO SOCIAL ARGENTINO

"TEA" AT 126 MAIPU.

The Museo Social Argentino issued invitations on Dec. 17 for a "Tea" at their Centre, 126 Maipu, to a number of notabilities to meet Dr. Naon, Dr. Avellaneda, and Mr. Henry E. Alexander, at 5.30.

At that hour the premises were comfortably filled, but company did not cease to arrive, and the premises became somewhat congested. At about 6.10 a move was made upstairs, where those who were not connected with the Press were enabled to hear a brief address of welcome made by Dr. Frers to Dr. Marco Avellaneda, as Minister to Spain, to Mr. Alexander as representative of the Carnegie Foundation, for Dr. Naon did not arrive, being probably occupied with preparations to depart to Chile.

"Tea" appears usually to signify champagne, and in fact some bottles were visible in the background, and some glasses were heard to fall. The admirable practice pursued by Mrs. Leo Hunter (of "The Den" Eatanswill) at her famous dejeuners, appears to be very generally pursued on these occasions, and the Press was rigorously kept in its place. Among those present who had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Avellaneda's reply of thanks were: Mr. Frederic Stimson, American Ambassador, Dr. Gramajo, Municipal Intendente; Mr. John Zimmermann, and Mr. Ralph Hunting, together with the principal members of the Museo Social Argentino.

TRUTH ABOUT THE PAMPA

Not Detained by the Descartes

NONE OF THE CREW ARRESTED

New York, Dec. 20.

The statements that have been circulated respecting the detention of the Argentine transport Pampa are incorrect. According to the commander of the vessel, what happened was as follows:—

Before reaching Porto Rico, the Pampa was sighted by the French cruiser Descartes which tried to get into wireless communication with the transport. The attempt, however, failed owing to the weather, and the Pampa then stopped until she was boarded by a French officer.

On finding that the ship was an Argentine transport, the officer apologized, and after a brief conversation withdrew. No one of the crew was taken prisoner.

PROVINCIAL GOVERNORS

Senores Ugarte and Rojas

VIGOROUSLY CRITICISED

In the National Radical Committee there have lately been heard (says "La Razon") severe comments on the high-handed methods recently observed by the Governors of Buenos Aires and San Juan, who have laid aside all pretence and vestige of scruple in advancing their political interests and packing their Committees instead of, as they should do, acting in their high function with prudence and discretion, and displaying impartiality in their office.

They are the only Governors in the whole country who pretend personally to dispose of the electoral destinies of their provinces. One of them talks of his "Forty Electors" as if he were referring to articles of private property, and the other excludes all the most intimate and prominent members of San Juan political parties from his Councils as if they did not exist, and had no will but his.

Doctor Rojas speaks and acts as if Committees did not exist in San Juan, nor parties nor public either, who should be considered; his wishes and his will are, he considers, sufficient, and override all other wishes, wills and opinions in the great Province of Cuyo.

Judging by his acts, the great Ugarte has adopted the phrase and attitude of Louis Quatorze, "L'état c'est moi." As a fact, he has personally actually treated for, accepted or refused business of all kinds in the name of a State of 2,000,000 inhabitants as if all the life, energy, riches and importance of this great province were subordinate to his mandate as the Grand Elector.

Actually it is said that these matters will come up for discussion in the next sessions, and that steps will be taken to prevent Governors returning (should they wish it) to the methods of the ancien régime and "the good old times."

PUERTO MILITAR FIRE

SUMMARY BEING DRAWN UP.

Since the fire at Puerto Militar there have been great heart searchings and huntings for plausible excuses, scapegoats and all those other extremely useful conveniences which those responsible for a disaster instinctively look for. It is quite likely, too, that they will really be wanted, as the Marine Juez de Instruccion has gone to Puerto Militar and is delving into the antecedents of the fire, wanting to know all about short-circuit possibilities, defective and broken hose, odd hose couplings, and many other things which really, now that the fire is over, should be allowed to sleep in oblivion. Unfortunately for somebody, the functionary thinks not so, and there are rumours that the losses of the blaze really do, as stated by indiscreet newspaper men, considerably exceed a million, and that the Minister of Marine's modest estimate is perhaps about 25 per cent. of the actual. The public also are enquiring why it is that the galleons and property generally of the navy should be so inflammable and so confoundedly unlucky? No doubt, the Minister of the Navy will inform them.

"THAT SAT IN DARKNESS"

TROUBLE BREWING AT S. ANTONIO DE ARECO.

San Antonio de Areco is collectively very wroth for its electric light service, a commodity to which it has grown accustomed, has been suppressed and its local authorities (nice vague term) are the cause of it.

The light has in fact been cut off in the most vulgar and prosaic manner for the most prosaic reason: the Municipality were not paying promptly, although the public seem to think they have, or have had, the money destined for that purpose. Now the consumers want to know why the money, or at least some of it, has not been paid, and why they must be so-journers in the Land of Shadow; also, and this is rude, what has been done with the money? Such insolence is not to be borne, and it is therefore not surprising to hear that "some members of the official party" have threatened the audacious complainants with their most severe displeasure. This has given rise to mutual feelings of rancour, and it would not be surprising if another of those little affairs (like that of Trenque Lauquen) which are infinitely amusing to those who do not live in the affected locality, should occur. It would certainly seem that the "official" element requires a brief definition of who is who, as at present they seem to hold that not uncommon opinion that those whom the public pay are the masters of that public.

Agricultural & Pastoral

Camp Notes

(By our Agricultural Editor.)

The heavy rains of the last few days will be undoubtedly welcome in the drier districts of this Republic, though on many of the strong heavy lands, where harvest operations are in progress work will be retarded, and possibly to a certain extent the crop will be damaged, should such unfavourable harvest weather continue. A friend of mine who is in charge of a large and important establishment, said that he was not going to buy his binder "twine" till the day before he intended commencing cutting the crop, as so many eventualities might arise and the crop might be so seriously damaged in a few minutes as to render it valueless. Such an unforeseen occurrence as a hail storm would thrash the crop so thoroughly that there would be no further need for cutting or threshing. These hail storms are generally confined to certain defined areas, within which nothing escapes while the limit of the storm is as clearly marked in a big grain field as a road cut with the binder.

Cattle values are reported to have been maintained during the week, while more animation was also noticeable in the sheep market. Pigs were in stronger demand and all good quality suitable weight of animals were well enquired for and realised higher prices. Some sales were reported at 38 cents a kilo.

The auction sales of pedigree stock during the past week have principally been confined to the sale of sheep, for which the demand seems to have slackened very considerably. The big good quality rams imported by Mr. Miller did not meet the demand their seller was entitled to expect. Mr. Joseph Shepherd sold a few sheep during the week at an average of $600, though at auction bidding was easier than formerly and this gentleman decided to retain his animals at Palermo Chico, where he expects to realise to better advantage by private treaty. The excessive heat within the auction yards also causes grave concern to owners of sheep in long-wool which during the recent warm afternoons were simply "gasping," and appeared to be nearly suffocated by the heat. To sell the animals to better advantage they are not yet shorn of their extra heavy fleeces of long wool.

The many friends of Mr. Donald MacLennan, the veteran importer, will be glad to hear that his condition has very much improved. It is with sincere regret that his friends will learn of Mr. MacLennan's serious illness and all will hope that his condition will soon be beyond all danger and his strength regained so far as to permit of his visiting this country during the coming season. This familiar figure at the Show and classic sale of the season was much missed this year.

Señor Diego MacCorquodale from estancia La Pastisal. Puerto Piramides, península Valdez, arrived in the city last week, having come from Puerto Madryn by the s.s. Madrid to Bahia Blanca and thence by rail to Buenos Aires. Mr. MacCorquodale has large freehold and leasehold landed interests in the peninsula, and goes in extensively for breeding Lincoln sheep and Clydesdale horses. For a number of years he has bought nothing but imported pedigree sires for his flocks and herds, and his stock are now regarded as the finest in that part of the Republic.

Last week the s.s. Terence, carried 65 very good quality heavy horses for Mr. E. M. Alexander. Included in this consignment were a number of exceptionally good type of mares, which are destined for farm work in Scotland, and should prove an acquisition to any part of the world. Big extra strong and active animals, they ought to find favour with agriculturists in Scotland, as you will not see a bunch like them together every day. It is to be hoped they will reach their destination in safety and fulfil the high expectations which have been formed of them by experts here.

SPRAYING PUMPS.

Several camp readers have lately inquired where such appliances can be obtained. Like many more articles they can be secured in most stores and in different qualities. I had the pleasure the other day of witnessing a trial of the "Four Oaks," which to my mind were most highly finished, soundly constructed and appeared to be adaptable for the various uses to which camp men have frequently to apply the sprayer. By unscrewing one nozzle another can be replaced better adapted for the use of thick liquid or lime, with a simple needle arrangement which ensures the nozzle being kept open under all conditions. The class of pump adapted for fixing to the side of any ordinary bucket is very handy for treating animals when it is necessary that they should be sprayed under the belly or as a preventive against attacks from flies or insects. The larger models mounted on two wheels are most suitable for spraying galpones, limewashing walls, or for diverse uses in the garden. The "Four Oaks" sprayers are sold by Messrs. Philip and Carruthers, Cangallo 456, where those in need of such handy appliances should enquire.

THE CROPS.

The past week has been remarkable for the very high temperatures which have prevailed over all of the cereal region of the Republic. This heat wave has been succeeded by heavy rains which were almost torrential in certain districts. Rain was general on 14th and 15th in the centre and the south of Buenos Aires, the Pampa Territory, south Cordoba, San Luis, and Mendoza, and on 16th it had become extensive to Entre Rios, Santa Fé and north Cordoba. The fall was particularly heavy in the Bahia Blanca zone. Some slight local storm damage is reported in parts, including hail damage, but on the whole the benefits have more than counteracted any isolated prejudice. Harvesting is rapidly becoming general, of wheat as well as oats and linseed. Reports of yields continue to be very glowing, although in some districts the drought appears to have caused damage which subsequent copious rains were too late to neutralize. Threshing has commenced in several districts. The young locust hoppers are appearing in force in the north, and although it seems that the defence measures of the authorities and the farmers themselves are fairly energetic, some shrinkage is inevitable from this cause. Briefly and generally, wheat, oats and linseed harvesting is in progress under extremely favourable auspices: yields are good. Maize plantations luxurious: locust danger not negligible.—"Review of the River Plate."

CATAMARCA FLOODS

HEAVY LOSS OF LIFE.

Information received yesterday, although still somewhat scanty, gives account of the work, in progress around Catamarca, in the Department of Andalgalá, of recovering numberless bodies of persons who perished in the sudden floods which occurred on Saturday.

Already over 20 bodies have been recovered, and in the latest reports mention is made of the fact that the mortality is high on account of the fact that most of the population were caught by the floods when asleep. The sudden rise occurred at 2 a.m., and came without warning.

Besides the drowned, there are a number of wounded. Fifteen of these have already undergone some treatment.

The plantations are ruined and the vines for the most part completely washed out.

There are still some 300 men at work day and night removing property from the houses, recovering the dead, and in such like distressing tasks.

Some 20 persons are still missing, and many of those recovered, owing to mutilation by animals, are scarcely recognisable. Hundreds of persons have lost their homes, and misery reigns supreme.

The Executive is doing what is possible to give help in the matter and have ordered the authorities of the department of Andalgalá to relieve the distress to the best of their ability.

A local committee of ladies and gentlemen are also doing everything possible in collecting money, clothes, and in giving food to those in need.

political developments may have in store for them, what promises, at the moment, to be a bumper harvest, is upon us, says the "Review." This fact, coupled with the already marked scarcity of shipping tonnage on this route—a scarcity which there is reason to suppose may become still more accentuated as time goes on—affords food for anxious thought to those who have the welfare of the country at heart. It is notorious and elementary that Argentina loses millions annually owing to the lack of adequate storage capacity for her grain between the time of threshing and the time of shipping. In addition to the Government elevator scheme, which involves expense to the Nation, another has been presented which offers to assume the expense and the risk in return for what is relatively speaking a paltry Government guarantee on debentures. A fraction of the time consumed in futile political debates or in egregious dissertations on questions of international law would have sufficed for the consideration of one or both of these schemes and the several other similar propositions received, to the great benefit of the country. In the meantime, stop gap and half-way measures (which are certainly better than none at all) have to be adopted, and the Minister of Agriculture has this week arranged with the Port Authorities of Buenos Aires for the habilitation of four large warehouses at the Port, to be followed soon it is understood, by others. This arrangement is feasible in the present circumstances owing to the unprecedented falling off in imports which results in a number of warehouses designed for their accommodation being available as temporary granaries.

The Garden and Orchard

HINTS TO AMATEURS.

(By "The Rustic.")

Garden.—The work to be done in the garden during the current month consists in keeping it clean of weeds, hoeing the beds lightly to loosen the earth, digging up all bulbs of plants which have finished flowering such as tulips, hyacinths, gladiolus, amunculus, etc., provided their leaves have withered or dried up, and storing them away for next season. Transplant to their definite place those plants from the nurseries which are sufficiently developed. Sow: Stock, wallflowers, althea, poppies, anemones, asthers, amaranthus, balsamine, convolvulus, nasturtium, gypsophila, lobelia, pelargonium, pithrum, primulus, margherites, mignonette, violets, etc.

Orchard.—At present the most important cares of the orchard are to see that the trees get sufficient water. The weeds should be kept down and where the ground was not harrowed or ploughed up during the month of November, this should be done now. The thinning of fruit should also be continued and terminated as soon as possible. As some peaches are very nearly ripe and the end of the month will see the commencement of the fruit harvest, it is obvious that fruit thinning should be terminated not later than this date. The object of thinning being to distribute the sap and force among a few selected fruits, instead of a large number, this distribution must take effect at an early period of the formation of the fruit.

Plagues and Insects.—The destruction of "bicho quemador," as well as "bicho del cesto" which are the prevalent plagues should be continued.

General Notes.—We referred some time ago to the possibility of preserving the fruit produced by small orchards, and thus laying in a store of fresh fruit for the winter at a low cost. Quantities of fruit are lost every year in small orchards, as no application is found for it. By a very simple process large quantities of fruit of various kinds, and vegetables such as tomatoes, French beans, cucumbers, etc., can be turned into preserves. The process consists in Pasteurization and all that is required are a few tins or glass jars, a soldering iron, a thermometer, a fruit peeler and a large tin or iron vessel, besides the ingredients to preserve the fruit or vegetables, which consist of water and sugar or salt as the case may be.

For preserving peaches for instance, these should be first peeled and stoned, and after being washed in fresh water, should be placed in the tins. If the tins are one kilo ones, they will hold between three and six peaches, according to size. Then the tin is filled to within half-an-inch of the lid, and should cover the peaches in the tin with the syrup previously prepared. Once the lid is placed in position and well soldered round so that it is absolutely airtight, the tins are placed in the vessel with sufficient water to reach right up to the top without covering the lids. The lids should be perforated in the centre by a hole, the size of a pin's head. An open tin containing preferably peaches in syrup should be placed in the middle of the vessel for the purpose of taking the temperature. The vessel is then placed on the fire and allowed to heat up gradually. It may boil, but it is not advisable to have too strong a fire going. Constant readings should be taken with the thermometer and once this marks between 60 and 70 degrees Centigrade, the fire can be reduced if necessary, and the temperature kept by regulating the fire, as constantly as possible between the temperatures above mentioned for one hour. Once the hour is up the vessel containing the tins should be removed from the fire and at once the small pin holes soldered up. The tins should not be removed until the contents have cooled down, and for this purpose can be left in the vessel overnight. Once cooled they are ready to store away, but should be revised to see that none of them leak. To do this they should be placed upside down on a paper, having been previously dried, and it will soon be seen whether they leak or not. If this is the case the contents are useless for preservation, and the most practical thing is to transfer them to a new tin, and do the whole operation over again.

If using patent glass jars with metal lids and rubber bands, the lids should be loosely screwed on when the jars are placed in the pasteurising vessel, and tightened well up once the operation is finished. If using glass jars, the pasteurising vessel should have a false bottom of wood laths or perforated tin to keep the jars from direct contact with the bottom of the vessel, and prevent them from breaking or cracking.

Only pure solder should be used for soldering the tins, as mixtures with lead produce very poisonous salts when they come in contact with the acids of the fruit.

Of course only sound fruit or vegetables should be tinned and should not be too ripe. The fruit should be gathered in the early morning and not after a rain and should be handled carefully. The more care is taken, the more successful the canner will be. We cannot give all particulars here in detail, owing to want of space, but will be very pleased to give further details to our correspondents, as regards the way to make the syrup or salt solutions, their classification, the classes of fruit and vegetables, more successful for canning, and also as to the cost of the different implements required and where these may be purchased in this city, etc., etc.

We have seen grape juice, which is such a healthy and agreeable beverage, preserved in this simple manner and taken for use on board ship, and peaches, pears, etc., have been kept for years most successfully. Tomatoes can be preserved whole or as sauce. French beans, asparagus, cauliflowers and many other vegetables will stand a long conservation.

BANKS AND THE HARVEST

FACILITIES TO AGRICULTURALISTS.

Banking establishments in the Capital have lately determined to do everything in their power to assist agriculturalists over the coming cereal harvest. Large sums of money have been set aside and allocated to this purpose. Now the Banco de La Nacion is arranging a complete list of available "galpones" throughout the Republic.

They are requesting information from all provincial places concerning these galpones, both at the ports and at the various railway stations, and in time intend to publish a detailed list for the benefit of producers.

The Exchange in Rosario is the first body to send a complete list of storage places in that city, to the Banco de La Nacion.

The action of the Bank is not only being taken with a view to this list, but also with a view to constructing other galpones in such localities, as may be found to be in need of them, or where those at present existing are found to be deficient.

SUGAR STOCKS

Reports of sugar stocks have now taken another turn. An authority is declared to have computed that the amount of sugar over and above that necessary for immediate demands and consumption, reached not less 50,000 tons as of the 200,000 tons in sight, internal requirements will certainly not take more than 150,000 tons and exportation is said to be at present almost non-existent. There is however reported to be an alarming shortage of sugar in Russia although in both France and Britain there is no deficiency of the comestible.

ENVIRONMENT AND HEREDITY

The individual characteristics of an animal depend on two things, heredity and environment. Neither one can be dispensed with, and each plays a very important role in the growth and development of the animal. It is questionable as to which is the more important; without one the other is of no value. J. H. S. Johnstone recently stated: "The longer I live the more I think of environment and the less of heredity." The hereditary characteristics must be present in the newly born, but no matter how valuable they are, if care and feed are not supplied in sufficient amounts to develop these inherent qualities to the fullest extent their possible value is never known. The qualities which an animal inherits are largely beyond our control, it seems. The successful breeder studies his herd and crosses the male and female which in his mind will produce the nearest to the ideal type. Undoubtedly the individuality of animals is greatly improved by such methods, but many times accidental matings from which man did not expect to get much have produced outstanding individuals seldom equalled. All breeders recollect at some time seeing the resultant progeny of an intended well mated cross fall far below the standard of either parent. On the other hand, crosses which would normally be expected to produce inferior animals occasionally bring forth an outstanding individual.

IMPORTANCE OF EARLY CARE.

The environment of an individual almost entirely depends on the work of man. In this direction the greatest results may be accomplished. A scrub may be a scrub because its ancestors were, or it may be a poor animal owing to a lack of feed. Scrubs are fast giving place to first class individuals. In a large part this is due to heredity, but indirectly and behind all are factors of feed, care and selection. The possibility of proper selection must depend wholly on feed and care, because without the required nutriment in sufficient amounts the animals cannot develop those desirable inherited characters so that they can be observed and considered in making the selection. The theory has been advanced that a beef calf fed on skim milk and never allowed to get fat will in a large degree lose the fattening proclivity and develop into an animal of greater dairy possibilities. Although it is hardly probable that the lack of feed and the maintaining of the animal in other than a beef condition would improve the milking possibilities, it certainly would not develop its inherent beef qualities. Thus, if one is to determine the inherent or natural ability of the animal to make beef, pork, or whatever it may be, he must give the individual environment in which it will make the best growth and development. The breeder who selects his breeding herd of cows from a bunch of heifers in poor condition

HARVESTING THE CROPS

F.C.C.A. CIRCULARS.

The Ferrocarril Central Argentino has rendered a valuable service to agriculturists and the country generally by issuing for general information, "Practical Instructions for Harvesting Cereals," an authoritative publication by the District Agronomist, Señor Hugo Miatello.

The railway company has had these instructions printed in card form, and the notices are being prominently displayed at all the stations along the line so that agriculturists may familiarise themselves with the best methods of handling the crop. It is hoped that the harvest this year will be taken off with less wastage and damage than hitherto, and the Company is to be complimented on its efforts to further this very desirable object.

ATTACK ON THE RAILWAYS

ATTITUDE OF THE NATIVE PRESS.

Echoes are still occasionally being heard of the increase in the railway freights and a few spasmodic kicks being given against the railway companies, who have seen fit—no doubt through necessity—to increase these.

Last evening it was pointed out in a contemporary that since July of the year, the increase of the takings of the various railways were as follows:—

The Southern Railway	£40,800 sterling
Bs. As. and Pacific	£304,000
Central Argentine	£237,000
Western Railway	$1,866,350 mln
Central Cordoba	£142,629
Rosario	$208,500 mln

It is suggested that these increases show that there has been no need for the 10 per cent. increase, and it must have been that the President of the Republic was in a good humour when he consented to accept the advice of the Minister of Public Works.

does not know their relative possibilities for quick fattening and early maturing, qualities which will be desired in their calves. In almost all classes of live stock the breeders of to-day are endeavouring to increase the size, at the same time maintaining the standard of quality and finish. Breeders and feeders of beef cattle have long realised the value of keeping the calf-fat on the young steer. The calf that loses this fat in the first two or three weeks of its life eats many extra pounds of grain and milk before it regains and equals its more fortunate brother, and even then it is doubtful whether its carcass is equal to the choicely marbled meat of the other.—"Breeder's Gazette."

BAHIA BLANCA NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

December 19.

The San Melito.

This oil tanker, the largest afloat, arrived here last Monday at noon with some 16 thousand tons of crude oil on board from Mexico, and shortly afterwards went alongside the wharf at Port Galvan into number 9 berth. She commenced discharging at 1.30 p.m. pumping the oil direct from the ship, with the ship's engines, into the receiving tanks on shore and working on right through she finished discharging some 6065 tons by 5.30 a.m. on the following morning, leaving again at midday for Buenos Aires. This vessel still bears marks of the damage done to her by a German submarine on her way out from England, but she seems very little worse for it in spite of the fact that the submarine shelled her for considerable time and fired four torpedoes at her.

Collections for the Blue Cross.

A collection has recently been made here for the Blue Cross Fund, which is in aid of sick and wounded horses in warfare. The list has been in the hands of Mr. James Hilton and the contributions have been duly forwarded to the British Society in Buenos Aires by Mr. Hilton, to be sent to England.

Municipal Notes.

On account of several complaints made to the Intendente here by the committee in charge of the parks and plazas, it has been decided not to allow the holding of political and social meetings such as have lately been held so often in the Plaza Rivadavia and Pellegrini, and to restrict them to the Plaza 9 de Julio, which is situated between Chiclana and Brown near the Southern Station, and that of 26 de Junio in Villa Mitre. The reason of this is that people who wish to go for a walk in the principal plazas are prevented from doing so by the large crowds of workmen there who together with the unemployed do considerable damage to the plants and trees. No notice is taken at all of the watchmen, who are mostly very old men. In response to the repeated petitions from the residents in the streets behind the Victoria Market, in the park known on the plan of the town as Quinta 78, it has finally been decided to make use of the power conferred on the Municipality in 1908 and name the three streets running parallel to Calles Teniente Ferias, General Pinero, Coronel Granada and Tierra del Fuego. It is also proposed shortly to name the streets now without any name or distinction in Villas Barrio Federal and Bella Vista. Names to those streets are badly needed now to facilitate the delivery of correspondence, etc.

Heavy Rainstorm.

On Tuesday evening last, after a very hot and oppressive day, the rain commenced to fall in torrents here, and shortly after the streets near the Southern station were impassable as they were all under water. The storm, which lasted only 45 minutes, was preceded by a violent wind which did considerable damage. It is stated that as much as 70 millimetres fell here, and a lot of damage was done to the telephone service outside in several places.

Aviator's Second Visit.

The aviator Sr. Cattaneo, who was down here some few months ago, is now making a second visit to Bahia Blanca. After making a series of visits to different places in the Pampa, and leaving Macachin where he is at present, he will go to Guaminí, and from there fly to Bahia Blanca. On the 1st of next month he will give an exhibition at the Race Course of "looping the loop," "falls" and various other attractions. His machine is a Gnome of 50 H.P.

Christmas Week.

Special service will be held here next Saturday (Christmas Day) as well as in the Port, where Holy Communion will also be administered in the morning. The Salvation Army are giving a free dinner to the poor on Christmas Eve at 7 p.m., and a children's entertainment at 8.30 on the same evening. On the Tuesday following, there will be a lantern lecture, and on the 31st special service starting at 11 p.m., and on January 2 a dinner will be given at 3 p.m. to the poor children in Ingeniero White.

Items in Brief.

Arrangements are now being made for the electric light and lamps being placed in the Municipal Park during the summer months, and some 22 arc lamps are to be put in the Central Avenue there.

Notice has recently been issued to the public asking them to examine the papers authorizing the collectors and inspectors of the municipality in their duties as it has been reported that several attempts have been made to collect taxes, etc. by unauthorized individuals.

The Agricultural College here is now open again for any pupils who wish to undergo a course of study there this coming season. The Secretary's Office will be open to receive applications up to February 15.

Sres. Cambor and Criado have recently made a donation to the Patronata de la Infancia here of the sum of $260.

Whilst attempting to lasso a young horse in Villa Harding Green recently, a man named C. Acosta got entangled in the lasso and was dragged off his horse, suffered serious injuries, and was shortly afterwards conveyed to the Municipal Hospital.

The municipal inspectors are now becoming active again and recently they have visited 53 lodging houses, and 62 dairies, and they are now proposing to make a general inspection of the fondas and restaurants in the town in order to ascertain if these are in proper sanitary condition.

On Wednesday last a dinner was served at Port Militar to 1400 conscripts who had finished their terms of service and were being liberated again, being conveyed to Buenos Aires by special train.

A committee of five members has been appointed by the Municipality to study the general regulations and taxes for the coming year, after which these will be submitted to the provincial government for approbation. On account of this being the busy time, when there are such a large number of labouring men about, it has been deemed advisable to increase the running of the tram service. Since last Friday it has been doubled.

District Notes.

A sale of live stock is taking place in Villa Borden on Dec. 29, 3,000 head of cattle and 10,000 sheep will be put up to auction.

The cutting of oats has already started in the various parts of the district. In the Tres Arroyos district this work can be seen all along the line and in some parts a few days ago the threshing had already been begun although it was badly interrupted by the rainstorm of last Tuesday which delayed the work for two days everywhere.

Authorisation has been given to Sr. J. Steja by the Provincial Hydraulic Department to utilise the waters of the Quequen Salada, in Coronel Dorrego for motive power.

The residents in the Russian Colony near General Acha are not petitioning the National Educational Committee for the reopening of the school there which has now been closed since last year, especially that there are not now more than fifty children living in the district who would be able to attend it.

At a recent cattle sale held in Santa Rosa the following prices were obtained:—steers $130 and $112, cows $95, heifers $115, wethers $12, and ewes $13.50.

In Coronel Pringles the firm of Ford and Co. have opened their office for the buying of cereals. They were offering $5.10 for oats last week and

HOW IT MAY BE DONE

The River Plate Submarine

UNDERSEAS CRAFT ON THE RIACHUELO

BY A NEUTRAL ENGINEER.

(On more than one occasion during the last twelve months, the possibility of the local Germans constructing a submarine for use off the mouth of the River Plate has been discussed. Some experts have denied that such a feat can be performed; on the other hand, an expert engineer of neutral nationality believes it to be possible. He explains his views in the form of a sketch which he designates "a River Plate fiction." We publish it below).

When the Germans first published photographs of old cylindrical boilers on a railway truck and designated them submarines in sections under way to some secret yard, little notice was taken by the professional man. He knew that the technical difficulties in the way of such a work being performed prohibited even an attempt in that direction. But the Germans have many clever University men who have devised other plans for the secret transport of submarines in sections, and the educated engineer knows quite well the many little details of this class of naval field work. Take, for instance, its application locally.

Now nobody would be surprised at seeing two old masts, with all stays hanging, projecting over the surface of a shallow stream such as the Riachuelo. Nor would the passers-by be particularly disturbed if one day a train consisting of a tug-boat and two barges, flying neutral flags, approached the peaceful spot selected. The boats would be even carrying the traditional little watch-dogs pacing the tarpaulin covered holds; and no one would really take any notice of the inhabitants of the little wooden-deck-house, with its smoking chimney stack, except those people who observed one barge was of the "junk" type without any bows, and the other similar to any old sailing ship hull with straight bow and a long projecting stern.

On the day following the arrival of these craft, the passer-by might notice that the straight-bowed barge had $9 for wheat put on board at Bahia Blanca.

The Southern Railway have notified the Minister of Public Works that by the end of this month the irrigation works contracted for on the Rio Negro and Neuquen will be terminated. These works have cost the sum of £300,000, and to complete the projected plan it will be necessary to spend a further sum of £200,000, but it has not yet been decided what steps will be taken in the matter.

The Rural Society of Rio Colorado will hold their 18th show on Dec. 30 and 31 and on January 1.

Notice has been given to the general direction of National Territories by the Governor of Rio Negro of the arrest of the post master of Bariloche, who escaped with a considerable sum of money belonging to the office. He was arrested whilst attempting to go aboard a ship in Punta Arenas.

The National Commission of Roads have decided to repair the road leading to the station of Rocha near to Olavarria as far as San Jorge, a distance of 15 leagues, at the cost of $39,249. At the same time they will make a bridge over the Tapalque stream on the road between Altona and Azul at a cost of $20,000.

disappeared—but only just below the surface of the river; and a casual glance might convey the impression that the scene represented a salvage tug and a pontoon engaged in the task of re-floating the "ship" to which the projecting masts belonged. Later, however the tide is falling and evidently the "pontoon" ("junk" type barge) is to be anchored for the night, because the people on board have made a sort of mooring with the good solid steel stays of the masts, broadside on, and the tugboat is making rapidly for the place at which interned German ships—with German sailors on board—are lying.

Another change is revealed on the following day. The ebb tide has capsized the "junk" barge, because the steel stays had been hauled, overnight, around the bottom of the craft. Apparently however it is quite steady, bottom-up, and anchors are out fore and aft. The crew are out in a dinghy which does not contain—as you might think—a motor, but really a diver's pump. Various things are observable in the shallow water, which is again rising. Between "booms" made of steel tubes is a big skip of steel—an American engineer would call it a drag-bucket—with nicely rounded corners and a properly movable bottom on hinges, watertight and fitted with flanges and bushings.

That same night there is enormous activity on the "salvage works" and the capsized hull of the "junk" type is carefully hauled directly on top of the straight-bowed barge which had sunk in the shallow water on the first day. As the water runs out, a diver is busy inside between the two hulls—now one on top of the other. He is making the railings fit and two or three smart boys, with a cork belt floating at their side, are busy getting in drifts through the holes in the former deck-railings—which are now a couple of long fish-plates linking together the upper and lower hulls.

For six or seven days nobody thinks of these two barges, and yet from inside a small motor pump has been carefully removed to the divers' barge and has been employed to make a nice dry workshop of the interior of the now-cigar-shaped hull, formed by the two craft. In this workshop ten or twelve good "schlossers"—or German mechanics—are fitting up a set of two modern Koerting motors, tanks and joining pipes. Outside, the lonely dinghy is fishing-up the "booms" which seem to fit admirably as stern tubes; and the diver actually takes a couple of the "moorings" up. These are found to be trim brass propellers which fit to the end of the stern tubes. The huge drag-bucket is saved for a smart conning tower and the flanges seem to have been made for the fitting of a couple of four-inch telescope pipe of the class which we term periscopes. Rubber packing is securing watertightness of hatches, and on the nose of the "junk"-shaped bottom are a couple of chutes making it look like a boa-constrictor. Inside is a thing similar to that which you may have noticed on the deck of any tramp steamer which carries a spare propeller—a "nut" for the propeller shaft. Shaped as it is, it may be the war-head of a 16" Whitehead torpedo.

Shortly afterwards the "schlossers" receive extra good oil which will enable them to keep going at 18 knots on the surface and 14 knots below it for a period of three weeks. The tugboat loads-up an extraordinarily large quantity of a sheep-dip—which can, in emergency, be used for motor propulsion; this is taken to a point on the desolate coast beyond the river.

The dinghy brings bedding and stores, purchased in the town near by; paint is applied to the strange craft; and exactly ten days after the tug with its strange train arrived the U 71, submerged, is stealing down river on its commerce-raiding mission. Will this happen? Who knows? Still, watch the Riachuelo!

Five men then lost their lives. No doubt the work will be more closely inspected when the construction is again under way.

Mr. Percy Baxter, of General Paz, formerly proprietor of a general sporting goods store in Calle 24 de Setiembre and who later joined the staff of the Singer Sewing Machine Company, is shortly leaving town for Santa Fe, where he will take over the management of the Singer Sewing Machine Company's agency.

Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Dunbar and family left town on the night train on Saturday for Buenos Aires. It is expected that Mrs. Dunbar will be away from Cordoba during the hot weather.

The Chaplain and Church Council wish to thank all those who by contributions of gifts or money and their personal assistance made the recent sale of work such a success. The debt on the Church Hall has been decreased by some $650.

A letter has been received here from R. T. Brindley Hicks (formerly with the Galena Oil Company in this section of Argentina) from England, where he is with the Officers' Training Corps and expects shortly to leave for the front.

Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Struthers and baby are leaving town to-morrow for Buenos Aires, where they will take passage on the next "D" boat sailing for England.

Mr. Arthur Hughes, of Barrio Inglés, is anticipating spending Christmas at La Cumbre, where he owns a large estancia.

The debut of the Perdiguero-Fernandez company at Cordoba Park on Saturday night was attended by a large number of theatre-goers.

DAY BY DAY IN ROSARIO.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Dec. 21.

The English Nursery Home, San Martin 474, rendered great service to the Scotch community last week, it being there that Mr. Aird received prompt medical assistance and careful nursing on the occasion of his sudden and dangerous illness.

The British Ladies' Committee of Rosario, acting in collaboration with the French Ladies ("Association des Dames Françaises de Rosario") are organising a Children's Fête for Christmas Day, in the premises situated at the corner of Boulevard Oroño and Calle Montevideo. For children, the entrance fee will be 0.30 centavos. This entrance fee will be inclusive, as far as the children are concerned. Without other charge, each child will receive entertainment, refreshments, and a present from the Christmas tree. The entrance fee for adults will be $1. The only other charge will be 0.50 cts. for tea. It is hoped this fête will be supported by all. The profits will be devoted to war orphans, i.e., the children of British, French and Belgian soldiers and sailors who have been killed on active service. Any contributions, in money or toys, will be gratefully received by members of the Committee, to whose town addresses they can be sent, or to Mrs. Spencer Dickson, Calle Urquiza No. 1222. A detachment of Boy Scouts under Mr. Parry will assist.

BRITISH VICE-CONSUL AT CONCORDIA

A REPLY TO CORRESPONDENTS.

With regard to the controversy which has arisen between the Concordia correspondent of THE HERALD and another correspondent, adopting the nom-de-plume of "Gabriel," on the question of the British vice-Consul at Concordia, the following facts have been brought to the notice of THE HERALD:—

In June 1913, when the late Mr. Herbert Robinson went to England, Mr. T. B. Morley was asked by the British Minister to act as Vice-Consul, assisted by Mr. S. W. Roberts. The appointment was approved by the Argentine Government on September 26, 1913. In the beginning of 1914 Mr. Robinson resigned the post of Vice-Consul for Concordia, and in February the Foreign Office closed the Vice-Consulate. Mr. Morley was therefore acting-Vice Consul from June, 1913, till the closing of the Vice-Consulate, and during that period was assisted by Mr. Roberts. Our regular correspondent is therefore quite right in his facts.

THE RETIREMENT OF SIR JOHN FRENCH

FRIDAY, December 17, 1915.

When in the midst of a great war one of the most prominent of the military leaders is suddenly retired from his command of a huge army, the news of the change naturally gives rise to a lot of speculation as to real causes. This is so in the case of the retirement of Field Marshal Sir John French from the supreme command of the biggest army Britain has ever put in the field. Officially it is announced that Sir John has, apparently of his own volition, relinquished command because of ill-health engendered by overwork and strain. This explanation is in itself quite good and would be all sufficient did we not recognise that the retirement of the Commander-in-Chief of the British forces coincides with many other drastic changes and highly important developments, of which we shall speak later on. The need of the moment is to deal with the official explanation, and to pay due homage to a great soldier, and a man whom the British Nation has justifiably held in the highest esteem and confidence.

It can readily be understood that the reason given for the retirement of Sir John French is obviously one that might well be urged, and indeed we do not say it is not strictly correct. From the moment he landed in France with the small expeditionary force which Britain hurriedly despatched to the aid of her ally, Sir John has filled a post of enormous responsibility, and has had such experiences that might very well have broken down even a much hardier and robust soldier than he is believed to be. The handling of his force during the retreat from Mons was in itself a severe test of any leader's mental and physical strength. Since then, however, he has been engaged night and day in the fulfilment of a task which we do not believe has ever fallen to the lot of any other commander in history.

Quite apart from the incessant and stubborn fighting, alternating from regular trench warfare, to violent and sanguinary attacks and counter-attacks, such as those of Neuve Chapelle, Festubert, and Loos, the British commander has had to face the perpetual strain of assimilating new forces into his command, of developing new resources, and changing tactics with every variation in the progress of the fighting. In a few words Sir John French has been in fierce action under the most nerve-racking and exhausting conditions for eighteen months, and even if he has not broken down, which would be surprising, he is well entitled to ask to be relieved of the fearful strain imposed upon him. Even if neither of these things has happened, it might well be considered by the Government that wisdom dictated the necessity of taking that strain off his shoulders, for he has been tried too severely. And in any case, and under any circumstances, Sir John French deserves the heartfelt thanks of his country, for the brilliant and loyal service he has rendered her. He has enjoyed the unbounded confidence of the Nation, and we have yet to learn that he has not proved entirely worthy of it.

Quite apart from the reasons for the Commander-in-Chief's retirement which we have discussed, there are, however, considerations which make it possible that these reasons are not solely responsible for the important change which has taken place. They are considerations which do not necessarily reflect either upon Sir John's leadership or his military capacity, though they may have an important bearing on the fortunes of the Allies. It has long been recognised that there has been a difficulty in coordinating the operations of the British and French forces, and in one or two general actions this deficiency has been apparent to the military critics. The fault was not that of Sir John French, but rather that of the circumstances in which he was placed. It was the old story of divided control. His command was independent of that of Marshal Joffre, and obviously with a mixed force fighting on the same ground nothing but the most rigid and undivided single control was desirable.

To achieve the most effective coordination and the necessary control, is, we believe, the main purpose of the new Grand War Council of whose formation we were advised recently. This body met in Paris scarcely more than a week ago, and it was understood that its first decision was to give Marshal Joffre supreme control of the strategic plans of the Allies. Under that decision we may be assured that the retention of Sir John French, now placed in a subordinate position, was not desirable, and if for no other reason the British Government would have been justified in retiring him, especially if there was any reason to feel that there was the least possible danger of any friction. To appoint Sir Douglas Haig in his place is perfectly consistent, because the latter holds military rank considerably below that of Sir John and Marshal Joffre, and he now has what may fairly be described, without disparagement to him or the British Nation, as only a sectional command under the French generalissimo.

If there be other reasons than those we have mentioned for the retirement of Sir John—doubtless many will be put forward as time passes—and they are substantial enough to have necessitated the Field-Marshal's compulsory retirement, then, while we may deeply regret them for the brilliant soldier's own sake, we are glad to feel that the British Government has had the courage to act upon them. As we have so frequently said before, in this war so much is at stake that nothing must be permitted to stand in the way of the National interests, or in those of the Allies collectively. No matter who the man may be, whether soldier, minister, politician, or public servant of any kind, not his interests but solely those of the great cause should be considered. If Sir John French has failed, or if he has broken down, it is right that he should be put aside at once. Neither record, nor reputation can or should be considered. The sole test of everything and everybody should be "Is it best, for the Nation that this should stand, or that he should hold this post?" If the negative answer be given, the necessary change must be made. We hope and believe that personally Sir John French has stood this test, so far as his work has gone, but if not, then undoubtedly the Government has done its duty in retiring him.

AUSTRIA, AMERICA AND THE ANCONA

SATURDAY, December 18, 1915.

We have before us the unofficial summary of the Austrian reply to the vigorous note of the United States Government concerning the case of the Italian ship Ancona, sunk by an Austrian submarine in atrocious circumstances. Possibly this unofficial resumé of Austria's reply may not be strictly accurate, but we are inclined to accept it as conveying a faithful impression of the contents and tone of the actual document which should very shortly be in the hands of the Cabinet at Washington. In one striking direction it bears the impress of truth, and that is because it obviously reproduces the tone and tenor of the notes which passed from Germany to America over the sinking of the Lusitania, and as we said, when discussing the matter previously, there can be no doubt that the handling of the question will be left to Germany.

The reply is characterised by the same chicanery and shiftiness which were so apparent in the Lusitania notes, and which irritated and offended every straight-dealing, honest-minded American citizen. Instead of Austria, or Germany, meeting the American note frankly, she has started to twist and wriggle, and to impose upon the protesting nation the obligation to answer a lot of questions which have really nothing to do with the case. Already some of the North American newspapers have pointed out that the reply is not a reply at all, but is merely an attempt to fence adroitly with the whole question, and we shall be very much surprised if the American press as a whole does not demand that the Government shall, on this occasion, refuse to be trifled with. This policy of begging the question, in parliamentary phraseology "talking the question out," succeeded fairly well in the case of the Lusitania, and finally Germany left the whole matter "up in the air," not deigning, after the lapse of a considerable period of fruitless argument, to take any further notice of the United States.

This policy is again being tried, and it will be interesting to observe with what success, from the Teutonic point of view. We cannot believe that the United States will tamely submit to a line of treatment upon a serious question, that is at once offensive and casuistic in the worst sense of that word. It has to be remembered that the American Government has not forgotten that it was snubbed and fooled over the Lusitania case, nor that Mr. Bryan is no longer in a powerful position to check the Government's determination to enforce due respect from other governments. Mr. Lansing is responsible for the note to Austria, and he is too sound an international lawyer and statesman to have drawn up a document embracing strong language and equally emphatic demands, without having first been absolutely certain of his facts and of his law. Possibly the note did not give Austria all the information she now claims she must possess before she can answer, but unless Mr. Lansing has belied his great reputation and has blundered like a novice in diplomacy, the United States stands on ground from which she cannot be driven by argument.

The original note certainly did not divulge all the information upon which the Washington Government based its demands, but it stated quite clearly that the facts were too well substantiated to leave any doubt that a wicked and wanton crime had been committed, and for which redress must be given without any waste of time in prolonged argument. Previous experience had evidently taught Mr. Lansing and his colleagues that it was not wise policy to mar good decisions with a multiplicity of reasons, each permitting the springing up of counter argument. The Government investigated the case, ascertained the facts, and did what it had the right to do, presented its decisions on those facts to Austria with a demand for a straight answer. Austria replies by shuffling, and incidentally has put her own finger on the strength of America's attitude by describing it as "unusual." It is unusual, but also it is sound. Austria wants to be able to pick the note carefully to pieces, and spend many weeks in futile and wearying discussion, the belief evidently existing in her mind that the Americans will lose all interest in the question after a time, and that the outrage to American ideas of civilization will be forgotten. If the people and the press of the United States permit themselves or their Government to forget that an unequivocal demand has been made on Austria, or to allow Austria to talk the case out of court, then we shall feel that indeed the former high standard of national dignity for which the United States has ever been noted, has been departed from.

THE THREAT AGAINST EGYPT

SUNDAY, December 19, 1915.

It was only on Wednesday last, when discussing the disappointing result of the Balkans campaign, that we called attention to the grave danger of an attack on Egypt, and asked what steps were being taken to face this new and most serious of all problems from a British point of view. A number of circumstances combined give some sort of an answer. The most satisfactory of all, strangely enough, first emanated from German sources, when we were told that British forces were engaged with feverish haste in the construction of seven lines of trenches designed to check the threatened attack on the Suez Canal, and that troops to the number of over a quarter of a million were in the danger zone. We were quite prepared to accept the news of the appointment of General Smith-Dorrien to command in East Africa to mean that this skilful soldier would really be placed in charge of the whole operations in the new theatre of war, and this it has transpired is actually the case.

That Germany does seriously contemplate an invasion of Egypt and the destruction of the Suez Canal there can be no doubt, and at any rate it would be sheer madness on the part of the British Government and the Nation generally to disregard the warning given. We should think that enough mischief has already been done by treating lightly such warnings. The British attitude, and the British official mind, have been seriously at fault through adhering to a false conviction that Germany has shot her bolt. The Balkans campaign was a striking instance of this. A month or two ago, despite well authenticated evidence that Germany really intended to link up with Constantinople, it was generally considered utterly impossible for her to make good her boast. We ourselves could hardly believe that her task would have been so easy, because we found great difficulty in imagining that Britain and her Allies would neglect any opportunity to checkmate the Teutonic move.

By most students of the war it was then recognised that if Germany once established free communication through the Balkans with Constantinople, tinople, she would almost certainly essay a blow at Egypt, and the possibility of serious trouble not only there, but in India would be turned into a grave probability. Those who now think that the danger is merely a figment of over-alarmed imaginations, must surely be oblivious to everything. We have already heard of "skirmishes" on the eastern side of the Canal. At first they were described as brushes with marauding Arabs, but to the student there was a deep significance about them, which increases when we are apprised that trench construction is going on and that a big army is being concentrated by Britain.

Germany is reported to have already commenced the construction of light military railways, and the laying of pipe lines across the desert. In such ways would many difficulties hitherto considered to be insuperable be readily overcome, and it is no stupendous and impossible undertaking for the enemy to throw a powerful force right to the doors of Egypt. Examining the danger critically and solely from a military standpoint it does not appear wise to rely simply upon holding entrenched positions close to the Canal, as a means of defending Egypt. Here as elsewhere, it is not desirable for the British forces to be pinned to their ground. A more effective plan would be to engage the enemy in the open, and to keep him in the open. If the British forces are in the strength reported, this operation should be possible. Through causes, into which we need not now enter, this plan of campaign was lost in the Balkans, but if Britain has acted promptly and is already well prepared to meet the German thrust at Egypt, it should be possible for her forces to keep the enemy from digging-in just beyond the Canal.

If there is to be another deadlock in this new zone, then the advantage will certainly remain open to Germany and her allies to develop attacks in other directions. We have in mind Mesopotamia and India. Despite all the talk to the contrary Germany and her allies can find men for still further campaigns. At the moment their clear intention is to break up Egypt, and fight their way down through the Soudan to the German forces in East Africa, or to establish a base from which they can create trouble in Persia and Afghanistan and possibly along the Indian frontier. If they can get within striking distance of the Canal they must seriously interfere with the arrival of troops from Australia and New Zealand, and will also largely dislocate a valuable and important section of Britain's trade. These are unpleasant prognostications, but nevertheless they must be considered. We trust that Britain is well prepared for every contingency, and that Germany's plans will be speedily frustrated. If they are not then there is indeed grave danger to the Empire.

THE WITHDRAWAL FROM THE DARDANELLES

WEDNESDAY, December 22, 1915.

The withdrawal of the British forces from Suvla Bay, and the territory on Gallipoli Peninsula occupied by the Australian and New Zealand forces coincides with the recent announcement that the Allied offensive in this theatre of the war was to be abandoned. It may also be taken as an indication that the British Government and the Allies generally, are alive to the dangers which exist elsewhere, for these tried veteran troops are to be sent to another scene of activities, either Salonica or the Suez Canal zone—in our opinion the latter. The first report of the withdrawal affirmed that the operation was carried out with trifling loss. The French official report states that it was completed without molestation from the Turks. In either case it must have been very skilfully planned, and doubtless it will be recorded in the history of the war as one of the most successful of exceedingly risky operations carried out by the Allies.

When we discussed the probability of such a withdrawal some time ago we pointed out the danger of it from both a military and a political point of view. What we said then still holds good, because it must be remembered that the withdrawal is only partial. Britain and France have still many thousands of troops on what is called the "toe" of the Peninsula, and these forces have doubtless played a highly important part in covering the withdrawal of the troops from the other sectors. And while not wishing to discount in any way the skill and success of the operation, it has to be remembered, if the French official account is to be taken as correct, that there is a sinister meaning in the statement that the Turks offered no serious resistance. This suggests, if it suggests anything, that a large body of Turkish forces previously held up on the Peninsula, have departed for Asia Minor or elsewhere, where their experience and fighting qualities will be of more use to the Teutonic powers.

It is almost too late to speak of the political significance of the abandonment of the Dardanelles campaign, wholly or partially. Whatever influence this action might have exercised was spent some time ago when the Balkan campaign went against the Allies, and both Greece and Rumania refused to move. Now the Allies can well afford to subordinate political to military considerations, and doubtless if it were possible and desirable to take all the forces from Gallipoli they would be taken. What troops remain can be of military service by keeping at least an equal body of Turks opposed to them, but what the outcome of this may be it is difficult to say in the absence of reliable knowledge of how the Allied forces are placed to resist an attempt to push them into the sea. How to keep the forces there in safety, or how to get them away without unnecessary sacrifice of a devoted rearguard, are both problems of tremendous difficulty.

The Dardanelles campaign may be said to have been brought to a close. Critics are divided on the question of whether it should ever have been inaugurated. That it has been a failure from a military point of view is obvious alone from the fact that it failed to accomplish its purpose. A future generation of military authorities will have to decide whether it was a blunder, or a legitimate enterprise, promising great results sufficient in their importance to justify the risk taken and the losses of brave men involved. That the campaign has been heroically conducted no one can deny. Every man who has fought on Gallipoli is a hero, and the armies there have covered themselves with glory. If ever it could be said of men

"Tis not in mortals to command success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

this can faithfully be said of the troops who have taken part in the effort to hack a way through to Constantinople over this causeway to the heart of the Ottoman Empire. They deserved success, and in remote ages men will speak of what these heroes did, and of how they died, as we now speak of the exploits of the armies of the ancients, near the same battleground.

MORE TALK OF CONSCRIPTION

THURSDAY, December 23, 1915.

The cablegrams from England regarding the Government's attitude on the question of conscription have not lately been marked by lucidness. This may be attributable to the fact that the Official Press Bureau has suddenly ceased to exist, and we are now getting the tail end of news that previously was not vouchsafed to us, or it may be due to the fact that the Government itself cannot think lucidly on the question. The Prime Minister in moving the vote for the addition of a million men to the army is reported to have said "it is apparent that we require the services of every man who is physically fit to bear arms." He made other remarks, which taken together with other political utterances, and the varied reports of the success of Lord Derby's scheme, suggest that the Government is at last facing the necessity of conscription in its widest sense. Mr. John Redmond, M.P. leader of the Irish Party, is also reported to have said that he will oppose compulsion, and this surely is not apropos of nothing.

Mr. Redmond appears to have suddenly flown into opposition to the Government. If we are not mistaken he is the politician who recently returned from the front full of praise and support of the Government, and severely denounced the wicked press that had suggested that the Government's management of the war might be improved upon. Now we find him apparently ready to fight the Government on the question of compulsion and to tear it to pieces over the Dardanelles operations. As an honest critic of the Government ourselves, we do not attach much importance to Mr. Redmond's attitude on the ill-fated Dardanelles question, and we do not admire him for his attempt now to "flog a dead horse." The Dardanelles expedition is practically a thing of the past. It was a failure, and its conception and launching were both mistakes, which the press Mr. Redmond recently so roundly abused had the courage to criticise at the right time, mainly because the Government wilfully disregarded the advice of the proper authorities who had reported adversely against the scheme.

Now that the failure has been recognised; the mistakes admitted, and the expedition withdrawn, it is only right and fair, that there should be a cessation of criticism of the Government over this matter. No good can be accomplished by railing about it till the crack of doom. There are other matters for criticism which command attention, and one of these is the very question Mr. Redmond has now pronounced upon. The Government has to make up its mind at once about conscription. We will not speak of compulsion because we decline to admit that this is not already in force. We see no distinction between compulsion under an Act of Parliament, or a decision of Cabinet, and that which has been applied of recent months to obtain recruits for the Army. If a man is to be "starred," or "badged" or "branded" when he is a volunteer, or because he will not volunteer, and the object is to hold him up to his fellows as a despicable coward, a traitor, or a wretch, then this is only another way of compelling him to do what he does not desire to volunteer to do. It would be more honest and straightforward to enlist him as a conscript at once.

The Government has up to the moment merely juggled with the question of conscription. Under the various systems it has adopted, apparently either because it has not had the courage to go straight for legal compulsion, or because it is afraid that the British people want to delude themselves that they still have voluntary recruiting, free and without a suggestion of compulsion, the Government has certainly raised an enormous army. Mr. Asquith says by implication that even this is not sufficient, and that the war calls for the services of every man physically fit to bear arms. Under what system is he to get every man? The answer plainly is that only under legal compulsion applied fearlessly and indiscriminately can every man be brought into the fighting forces of the Empire. The Government may devise another system of branding and stigmatising those who do not volunteer, but there will always be thousands who will shrink and will not rush off to the recruiting stations.

If the needs of the Nation call for every man, and Mr. Asquith affirms this, then it is his duty as head of the Government to see that every man comes forward, voluntarily or compulsorily. No sensible Briton desires to see fine traditions scattered to the winds, but he does not desire either to be bulldozed into the belief that we have maintained the tradition of freely-given service when we have had compulsion in all but name. He does not desire that if every man is wanted it shall be permitted to a few to escape doing their duty simply because the Government will not compel them to do it, and compel them openly and fearlessly. It is high time that the talk of conscription, or threats of it from the Government ceased. The Government knows, or should know, whether conscription is necessary, and on that knowledge it should act—not talk.

(La Prensa.—December 16).

Readers of La Prensa says that paper, are well aware of the insistence with which it has criticised the methods of taxation adopted by various municipalities of the Province of Buenos Aires for the construction of roads in the suburbs. In some cases contracts are fixed at prices which work out greatly in excess of the cost of similar work in the capital, with the result that the taxation falling to be borne by the proprietors concerned often exceeds the value of the taxable property. In the generality of cases the tax amounts to at least one half of the value. If it be desirable in the public service that paving work be carried out in certain districts, it is reasonable to suppose that preference should be given to economical schemes, consistent with the amount of local traffic and with the value of the property. The Law of October 17, 1911, dictated by the Legislature of Buenos Aires, establishes that Municipalities shall bear 20 per cent of the cost of such works, 80 per cent being apportioned over the properties benefitted—always provided that this proportion does not exceed 30 per cent of the value of the tributary land. In innumerable cases, says La Prensa, this law is without effect, proprietors, large and small alike, having to pay, from one cause or another, a certain percentage above that established by law, and cases are not infrequent of owners having to abandon their land altogether, or mortgage their properties, in order to raise the money necessary to meet the service of the tax. On the shoulders of the authorities of the Province, says La Prensa, there weighs a grave responsibility, and in view of the public opinion, which accuses them of an attitude of indifference as to the state of affairs, it is to be hoped they will feel called upon to put an end to these abuses, and to the imposition of a taxation insupportable to the majority of proprietors affected.

THE SCARCITY OF WOOL IN ENGLAND

(La Nación.—December 16).

With reference to a recent cable from London indicating that the effect of the shortage of wool shipments from Argentina is beginning to be felt in that market, La Nación expresses the opinion that one of the reasons for this condition of things lies in the fact that German buyers have acquired nearly the whole of this country's production of wool, large quantities of which are being stored by them at different centres. Everyone is aware that the German houses operating in this market have bought largely in the Central Market and in the camp. This fact whilst not actually determining the scarcity of exports to London has undoubtedly contributed to aggravate the situation. The main reason however for the dearth of shipments, says La Nación, lies in the scarcity of tonnage available for transport. Day by day the situation is becoming more acute and should the arrival of ships to the port continue to diminish in the same proportion as hitherto, the exportation of Argentine produce in general will be seriously compromised. Another cause which accentuates the scarcity of Argentine wool in the English market is to be found in the fact that Australian and New Zealand wools are being quoted at very much lower prices than those obtaining here. There remains to be liquidated about one half of the Argentine wool clip and as prices appear to be on the decline it is quite possible that English buyers may still be able to acquire large quantities under favourable conditions. Taking everything into consideration, La Nación is of opinion that the abnormal state of the market in London is probably only temporary and that there is no reason to suppose that the momentary scarcity can have the result of seriously affecting the industry.

THE INCREASING VALUE OF MERCHANT SHIPS

(La Prensa.—December 17).

Quoting a recently arrived London journal, La Prensa points out some interesting facts regarding merchant shipping. It is well known that owing to the Allies' absolute dominion of the seas, British, French and neutral shipping companies are making enormous profits. As an instance of the avalorisation of shipping since the outbreak of war, the Evangelos formerly the Highland Prince, built in 1912 for £10,250 was recently resold to a Scandinavian Company for £30,000. The Reidar built at Sunderland in 1903 at a cost of £37,000 recently changed hands at the enormous price of £100,000 notwithstanding that she is of less than 4,000 tons. As regards freights prices have become inflated to a more or less similar degree. Previous to the war it was possible to ship from North American ports 214 tons of wheat for £60. To-day the same amount of cargo must pay a freight of £600 whilst freights from Argentine ports have increased 500 per cent. As a result of these high freights shipping companies are to-day making considerable gains, British companies however being placed in less favourable circumstances than neutrals owing to the fact that they have to hand over to the Government 60 per cent of their profits in the form of tax. Neutral owners, being free from this taxation, are able to take advantage in full of the benefits afforded them by Britain's command of the seas. Owing to various causes there is everywhere a great scarcity of tonnage, British builders being too busily engaged on Government work to be able to concentrate their capacity on the construction of merchant ships. As a natural consequence it follows that the shipbuilding yards of those few countries not already embroiled in the European conflict, especially North America, are to-day centres of an activity hitherto unknown.

THE 1916 CENTENARY: A DIFFICULT PROBLEM

(La Nación.—December 17).

The result of the meeting held yesterday by the commission entrusted with the arrangements for the 1916 centenary, says La Nación, has not been made public, though it is known that the matters under consideration related to the question of funds. Ever since its appointment the committee has been handicapped in the furtherance of its plans by the difficulty of obtaining the money necessary to carry on the work. To this initial inconvenience has been added another and more serious complication. The members of the commission find themselves divided into two parties with antagonistic tendencies. The representatives from Tucuman, who form part of the commission, are of opinion that celebration of the centenary of the Congress of Tucuman should have its centre in that province. The other members consider that the auspicious occasion signalises not only a provincial, but a national glory, and that whilst the Congress of 1816 had its seat in the province, it lost by that fact none of its national character. For that reason they insist that the solemnisation shall not be a purely local one, but that in the centenary festivities the whole of the Argentine people shall have an opportunity of participating. Thus the question remains. Congress has not seen its way to sanction the expenditure necessary to carry out the plan on the scale proposed, and with the further aggravation of dissension

THE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES TAX

(La Prensa.—December 18).

The recent decision in a case in which a merchant claimed exemption from the payment of the tax on weights and measures, leads the Prensa to the conclusion that the principle on which the tax is based is fundamentally wrong. In the case in question the merchant claimed to be exempt from payment on the grounds that the balance or scales on which he was asked to pay tax was not used by him in the conduct of his business, a fact which he proved by a reference to his books. This argument however was not taken into account. The case was begun in 1910 and now after five years, judgment has been given against him, the courts deciding that the tax is applicable to all weights and measures irrespective of whether they are in use or not. As originally introduced the tax was intended to cover the cost of inspection and verification, a periodical examination being desirable in the interests of the public to prevent and check fraud on the part of unscrupulous dealers. From the decision in the above case however it would appear that the Municipality think otherwise, the inspectors insisting on the taxation of all balances, weights and measures indiscriminately. To carry this theory to its logical conclusion the possession of a balance for the weighing of letters will render the owner liable to taxation and we may expect to see the doctrine carried to the extreme of subjecting the weights, measures, etc., in private houses subject to inspection and taxation by the Municipal inspectors. The application of the tax, is entirely erroneous and it is the duty of the Municipal authorities to correct the system. In the opinion of the Prensa the public have every right to protest against and resist the imposition of an unjust tax, however small that tax may be.

THE TAX ON NAPHTHA

(La Prensa.—December 20).

In the budget for the forthcoming year, at present under consideration, it is proposed to establish a tax on the importation of naphtha. The reason for the innovation, says La Prensa, has not been clearly stated, and one is led to the conclusion that the matter has been decided without a very exhaustive study of the probable effects on certain industries. Naphtha is a combustible used in large quantities in certain branches of the commerce of the country, and the imposition of a tax which will raise the price of that commodity 13 per cent will have very prejudicial effects. The fruit production in the islands under the jurisdiction of the Province of Buenos Aires, and also in the delta of the Parana and Uruguay will immediately feel the harmful repercussion of this new duty, the transport of the fruit being largely carried out with the aid of the naphtha launches. Of the desirability of developing this fruit industry there can be no question, and the action of the Government, should they sanction the new tax, will undoubtedly have the contrary effect of placing a serious obstacle in the development of this branch of the country's commerce.

The consequent rise in price of naphtha will also make itself felt in the automobile trade, and it is logical to presume that the already high tariffs ruling on the taxis plying for hire will be still further increased. A close study of the question, says La Prensa, should convince the Government that the adoption of the proposed tax would be not only imprudent but seriously prejudicial.

amongst the members there is every indication that the efforts of the commission to evolve a satisfactory scheme worthy of such an important event in the history of the Argentine, are in imminent danger of proving futile.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE CAMP

(La Nación.—December 18).

The numerous groups of workmen who are at the present time wandering over the Republic in a vain search for work, are causing great alarm in certain vicinities. Finding themselves without employment and therefore without the necessary means of subsistence they have in several cases resorted to violence in their demands for the necessities of life. This state of things, says La Nación is inexcusable and incomprehensible, given the preparations which the Government were supposed to have made for the mobilisation and distribution of hands in co-operation with the local and national authorities. The congregation of vast groups of hands in regions where they are not required would seem to admit of no other explanation than that the plans of the Government for the handling of the harvest have not been carried out. Not only has there been negligence shown in the information supplied to the peons but they have been left without means of transport as shown by the recent assaults on trains in Tucumán and the Pampa Central. These thousands of workmen cannot be left to face the prospect of starvation, and whilst the Government are wise in sending a sufficient police force to prevent a repetition of the disorders, it must not forget ten that its first duty is to rectify the condition of things which has arisen as a result of the negligence of certain of its officials.

The State, says La Nación, has been in the habit of receiving, housing, and despatching to the agricultural zones, hundreds of thousand of immigrants, and the fact that bands of unemployed are wandering about the country at a time when their services are most in demand is incomprehensible. The situation requires urgent measures on the part of the Government, as a mobilisation of these unfortunates, without order and without official co-operation, will undoubtedly reproduce the disorders and disturbances which have already happened in the Pampa.

THE MUNICIPALITIES OF THE PROVINCE OF BUENOS AIRES

(La Nación.—December 20).

The administration of the municipalities of the Province says La Nación, merits severe criticism, concrete cases of censurable mismanagement being not infrequent. The case of General Madariaga is cited where notwithstanding that the calculated income for 1914 was $46,000 the sanctioned expenditure for that year amounted to $77,720, or nearly double the possible amount available. It would be useless, says La Nación, to seek for a more excessive case of incapable administration. Madariaga, however, is not an isolated case. In Belgrado, where the expenditure for the same year was calculated at $223,240, the income fell short of that amount by $96,414. As none of the Municipalities declare their actual state of indebtedness, it is impossible to form any exact estimate, as to the total existing state of affairs though it is believed that in the majority of cases they are heavily in debt through accumulated deficits. The figures shown are of themselves sufficiently expressive to reveal the total absence of careful study in the preparation of the budgets. At the end of the year a diminution of 15 to 20 per cent on the estimated rental, says La Nación, is excusable; when that proportion is exceeded it is a clear proof of the want of good judgment in the sanction of the estimates. The figures quoted clearly demonstrate the manner in which the municipalities in the majority of cases mismanage the affairs of the people employing the funds in a manner far from beneficial and burdening the taxpayer with unnecessary taxation which produces little or no benefit to himself or to the community in general.

INEXPLICABLE RESERVE IN THE MINISTRY OF MARINE

(La Prensa.—December 21).

Divers recent occurrences in the department of the Navy—occurrences which it is only right should be put fully and freely before the public—have led La Prensa to comment unfavourably upon the evident difficulty of obtaining from the Ministry of Marine any information for publication in the Press. In contradistinction to practice obtaining at other Ministries, in that of the Navy there is apparently no source of official information from which the public or the Press can obtain enlightenment as to the events of the day. From the chiefs of division to the Minister himself, all profess ignorance when asked for any data regarding the doings in the departments under their jurisdiction. On the occasion of the fire at Puerto Militar, in which it is calculated the Government lost close on half a million dollars, it was impossible to obtain from the Ministry any statement whatsoever on the occurrence, the reason for this exaggerated reserve being that the Minister of Marine was at the moment on the scene of the fire and that there was no need for any other official statement to the public. As regards the detention of the transport Pampa the public are still without any official declaration on the subject, the department which has direct intervention in the matter, having manifested that it has nothing to report. Finally in the question of the escape of four of the German sailors interned on Martin Garcia, a fact well known and commented upon by the Press of this country and Uruguay, the Ministry of Marine interrogated two days after the occurrence disclaims all knowledge of the affair. In view of these irregularities La Prensa voices the opinion that there is something lacking in the administration of the aforesaid Ministry, the effect of which mal-administration often leaves the man at the head of affairs in absolute ignorance of what is going on in the various departments under his care.

THE MILLION

(La Nación.—December 21).

The public, who are content to pay $22 and upwards for a decimo of the Christmas lottery says La Nación are stimulating the already voracious appetite of the speculators. The ever-increasing prices extorted by the Agencies would seem to indicate that there is still a strong demand for a participation in the "million" on the part of that section of the public whose knowledge of arithmetic runs contrary to their interests. The blame for this extortionate excess over the valor escrito of the tickets rests solely and entirely with the people themselves. For those who are content to buy fractions of a ticket, the lottery of December 31 presents a more favourable opportunity of winning larger prizes at much less cost. Under the circumstances this useless throwing away of money at the caprice of the speculators seems incomprehensible, and the Nación can only surmise that the public submit to be fleeced for the reason that the Christmas lottery is the only one of its kind, and that there is a sporting instinct which prompts even the most seriously-inclined, to "have a shot at the million."

The enormous profits made by the agencies at this time have led to the evolution of other ideas for trading on the gullibility of the public. La Nación draws attention to an ingeniously worded leaflet which offers a scheme for bringing the million lottery within the reach of all. For the small sum of $1 the promoters undertake to hand over a document entitling the bearer to 1/500th part share in an entire ticket. Compared to this attempt to extort $500 for a ticket, the legal value of which is $157.50, the manipulations of the agencies fade into insignificance.

THE EXPANSION OF THE COMMERCE OF BUENOS AIRES

(La Prensa.—December 22).

The commercial organisation of the metropolis, says La Prensa, has not yet completed the measures to be adopted for the expansion of its sphere of action. At the present moment the internal markets of the country, by reason of the established railway communication with Buenos Aires, are in a much more favourable position for the furtherance of trade than are those centres of production which lie on the coast or up the rivers. A faulty knowledge of the commercial geography of the country combined with a want of foresight on the part of the authorities are probably the reasons which have led to this deficiency of organisation. Some years ago La Prensa pointed out that owing to our rigid legislation and onerous customs dues much of the produce from the south coast found its way preferentially to Chili. At that time means were sought which would facilitate the despatch of the produce of those regions to the Buenos Aires market. That was four years ago, and affairs to-day are in the same state as they were then, much of the country's produce which should find its legitimate market in the capital being absorbed by the neighbouring country. The commerce of that part of Brasil, Paraguay and Bolivia which lies round the Alto Paraguay should have its natural outlet in the port of Buenos Aires, and it is desirable that the Government foster this important section of the country's commerce by the adoption of measures which will facilitate shipment to and from the ports on the Parana. Puerto Suarez in Bolivia, and Corumbá in Brasil, are at present without direct communication by water with Buenos Aires, and in the transport of the merchandise which those two centres import and export Argentine shipping has no part. In the opinion of La Prensa the realisation of intelligent methods including custom house re-organisation would establish Buenos Aires as the centre of this up-river commerce thereby furthering in no small degree the commercial welfare of the country.

MARITIME TRANSPORT

(La Nación.—December 22).

The present scarcity of tonnage for the transport of wool from this country leads to the natural conclusion that the problem of shipping the exceptionally large harvest in the immediate future will present insurmountable difficulties. The progressive increase in freights, which have reached 120 shillings per ton, lend colour to this view. It is not easy, says La Nación, to declare whether this condition will continue for an indefinite period, or not. In shipping circles, whilst it is admitted that the outlook is anything but promising, it is also clear that no definite conclusions can be arrived at. In normal times it was possible to know beforehand the detailed movement of the world's shipping and it was feasible under those circumstances to calculate in advance the amount of tonnage which would be available for the lifting of the harvest. To-day this information is not to hand no information as to shipping being received from London, and the result is that in many cases the only advice as to a ship's destination is her appearance in the outer roads. Amongst the agents opinions differ, some maintaining that tonnage will become still scarcer whilst others, more optimistic, are of opinion that when the time comes, there will not be wanting a sufficiency of shipping for all purposes. The belief is general that the infinitesimal exportation of wool to London is to be accounted for not by the scarcity of available ships but by the fact that for the moment the product is not required in that market. Summing up the opinions of the

LOMAS COLLEGE

PRIZE DISTRIBUTION.

The finale of the season of the Lomas Girls' College and Grammar School for Boys was enacted last night in the M.E. Church and Hall, which former was comfortably filled with parents and friends.

Mr. W. H. Crispin opened with an Organ Prelude, after which the Rev. Dr. J. W. Fleming, of St. Andrew's, prayed with a special invocation for the future well being of the pupils there present. The schools then rendered the Argentine National Hymn in the most creditable and hearty manner.

The Rev. Maynard Wolcott, Principal, then read the statement of the Sessions work, which was he said satisfactory, being very well done. There were 34 girls in the school and 32 boys. The names of prize winners (gold medals) are as follows:

Girls' College—

General Excellence: Hilda Ainscough.

Preliminary Department:

Marjorie Clarkson.

Boy's Grammar School—

General Excellence: Gordon Nor-daby.

Prize Essay: Patrick Tallon.

For Penmanship (Waterman Fountain Pen): Euphemia Orphant.

Owing to the excellence of a second Essay, the Rev. Dr. McLaughlin had given a second prize for Bella Orphant.

A silver cup given by Mr. George Anderson for all round ability in athletics was won by Louis Hanson.

The Prize essay, showing much originality of thought was then read by its writer, Patrick Tallon; the subject being the autobiography of a book. It traced the genesis of the paper itself from its first purchase as cloth in a drapers, its decline from the mistress's wear to that of the slavey, its final degraded state as floor swabbing rags before dissolution into pulp, in a convincing manner. Hilda Ainscough had treated the Elizabethan age in a picturesque fashion.

"Light Lovely Light," was then sung by the girls, after which Bishop Stuntz gave a brief address exhorting all to lay on and perfect their education. The iron weapon that is blunt he said, requires so much more exertion on the part of the craftsman. He deplored the fact that he had suffered grievously from stenographers who did not know how to spell. He therefore implored them to keep their noses to the grindstone and make their iron sharp and efficient.

The boys then had their turn at vocal exercise, and their selection was "Ye Mariners of England," which was very heartily rendered, and is peculiarly appropriate at present, and "God Save the King" closed the proceedings. As previously mentioned the work of the pupils both in music, needlework and painting was very good, and the members of the school generally show that they are in excellent educational hands.

THE KAISER'S CIRCUS

TROOPS TRAINED ON MENAGERIE CAMELS.

Paris, Dec. 18.

A telegram from Amsterdam says that it is reported from Hamburg that the German Government has taken the camels belonging to Hagenbeck's menagerie for the purpose of training the troops who are to form the expedition against Egypt in the manner to ride a camel.

agents, La Nación says the situation is one in which the only possible attitude is to wait the turn of events. One aspect of the case in favour of a satisfactory solution might be found in the fact that if Great Britain has need of Argentina's products she is in the position to so arrange that those products shall reach her markets as, and when, they are required, without any difficulty.

ST. ANDREW'S ACADEMY

ANNUAL PRIZE DISTRIBUTION.

It is the season for the breaking up of colleges and schools, for the presentation of diplomas and prizes, for the well-earned success of the boys, girls and little ones, and the season for parent's pride. Yesterday there was another breaking up for Christmas holidays, and a most pleasant function accompanying the same at St. Andrew's Academy, Montes de Oca.

Attended by a number of parents and relations, the annual prize distribution at Mr. Christie's Academy was (quite apart from what pupils may have thought it), a most enjoyable function.

In one of the rooms set apart was an exhibition of needlework, of drawings, maps, writings and specimens of arithmetical ability.

The needlework was excellent, and to Miss Hanson, who has taken so much trouble with her pupils, much credit is due. The specimens of map drawing, of writing, book-keeping, and the rest were highly creditable.

Proceedings commenced with a concert in which the following pupils took part:

Miss Nellie Christie at the piano, who played "Polinto" (Donizetti) nicely. Miss Bessie Dodds, the winner for music in a waltz by Ludovic. Songs and recitations by Miss Stella Jacobs, by H. Cordes, and L. Martin, Ella Christie, Charlie Rogers, and the school were very good. Other items were:

Recitation, "Kittens," G. Midgley, C. Christie, E. Carlsson.

Song, "Tip-toe Song," A. Ulfeldt, L. Weber, A. Hickling, J. Peters.

Dialogue, "La Madre de Un Genia," M. Carlsson, A. Lavadenz, G. Lavadenz.

Song, "Rule Britannia," School.

"The Little Gipsy."

Daisy Glen (a gipsy girl), Miss V. Lavadenz.

Florence Earle, Miss B. Dodds.

Kate Bloomer, Miss K. Mackenzie.

Ike (a gipsy boy), Master A. Lewis.

Willie Fair, Master F. Martin.

Frank Ellis, Master A. Dodds.

Chorus of village boys and girls.

The last item was an attractive play, and quite well rendered.

Mrs. Lavadenz then gave away the numerous prizes.

YOUNG MEN'S SOCIAL CLUB

A WHIST DRIVE.

There is much to be credited to the Y.M.S.C. and its energetic committee and Secretary. Periodically and with constant success a whist drive is held in the club rooms, to which ladies are invited. Special evenings, which are musical, extra entertainments which always entertain, are from time to time given.

The need of this social club was shown long ago, and immediately it was formed success was met with.

Lately, in new members, in finances, and in many other ways the Club has gone ahead. Last night's card party was in no way different from others.

Every table was occupied, and refreshments and good fun were going throughout the evening.

The successful lady player was Mrs. Clarke, with a score of 146, and she was presented with a pretty silver stand, on which jewellery, watches, and all kinds of nicknacks could be hung, in fact, everything but a hat.

Mr. C. Mason took the gentleman's prize, a fine and useful pearl penknife, with a score of 142.

The booby, Mr. Marks, had a score of 113, and was presented with his portrait—in caricature!

Mr. Wellby the President, announced good things to come when the committee had been able to arrange dates for these.

It can be added that an increased membership is gratifying and well deserved, because no person who attends a Y.M.S.C. function ever goes away disappointed.

THE "CRISIS"

Not Yet Past

RIVER PLATE BANK MEETING

London, Dec. 22.

At the annual general meeting of shareholders in the London and River Plate Bank the Chairman, Mr. E. R. Duffield, said that the accounts this year showed improvement as compared with the last six months of the previous year. This was largely due to the heavy demand for Argentine produce, in the financing of which the Bank was considerably interested. They were, however, not yet clear of last year's crisis, which explained the decrease in the interim dividend. Although some general improvement occurred during the last six months of the period under review, circumstances did not justify the Board in considering it as permanent; but there had been a decided improvement in the commercial and pastoral businesses.

The position of the Bank was very strong. Securities had been written down out of profits and ample provision made for bad or doubtful debts.

There had been undue lending by a number of concerns in Argentina, but in this respect things are much sounder there now.

LONDON MARKETS

London, Dec. 22.

The money market was easy to-day, discounts firm.

The Stock Exchange finished firm. War Loan advanced well. Colonials were wanted.

There is some idea in the market that the sale of Treasury Bills will be stopped, and that suggestions for a new war loan will be made before long.

The Stock Exchange Committee has passed a new rule, subject to confirmation on January 5, that no candidate of German or Austro-Hungarian birth shall be eligible for membership.

Home rails were in somewhat better tone, Argentines dull, the traffic reports not giving satisfaction. Rubbers were firm. Plantation was quoted at 3s. 7½d. Para at 3s. 2½d.

The receipts of the Argentine Transandine Railway for the year have been £48,473, as against £96,106 last year.

PRESIDENTE MITRE CASE

Vessel may be Returned

INTERESTING RUMOUR FROM LONDON

La Razón is responsible for the following statement which professes to emanate from its London correspondent.

London, Dec. 22.

I have obtained some information both from the Foreign Office and the Argentine Legation on the condition of affairs relative to the capture of the Presidente Mitre and the protests based upon it.

According to what I have been informed, the British Government will permit the ship to be returned, but under certain conditions as to its navigation and traffic in future.

These conditions refer to the requisites of its status as a vessel of Argentine registry.

It is understood that Sr. Dominguez and Sir Edward Grey ("Mr. Grey" La Razón, as usual, calls him) have agreed on this solution and that the latter has been considering the matter since he returned from his recent trip. Information has been sought from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, but nothing further can be obtained than that the Argentine Government have every confidence that the negotiation will result favourably, which in a degree corroborates the despatch quoted.

ARGENTINE BUTTER

As already stated in THE HERALD a record shipment of Argentine butter went forward, on Dec. 17 to London, in the R.M.S.P. "Amazon," consigned by the following factories:

	Cases
The River Plate Dairy Co. Ltd.	7,500
Soc. An. "La Tandilera"	1,950
L. Magnasco and Co. Ltd.	2,250
Baya Tiscornia and Biais	1,200
Waldrom and Wood (various factories)	3,900
"La Scandia"	4,200
Elowson and Wester	450

Total 21,450

Containing 1,200,000 lbs. net weight of butter, representing an approximate value of £175,000 sterling.

To illustrate the importance of this shipment it need only be said that to produce so much butter, in one day, it would be necessary to employ 70,000 men, milking 2,300,000 cows, producing 18,500,000 litres of milk. It would further necessitate scores of men separating the cream, a regiment of carters and railroad porters to get the cream to the factories throughout the country, where, having passed the cream classifier's test it would find its way through the strainers into the great churns that work it into "sweet Argentine butter," thence it would travel through the packing departments down to the freezing chambers, out to carts or motor lorries and so find its way to cold storage on board the conveying steamer.

There is no doubt that the country is waking to the possibilities of the dairy industry, which is destined to be a very powerful factor in the Argentine industrial life and rural development.

LABOUR OPPOSITION ENDED

Acquiescence in Asquith's Conscription Proposals.

UNMARRIED WILL BE COMPELLED TO SERVE

Cabinet Reaches a Decision at Last

London, Dec. 29.

The "Star" in an editorial on the decision of the Cabinet to introduce a limited form of conscription, says that conscription is a slippery slope.

Once a nation adopts it there must be no repenting.

It is impossible to limit the appetite for a conscript army, which devours every available man.

Both in the economy of man-power and in the economy of money, the British are an unthrifty race.

New York, Dec. 29.

The London correspondent of the "New York Herald" telegraphs:—

"The Cabinet has guaranteed that married men who volunteer for the army shall not be called out until the unmarried men have been.

"Mr. Asquith decided at once to ask for the approval of a law to compel unmarried men fit for service to enlist, the heads of families remaining exempt.

"This solution is very far from signifying a triumph for general conscription which has been defended by what is known here as the grumbling Press.

"The papers of this morning say that Mr. Asquith has won a great victory, as yesterday there was strong opposition among the members of the Cabinet to this solution of limited compulsory service; but now it is believed that all the Ministers will support it, and that there will be no resignations.

"Ireland is excluded from the provisions of this scheme, it being held that she has already contributed so many thousands of men that this new law would press with undue severity upon her."

LABOUR "TOES THE LINE."

London, Dec. 29.

At a conference of representatives of the Labour party convened for the consideration of the Cabinet's decision in favour of limited compulsion, both the advocates and the opponents of the measure were equally emphatic. Once satisfied that the step is really necessary the members of the party are quite ready to support it, providing they are assured that it will be applied impartially to all classes.

Some are insisting that a further opportunity should be given to the unmarried men to offer their services; but it is believed that the Cabinet has decided that there must be no further delay.

RELAXATION OF TRADES UNION RULES.

London, Dec. 29.

The Amalgamated Society of Engineers is about to meet in order to consider Mr. Lloyd George's project for the relaxation of the Trade Union rules, and for enlarging the number of men in certain classes of work. They will also discuss a Bill amending the Munitions Act.

Austria and the States

PREPARATIONS FOR A RUPTURE.

New York, Dec. 29.

The officials of the United States Government are far from sanguine in regard to the outcome of the correspondence with Austria over the sinking of the Ancona, and the feeling is reflected in the leading newspapers.

The absence of all effort on the part of Germany to smoothe over difficulties deepens the conviction that the Central Powers are prepared for a rupture of diplomatic relations with the United States.

The Mine Peril

NORWEGIAN STEAMER SUNK.

London, Dec. 29.

A telegram from Bergen reports that the Norwegian steamer Hornelen, 3766 tons gross, has been sunk, apparently by coming into contact with a floating mine.

All on board but one were rescued.

Hanged at the Horse Guards

LIEUT. COLONEL'S SUICIDE.

London, Dec. 29.

Lieutenant Colonel Greenwood is reported to have committed suicide, his body having been found hanging in an office occupied by him at the Horse Guards at Whitehall.

WITHOUT WARNING!

Sinking of Ville de la Ciotat

GERMANY'S LATEST CRIME

London, Dec. 28.

Malta reports the arrival of 208 survivors of the French steamer Ville de la Ciotat, sunk by a German submarine on the 24th inst.

All the passengers declare that the vessel was sunk without warning near Crete.

THOUGHT CASTLENAU WAS ON BOARD.

Paris, Dec. 28.

It is stated that the commander of the submarine which sank the Ville de la Ciotat was under the impression that General Castelnau was on board, and Germany was determined to prevent him from reaching Athens.

London, Dec. 29.

Details of the sinking of the Ville de la Ciotat obtained from the survivors who were landed at Malta show that the vessel was attacked without warning at 10 a.m. on the 24th. Five life-boats and two rafts were at once launched.

One of the boats which was crowded with women and children turned over and all perished; while another was smashed against the ship's side. Most of the lives lost were due to the steamer going down before those on board could leave her.

Two steamers, one Dutch and the other Greek, which were close by when the Ville de la Ciotat was attacked, immediately disappeared. It is believed that they were concealing the presence of the submarine.

The submarine stood by for some time after sinking the steamer. Two hours afterwards the survivors were picked up by the Merez.

NO MUNITIONS ON BOARD.

Tokio, Dec. 29.

The French steamer Ville de la Ciotat at the time she was sunk had on board 314 tons of silk and 550 tons of general cargo from Japan, but no munitions.

Greek Vessel in Distress

THESSALONIKI APPEALS FOR AID.

New York, Dec. 29.

Wireless messages calling for immediate assistance were received this morning from the Greek steamer Thessaloniki, 250 miles out at sea. The steamer Seneca has been despatched to her aid.

FEARS AS TO VESSEL'S SAFETY.

Savannah, Georgia, Dec. 29.

Owing to the fierce storm which is blowing the steamer Seneca has been unable to reach the Thessaloniki, concerning which vessel serious fears are entertained.

Wilful Murder

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE PORTO SAID.

Rome, Dec. 29.

Details of the sinking of the steamer Porto Said, 5301 tons, belonging to the Societa Maritima Italiana, have been telegraphed from Tripoli to the "Corriere della Sera."

From them it appears that on the 10th of this month, the steamer being within a few miles of Derna with 268 passengers on board, including some fifty Askari troops returning from Italy, a submarine showing the Austrian flag attacked the vessel, opening fire upon her and finally discharging a torpedo which struck her amidships.

When the submarine opened fire half a dozen passengers jumped over board and were to cut to pieces by the screw. The rest succeeded in getting away in the boats with the exception of the second officer and a wounded Askari who are believed to have perished.

The submarine was chased by a destroyer which fired at it.

The passengers and crew of the Porto Said were landed at Syracuse.

Nine Pirates Sunk

SUBMARINE-HUNTING IN THE MEDITERRANEAN

Paris, Dec. 28.

"Le Figaro" announces that the Allies' search for Teuton submarines in the Mediterranean is giving satisfactory results. The Ministry of Marine has received information of nine having been either sunk or captured, and this figure will undoubtedly be increased as there are still to be received the reports from the commanders of several other squadrons of destroyers.

Steamer's Terrible Passage

CAPTAIN WASHED OVERBOARD.

New York, Dec. 29.

A steamer from Liverpool which has touched here reports that on the 23rd inst. she picked up a wireless message from the British steamer Cheviot Range which said:—"Hurricane blowing, captain washed overboard and drowned. The seas have smashed the bridges and done other damage." The Cheviot Range however did not ask for assistance.

Gale in Philadelphia

EXTENSIVE DAMAGE REPORTED.

New York, Dec. 29.

A telegram from Philadelphia states that a terrific gale is blowing there playing havoc with the suburbs of the city and the rural districts.

GREAT INVASION OF EGYPT

Turco-Teuton Plan of Campaign

ENEMY CONFIDENT OF SUCCESS

Difficulties Not Deemed Insurmountable

New York, Dec. 29.

Despatches from Constantinople say military experts there believe that there are no great difficulties in the way of the campaign against Egypt.

Appearances indicate that the supplies of food in Arabia and Syria are sufficient to meet the requirements of a large army.

A correspondent who has travelled over the route which will be followed says that the journey usually took thirteen days, but that with the new railways that have been express trains should perform the distance in six days.

Transportation across the desert is perfectly realisable. The tales about the sandiness of the desert is a myth, the soil consisting mainly of clay which has been baked by the sun almost to the hardness of brick and therefore perfectly practicable for automobiles and motor trucks.

The chief trouble is the want of water. The masses of troops forming the expedition would probably consume all the water available, forcing the Commissariat department to transport supplies.

Thousands of camels will be used; and with the addition of mechanical traction the army should experience no hardships.

The winter climate in the desert is good, and the rays of the sun acting as a germicide will prevent the pollution of the ground which causes so much disease among large armies.

Also the terrain will be favourable for offensive tactics, and the Turks and Germans will be able to make an advantageous use of the undulating plains, dongas, and dry water-courses.

[NOTE.—It should be remembered that the above cablegram presents the Constantinople view of the situation. London opinions may differ.]

Revolution in China

Pekin, Dec. 28.

Tsai-Ao, who was formerly Mayor of Peking, was here when President Yuan-Shih-Kai signified his acceptance of the throne. It being suspected that he would attempt to organise a revolution an attempt was made to arrest him; but he fled in disguise to Yun-nan-fu, where he had previously been Governor.

At first the Government considered that Tsai-Ao would have but little influence outside the province, but reports prove the contrary. The Government has now ordered the forces which are to be sent against the rebels to be further strengthened.

The Law of Nations

MR. ELIHU ROOT AND THE WORLD AFTER WAR.

Washington, Dec. 29.

Mr. Elihu Root, President of the American Society of International Law, has delivered a speech at the sessions of the Scientific Congress where in the following passages occurred:—

"An international tribunal will have to be established in order that the Law of Nations shall be enforced.

"Violations thereof should be punished by the Powers which are greater than the violator. Violations of the rights of civilised nations should be regarded as crimes, to be dealt with under the penal laws; so that when the war is over, the nations guilty of such infractions may be aware that they must not allow themselves to be led by an ambitious policy of aggrandisement. Were such a policy acceptable, we should have come to the adoption of autocracy, which is founded upon arbitrary power when in fact the nations should be shielded and protected by the law.

"Some of us believe and hope that the progress of the world depends on the perfection of the democratic form of government and on autonomy."

Referring to the war, the orator mentioned the repudiation of the principles he had laid down by a great Power which he did not name, but referred to as "a Power for whom treaties are obligatory only so long as they do not stand in the way of its proposals and interests."

He called attention to the principle which it is attempted to establish, that when a belligerent violates its obligations, its adversary is subsequently justified in doing the same.

"When the war is over, the civilised world will have to settle whether what is now called International Law is to continue merely a code, or whether it is to be a collection of laws imposing the most definite and inevitable obligations."

Mr. Root predicted that the war would endow the Law of Nations with far more force than it possesses now. He declared that laws are enacted in order to be obeyed, and that all of them are subject to sanction, as violations of them should be subject to castigation by the greater Powers.

"There are some nations so powerful that there is no other which is capable of punishing them; but it would be for the combination of nations to enforce civilisation and prevent the arbitrary abuses of power."

Loyalty in India

MILLIONS OF HINDUS READY TO SERVE THE CROWN.

London, Dec. 29.

Despatches from Bombay announce that the annual National Congress has been held in that city, being attended by ten thousand delegates from all parts of India.

The speeches delivered all dwelt on the necessity of upholding the British Government and declared that there were millions of Hindus ready to serve in the ranks of the British army.

The President of the Congress, Sir Satyendra Sinha, said that the time had come when the nation should give expression to its sentiments of supreme admiration for the task which Britain had undertaken, in co-operating in which task India will not remain behind the rest of the Empire. The outburst of loyalty which had been elicited throughout British India when it was known that Britain was at war had for ever blotted out mistrust between the Hindus and their rulers.

The President admitted that the time for selfgovernment had not yet come; but he considered that the British Government ought to give the national aspiration its approval and should allow the formation of a great national army in India.

GERMAN OFFICERS AT LAST GAIN COURAGE.

Paris, Dec. 28.

Despatches from the French army in Alsace say that an unusually large percentage of German officers have been captured in the recent heavy fighting round Hartmannsweilerkopf.

A French officer said to a German: "This proves that your officers are where they ought to be, viz. fighting among their men like the French officers."

The French, being annoyed by Berlin's denial that the French had captured 23 officers and 1360 men, made the prisoners march past, when they counted 1368 prisoners, among whom were many Jaegers.

It is stated that the Germans captured in Alsace are poorly trained, indicating that the German Government is now using men who were previously declared unfit.

The specifications show that the new material follows the lines of the old pneumatic system wherein the main material used was willow birch fibre; but the kind of binder used is not revealed. It is only known that no rubber is used.

A trial by automobile over a distance of 437 miles under adverse conditions resulted in the tyres showing no signs of wear. The experiment is said to have been such a success that an important banking firm in Vienna has undertaken to finance the discoverer.

aiding the enemy! LORD ROBERT CECIL'S
CONFESSION GOVERNMENT BETRAYS SECRETS TO PACIFY THE PRESS

London, Dec. 24.

In replying in the House of Commons to attacks upon the Government on the part of several of the members of Parliament, the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Lord Robert Cecil, declared that the Cabinet was not responsible for the situation which was sedulously depicted in such sombre colours by certain newspapers.

In the course of his speech the Minister touched on various matters of great interest and was several times interrupted by bursts of applause.

Lord Robert Cecil declared that the enemies of the country, who had adopted the anti-patriotic course of fostering a conspiracy, which as all the world believed, was headed by the Northcliffe Press, to overthrow the Government, were responsible for the unjustified attacks upon Sir Edward Grey. They were pledged to endeavour to throw discredit upon the recruiting system initiated by Lord Derby, so as to compel the Government to adopt compulsory military service, a step which would involve the country in serious complications.

Regarding the affair from the neutral countries' viewpoint, Lord Cecil said that he was convinced that the enemies of the Government who controlled the Yellow Press were a handful of malefactors and a veritable menace to the safety of the Empire.

HE DECLARED THAT THESE PERSONS HAD COMPELLED THE GOVERNMENT, OUT OF RESPECT FOR THE PRINCIPLES OF LIBERTY, TO REVEAL FACTS NOT ONLY TO THE PREJUDICE OF THE COUNTRY'S INTERESTS BUT OF SUCH A NATURE THAT THEY WERE CAPABLE OF BEING MADE USE OF BY THE ENEMY.

It was useless to point out to these conspirators that Germany was commercially defeated and ruined. It was of no avail to quote figures proving that the Government, opposed by the greatest military powers of the world, had obtained surprising results.

The enemies of the Government did not hesitate to smirch the honour of women, attacking the wife of the Prime Minister and obliging her to have recourse to the Courts of Justice. There was nothing too low for this gang, and he considered that the time had arrived for applying the necessary correctives with full energy.

 GARVIN REBELS THE NEED FOR A MAN.

London, Dec. 27.

A violent attack is made upon the Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, by Mr. J. L. Garvin through his paper the "Observer." Mr. Garvin says that the only man fit to govern is Mr. Lloyd George. The country is anxiously awaiting the coming of a man who is capable of directing affairs during the war. Week after week passes, month after month, and every time a difficulty arises its solution is deferred. The country will stand it no longer, seventeen months of war having passed and it sees its hopes as far as ever from being realised.

(Note.—This cablegram forms the subject of this morning's leading article).

 PRESENTS FOR THE TROOPS SPLENDID WORK BY THE PRESS

London, Dec. 25.

Each soldier on every front or elsewhere has received a present. The prodigious task undertaken by the London and provincial newspapers in co-operation with the War Office contributed a million and a quarter dollars, the provinces themselves obtaining half that in addition. Apart from this, the "Times" Red Cross Fund has collected 15 million dollars.

Each soldier has received a present consisting of a Christmas pudding, cigarettes, candy, tinned goods, a pipe and tobacco. There was enough money left over to furnish gifts for another million men. The extra funds will be used to send gifts to the wounded in the hospitals.

In the Navy also each sailor has received a package.

 THE GOAL IS NEAR! KING GEORGE'S MESSAGE TO HIS FORCES

London, Dec. 25.

The following is the text of a Christmas Message issued by King George to the British naval and military forces in active service:

"Soldiers! Another Christmas finds the resources of the Empire engaged in war. I desire to convey my own and the Queen's greetings and good wishes for Christmas and the New Year to all at sea who are upholding the honour and name of Britain, and to the officers and men of the Army, whether in France, in the East, or in other fields.

"I rely with equal faith and confidence that their devotion, valour and self-sacrifice will, under God's guidance, lead to victory and an honourable peace.

"There are, alas, many of your comrades in hospital; and to them I desire, with Her Majesty, to express our deep gratitude to them and our earnest prayers for their recovery.

"Officers and men of the Navy and Army! Another year has ended as it began, in toil, bloodshed and suffering; but I rejoice to know that the goal for which we are striving is near. May God bless all your undertaking."

 CHRISTMAS IN WARTIME GLOOMY PICTURE OF LIFE IN LONDON.

London, Dec. 25.

Much of the joyousness that used to distinguish Christmas and New Year's Day from other days has, temporarily at least, vanished in England. There are now no carol singers to be seen in the streets. Christmas trees, which formerly were imported in huge quantities from Germany, are a rarity. The darkness of the short winter days is made still further depressing by the heavy rain which is constantly falling and adds to the gloom produced by the war.

There does not appear to have been much falling off in the amount of shopping done at this time of year. At the hotels late suppers have been replaced by early dinners, chiefly owing to the strict regulations concerning lights in the city after dark.

 62 BELOW ZERO SWEDEN EXPERIENCES
SEVEREST COLD FOR 150 YEARS.

Stockholm, Dec. 24.

 CHRISTMAS IN PARIS THE WAR AND YULETIDE.

Paris, Dec. 25.

The second war-Christmas in Paris is less solemn than was the first, owing to the Parisians having become accustomed to the conditions imposed by the war.

Although the restaurants are not permitted to remain open, the boulevards were thronged during the afternoon, and the traditional booths did a roaring trade. Hundreds of soldiers, the French in gray, the Belgians in blue and the British in khaki, relieved the more sombre colours worn by the civilians; while a brilliant moon added to the artificial lighting of the streets.

All the theatres were full of people, while the religious services were both impressive and largely attended.

 CHRISTMAS IN NEW YORK THE INFLUENCE OF THE WAR.

New York, Dec. 25.

The Salvation Army headquarters here are thronged with applicants for the distribution of the dinner baskets, each of which contains six portions of turkey and chicken. Twenty thousand children have been presented with toys. At the churches, charitable organisations, hospitals and prisons there are Christmas trees, also on board the interned German vessels.

Hoboken and Brooklyn are swarming with people, and such an animated season has not been known for years, this being due to the general prosperity of the nation and the great increase in trade.

Nevertheless some of the street celebrations have been suppressed because of the war. On the Stock Exchange the customary "high jinks" were vetoed; but a fund was raised for the employees of the Exchange which yielded $17,000; while the members distributed among their own employees another $8,000.

 SIR ERNEST CASSEL GIVES £25,000 TO BRITISH RED

 GERMANS LOSE 8,000 MEN COSTLY ATTACK ON BRITISH LINES

Paris, Dec. 27.

A journalist who is with the French army at the western front says that during the 21st and 22nd of this month there was fierce and incessant fighting between Armentieres and Ypres in which the Germans lost 8000 men killed.

The object of the Prussians was to test the strength of the British lines, for which purpose they had recourse to every means at their disposal, including the use of poisonous gases at several points.

Twelve times the Germans attacked, reaching the British trenches in the face of a storm of fire from artillery and machine guns; but the bayonets drove them back, and they did not succeed in gaining a single inch of ground.

INSULTS TO GREECE PREMIER DENOUNCES THE ENTENTE

STORIES OF ASSISTANCE THAT WAS REFUSED

London, Dec. 23.

The following statements are reported to have been made by the Greek Premier Skouloudis to representatives of the Press:—

"Greece is in one of the most critical moments of her history, and her future presents a sombre aspect. When the time comes for the truth to be known it will be seen that the attacks which have been directed at Greece have been unjust.

"It is a fact that my country has attacked and criticised the British Government; but the fault is not ours but that of the Quadruple Entente alone.

"Greece is not fighting by the side of the Allies because the statesmen and diplomatic representatives of those Powers have not done their duties either to their own countries or to Greece.

"I have tried to avoid Macedonia being subjected to the horrors of war; but the province has been attacked with iron and fire and will now be devastated.

"The Allies have irritated Greece instead of dealing frankly with her. If they had frankly told us that they wanted our aid and that after the war we could count on due indemnity we would have placed ourselves by their side. But they asked us to co-operate with them in the Dardanelles and at the same time to give up Kavala to our mortal enemies. It was demanded that we should shed our blood in forcing the Dardanelles, but we were warned that we would not be allowed to occupy Constantinople.

"The Allies have offended us, and we, as is laid down in Scripture offered the other cheek. We honestly offered them our assistance and they refused it.

"As a proof of what I say, I may tell you that when the Allies sent the expedition to the Dardanelles we warned them that they were running great risks and were following the wrong road.

"The Germans say that the Bulgarians will not participate in the attack upon the Allies. According to Germany's official assurances, the Austro-German forces will be concentrated in the Gievski sector.

"The Greek General Staff long ago had prepared a plan of campaign against Turkey, and the Allies would have triumphed if they had adopted it.

Lately the Allies have been treating us like a conquered nation.

"In regard to the expedition to Salonica, it is a fact that Greece gave way before the insistent demands of the Allies despite of their unprecedented character. The occupation of the port was effected in a manner which went to the extreme of what could be called friendship. Quite recently one of the Ministers of the Entente called at my office and stated in an insolent manner that Greece had failed to carry out her promises. This was not true, and I told him so in his own language. Finally he flung a protest at me.

"In return for her friendship Greece sees her trade embargoed, her ships seized and her people starving in consequence.

"Now we are facing a terrible problem. What can we do to prevent our country from being drenched with blood? One group of belligerents is already in our country and the other is on the point of invading it.

"In accordance with the request of the Allies we have withdrawn part of our troops, although the Germans may enter at any moment, and this with perfect right on their side, seeing that the Allies are in Greece; and the Bulgarians also may enter.

The enemy who is victorious in Macedonia has his gaze fixed on Kavala and Ceres. As you see, Greece is destined to be devastated by a cruel and bloody war; and this only because the Allies have committed such grave errors both in diplomacy and in military tactics."

SOLDIERS URGED TO DEPOSE THE KAISER STARTLING APPEAL BY GERMAN SOCIALISTS

Rotterdam, Dec. 23.

A Christmas manifesto issued by Bernstein and nine others calls upon the German soldiers to leave the trenches and depose the Kaiser.

The manifesto declares that the campaign is not being waged in defence of Germany but to satisfy the greed of Prussian conspirators.

To-day the name of Germany is the scorn of civilisation, and Germany is hated by all honest men. Napoleon failed, and the Kaiser also will fail.

There will be no peace until the Kaiser has been dethroned and his fellow conspirators handed over to the executioner.

(This appears to be Edward Bernstein, the German Socialist leader, and formerly London correspondent of the paper "Vorwaerts").

THE HORRORS OF WAR

PEOPLE DIE OF HUNGER IN THE BALKANS.

London, Dec. 24.

Despatches from Athens report that the delay to the arrival of wheat from America has obliged the Greek Government to purchase wheat from Bulgaria. The ravages of war in south-eastern Serbia, where the Bulgarians have destroyed everything, are indescribable.

A telegram from Athens to the "Times" gives a piteous account of the condition of the inhabitants since the Bulgarians stopped the free distribution of flour by the American Red Cross. Thousands are without food, the worst cases being the Mussulman poor, who are dying daily of starvation.

rors both in diplomacy and in military tactics."

SENSATION CREATED IN LONDON

London, Dec. 23.

The interview with M. Skouloudis, which is printed in the "Daily Chronicle," has created a deep sensation. It is believed that it will serve as a sharp weapon for Sir Edward Carson and the other assailants of the Government. It is expected that the Prime Minister will have many questions on the subject put to him in the House of Commons.

A HUN OUTBURST

THE STATES AND NEUTRALITY

New York, Dec. 25.

The editor of the "Fatherland," Herr Vierck, has addressed a petition to the Secretary of State, from which the following is an extract:—

"I respectfully beg to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that Second Lieutenant Thaw and Sergeants Cowdin and Price, belonging to the French Flying Corps, arrived at New York by the steamer Rotterdam. In accordance with International Law, I demand the internment of these men.

"The active service of Americans in the French army is a gross violation of our neutrality, and under the provisions of the second article of the regulations passed at the Hague Conference they should be detained.

"In view of the fact that the neutrality of the United States Administration is being seriously called into question here and abroad, I hope that the article referred to will be acted upon and the men detained, unless they give their parole not to leave the country without permission.

"You are the champion of the rights of neutrals against the Teutons, and it is to be desired that the United States shows herself alive to her duties as a neutral."

THE PARTING OF THE WAYS.

London, Dec. 27.

The "Daily Express" publishes a telegram from Stockholm which states that the Ford peace mission has mutinied against Mr. Jenkins Jones who constituted himself head of the expedition. The latter also is disgusted with the whole business, and another member, Mrs. Boissevain, has announced her intention of separating from the party and going to Holland, as also have Judge Ben Lindsay and Mr. Ford's Secretary, Mr. Louis Lochner.

Apparently Mr. Ford has left the members of the mission to pay their own expenses.

ALLEN GARDINER HOMES, LOS COCOS

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.

Christmas Day was celebrated at the Allen Gardiner Homes, Los Cocos, in a manner entirely in keeping with the season.

Service was held as usual in the Church Room, which was decorated with beautiful flowers, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Brooke Fea, La Cumbre; Mrs. William Benitz, Greystone, Los Cocos; Mr. John Benitz, Cruz Grande; and Mrs. John Linton, Los Cocos.

In the afternoon the children went up to "Los Cocos," the house and grounds of the Rev. W. Hugh T. Blair, for tea and games. Tea was enjoyed in the shade of the trees, and was the gift as on former Christmas Days, of Miss Brown of "La Esperanza."

Mr. and Mrs. Constable of La Rosarina La Cumbre, also sent mince pies and cake, as did Mrs. Linton. The large Christmas cake sent by Mrs. William Benitz and daughters, was much appreciated, and the surprises it contained caused much merriment.

When the tea had been fully enjoyed, all adjourned to the dining room, which had been cleared and decorated with flags, flowers, etc., to listen or take part in a short programme of carols, songs, and recitations, until the sun was sufficiently low for romps in the field.

This gathering received a surprise visit from Father Christmas, in the proverbial red cloak and hood, hoary head and beard. His cheery voice being heard to sing "While Shepherds watched their flocks by night" in the distance, some time before the blast of his horn made every child on the "Qui vive" with curiosity and excitement. When he came into the room, followed by his servant with sack on back, and a query if "any good boys and girls were to be found there?" the delight of the little ones was unbounded. At his request the children sang a song entitled, "Sleigh Bells," with bell accompaniment. Father Christmas then presented every boy and girl with a beautiful book, and some chocolates, and left again amidst cheers.

Romps and fun in the field were the order of the day after that, until twilight and the breeze became too fresh to play longer, when all went in for more cake, cheers and leave takings. Christmas Day closed as it had begun, with "Peace and Goodwill," and all felt that with the exception of the unavoidable absence of a few friends, that as far as the children were concerned, Christmas Day this year left nothing to be desired.

Mr. and Mrs. Blair and their willing helpers wish to thank most heartily the friends who helped to make Christmas such a bright one for the children under their care, among whom are Miss Bruce Gibblings and Mrs. Wiggins, Lomas, for $20; the members of the San Isidro Guild, sweets, biscuits, and $50; the boys of St. George's College, $70.60; Mrs. F. Baxter, Hotel Los Molles, San Esteban $5; Mrs. Linton, flowers and cake; Mr. and Mrs. Constable, tarts and cakes; Mr. and Mrs. Brooke Fea, flowers and fruit and $20; Mrs. William Benitz, flowers and cake; Mr. John Benitz, flowers; Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Pilling, Buenos Aires, for 45 beautiful books and chocolate; and Mr. Pilling for impersonating so cleverly Father Christmas; Miss Ellis Dean, Miss Tomlinson, Miss Lindsey, and Mrs. Storey, for gifts; and Miss Brown for the tea.

MISS ADELA VERNE

Farewell Recital

AN ENTHUSIASTIC AUDIENCE

Miss Adela Verne's second concert of farewell at the Salon Teatro yesterday was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience. The numbers played have several of them been rendered before and were given again in response to urgent request. Among these were "The Legend of St. Francis Walking the Waves," a wonderful piece of sound description. "Noel," by Balfour Gardner, introducing the Carol of "Good King Wenceslas" and the sound of bells heard in the flurry of snow. Such themes may very easily be ruined but in the hands of this mistress of the piano, they never fail to produce their full effect. The Gavotte and the Musical Box were also notable but in fact, Miss Verne would never have done if she responded to all encores. A handsome bouquet was handed up to the stage during the second part of the programme. There will be a third opportunity for lovers of music to hear Miss Verne at the same locale on Wednesday next, January 5, at 5 p.m., when the first part of the programme will consist of Brahms, Schubert and Weber; the second entirely of Chopin; the third of works by Rubinstein, Alberto Williams and the terrible Dance Macabre of Saint Saens.

The Hon. Secretary of Queen Alexandra's Field Force Fund, writing under date November 30 to the British Society, says:—

"Please accept my very sincere thanks which I hope you will extend to the residents in Buenos Aires who have so generously contributed to the gifts you are sending me. It is very kind of the British residents to remember our fund, and I can assure you that the gifts will be very much appreciated by the men."

Gifts of any of the above named articles should be sent with as little delay as possible to Mr. W. Watson, Hon. Treasurer, the British Society, Calle Cangallo 536, second floor, so that a substantial parcel may be despatched at the very earliest moment.

SHIPPERS MEETING AT PREFECTURA

NEUTRAL AGENTS INTERVIEW PREFECT.

It would appear that recent happenings have not been without influence on the opinion of the Shipping Companies under neutral flags, and that the Port authorities consider it advisable to take steps to put matters on a plainer footing than heretofore. These are conclusions which may be legitimately drawn from the fact that yesterday a meeting of Dutch, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, etc., agents was convened at the offices of the Prefectura of the Port, and that the gentlemen concerned were engaged in close earnest and private conversation for more than an hour with the Prefect. Needless to say the greatest reserve is maintained as to the subject of this conference, but it is generally presumed, says a contemporary, that it had relation to navigation under neutral flags in jurisdictional waters.

LEGATION DESPATCHES

Battle at Kut-el-Mara

GARRISON REPULSE THE TURKS

The following telegram has been received by His Britannic Majesty's Minister at Buenos Aires from the Foreign Office, London:—

December 28 (2 p.m.).

December 27th. Secretary of State for India announces that on the 21th General Townshend reported that enemy fired heavily throughout previous night, but had not attacked. Later he reports further as follows:—"From 10 a.m. till past midnight position heavily shelled. The enemy having breached fort effected entrance, but were driven out, 200 Turkish dead left within fort. The fort in question is on right flank of his landward position on north side of Kut Peninsula."

On the 25th instant General Townshend reports further: "At midnight of the 24th and 25th fierce fighting for possession of fort occurred. The enemy effected lodgment in northern bastion, but were ejected. They returned and occupied bastion. Garrison held on to entrenchment and were reinforced. The enemy vacated bastion early on Christmas morning, and retired into trenches 400 to 900 yards in the rear, although attack had been made from trenches only 100 yards from breach. The rest of Christmas Day passed quietly.

Fort garrison in excellent spirits. We reoccupied bastion.

Enemy's casualties estimated at about 700, and our own at 190 killed and wounded. A whole division appears to have been engaged in the attack." Presumably 200 enemy dead mentioned in telegram of the 21th not included in above.

MERCEDES ORPHANAGE

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATIONS.

Last night, in the American Church, the anniversary of the Methodist Orphanage at Mercedes took place. The President of the General Committee, the Rev. Dr. McLaughlin, was in the chair.

Addresses were made by Bishop Stuntz, the Rev. E. N. Bauman, Director of the Orphanage, and by Prof. Paul Kreutzer, of Mercedes.

The financial statement was read by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Henry Martin. This is the institution for which the Orphanage Aid Society of the American Church works so constantly and successfully. With a thousand dollars paid by them this week, the total they have given to date amounts to eighteen thousand dollars. All the Methodist churches of this Conference make an annual collection for the Orphanage. At present the boys are "homed" in the Nicholas Lowe Institute, but the Orphanage owns a fine lot of twenty-six acres in the city of Mercedes, and sufficient money is in hand to put up the first building for the industrial and agricultural department. A wealthy man in the United States had promised Bishop Stuntz the money necessary to equip and endow it, but unfortunately he has met with business reverses, and the building is waiting until another friend who is both willing and able to endow it is found. An interesting feature of the anniversary was the singing by the choir of Flores Spanish Methodist Church.

ROSARIO NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Dec. 28.

Prize Distribution at St. Bartholomew's School.

I gave last week a programme of what was to take place at the prize-giving at St. Bartholomew's School, and it was duly fulfilled on the night of the 22nd. Much to my regret I was not able at the last minute to be there, but I understand that there was no change, and that the appreciation of the parents and others present well repaid the scholars and their mentors for the pains taken. The trial scene from the "Merchant of Venice" was the bulkiest item, and it was well rendered, G. Topping taking the part of the Duke, D. Richard that of Portia, S. Dickson that of Shylock, F. G. Coleman Antonio, E. Muir Bassano, J. Hollis Gratiano, J. Elter Salario and E. Ridway Nerissa. Minor parts were distributed amongst R. Caldwell, E. Ericksen, V. Hallberg, L. Whittall, A. Cicutti, G. Gibbons, R. Weir, F. Kean, W. Walton, W. Didden, F. J. Coleman and M. Dickson. Much care is taken with the language of our Ally France, and a recitation "L'Oiseau Mouche" by F. G. Coleman was a most creditable performance. The French class rendered "Bergere." J. Hollis led the song "Britannia the Pride of the Ocean," and the Singing Class contributed two or three items, including "Heart of Oak" (erroneously listed as "Hearts" as a concession to popular fallacy). Mrs. Dickson distributed the prizes in graceful manner, and a number of ladies refreshments in the interval.

The Children's Christmas.

The kindness of the Editor of the HERALD in giving publicity to the announcement of the Children's Fete organised for Christmas Day by the British Ladies' Committee in Association with ladies of the Committee of French and Belgian has been much appreciated. Certainly there was a very large attendance, including not less than 250 children and about 150 grown-ups, and every seat was occupied. Never have the ladies who take upon themselves the representation of the community worked harder. At best children are not easy to marshal, even when there has been plenty of time for rehearsal, and there is a basis of school discipline to work upon. When at the conclusion of the cinematograph entertainment the screen veiling the tree was removed, it required all the efforts of the stalwarts present, plus the boy scouts, plus the ladies to keep the young members in place. Fortunately there was no lack of presents; nearly every child received at least two; and some of our future business sharps managed by the process of returning again and again, and finding a crook to receive their hauls, to score four or five! Mr. Ainsworth, of the London and River Plate Bank took office in the royal robes of Father Christmas, and right well he looked, he will be as surely marked down for this role as a permanency as is another financial gentleman in another local sphere of influence. The music for the occasion was provided by the string orchestra of the Talleres. Two of the more expensive toys were put up to raffle, and being won by French gentlemen were, as is the wont of messieurs, handed back to the Committee, and in this way realized their value several times over. Altogether, considering how many counter attractions of a more private character there were to contend with, the fete was a huge success, far exceeding expectations, for the $1000 mark was passed, whereas $600 had been anticipated as an outside figure. The profits are destined for war orphans, that is children of British, French and Belgian soldiers and sailors who are sacrificed in the task of subjugating the Hun. The Committee desire to express their thanks to M. Leonard for the loan of the wigs and costume for Father Christmas, to the managers of the Savoy and Italia Hotels for the loan of crockery, etc. to

Mr. Shaw who made the presence of gentlemen possible by a donation of beer and ice, and to a number of business establishments who gave favourable terms to purchasers of toys for the fete.

School Concert and Prize-giving at Alberdi.

On Tuesday 21 the School Concert and distribution of prizes took place at the Alberdi High School, the Rev. S. C. Deacon being in the chair. The Concert opened with the singing of the "Himno Nacional" followed by a recitation "When I'm a man" by the small boys in forms I and II. Edible Fones, three, gave a recitation in Spanish entitled "Perseverancia" and the girls of forms I, II and III sang "Ma Curly headed Babby" by G. H. Cludsane. Eileen Hosford contributed a pianoforte solo "Estudio Op. 45" by S. Heller, which received hearty applause. "The Bells" by J. L. Hattios was given by the Senior Singing Class and a recitation "An Eastern Legend" by form III. This was followed by a French recitation "Nous verrons" by Eileen Hosford, and a pianoforte solo "Estudio Op. 45" S. Heller by Alejandra Rosenbaum. The action song "Merry Little Gypsies" by the Junior Singing Class was particularly well done and deservedly received an extra round of applause. Kathleen Edward's pianoforte solo "Molto Allegro" Sonata, C. Minor was rendered with taste and feeling. The dialogue extrait the "Bourgeois Gentil homme" Molière, by Florence Beane and Margarita Rosenbaum was very creditably given as also the Spanish piece "Las Tres Hijas del Cielo," by F. Beane, D. Gar-side and L. Manley. "Curfew must not ring to-night," given by Gosline Fones and accompanied on the piano by Florence Beane was exceedingly well rendered and the French song "Barcarolle" by the French Classes met with well earned applause. The concert ended with the "Trial Scene" from the "Merchant of Venice" by forms V and VI which was distinctly good, each girl entering thoroughly into the character she represented. A more successful entertainment has seldom been given, the singing was universally declared to be exceptionally good and all the children seemed to thoroughly enter into what they were doing and to enjoy it.

After the Concert the Rev. S. C. Deacon in a few words thanking the pupils for the enjoyable concert, said that it only represented a fraction of the years work, proof of more work could be seen in the class rooms, in the examination papers, in the drawing, needle-work, etc., which were on view. He also took the opportunity of thanking all for the help at the Bazaar and said that in all receipts amounted to close on $1200. Miss Gillbee then gave a short resume of the year's work, which was followed by the distribution of prizes by Mrs. Spencer Dickson, and Mr. Dickson spoke emphasising the importance of educational work and the advantages enjoyed by Alberdi in having a school carried on in such a thoroughly efficient and up to date manner.

Weather and Crops.

The holiday weather has been generally speaking ideal; and following on the nice rains of the preceding week nothing better could have been desired for the crops. Both maize and wheat look like being record yields; whether they can be brought to the European market remains to be seen. There was a slight fall of hail one day last week, but the damage was extremely partial.

In the markets a holiday tone has prevailed. Maize inactive, though prices have ruled firmer, with business done as high as 4.78 1/2, a figure still obtainable.

Wheat prices, in sympathy with U.S.A. markets, have fluctuated considerably. Local and Brazilian millers have shown interest in actual wheat for January delivery and some business has been done at prices showing about 80 cents above export parity. January option is quoted 9.50, February 9.20 and March 9.25.

Prices for linseed have advanced during the week from 11.25 to 12.15, accounted for, to some extent, probably, by unfavourable reports as to yields.

The freight market has been steady, a number of boats having been fixed at 118/6 to 120/- U.K. usual charter.

Talleres Sunday School.

This afternoon at four o'clock there were high times at the Talleres Church Hall, the occasion being the annual distribution of prizes to the children attending the Sunday School, and the not less annual Christmas Tree, Santa Claus was very ably impersonated by a gentleman who has already won distinction in this role in years past. His secret—an open one—I will pretend not to know. The Rev. S. C. Deacon was present, of course, and still further endeared himself to the hearts of the children. A bountiful tea served as ballast to the occasion

NAVIGATION TO SOUTH PORTS

INCREASED FACILITIES TO COASTERS.

A consultation has taken place between the Minister of Agriculture and the President of the Republic regarding the obstacles and difficulties existing in the case of free navigation of steamers running to and serving Southern Ports.

The questions of National Registry and Navigation to the South are interdependent and there are also some regulations which the companies regard as highly inconvenient. It is understood that the Ministry of Agriculture is in favour of giving every facility for loading and discharge to boats running South and that these operations may be performed with the minimum of delay after arrival on port at any hour or on feast days. The regulations of the Prefectures in the South are regarded as deliberately intended to hamper. Both Messrs. Mihanovich and Messrs. Delfino are understood to have indicated to the Ministry their views at considerable length. The question of fares and tariffs will be separately considered.

OPENING OF SESSIONS.

Wednesday

Yesterday morning at 8.30 the second session of the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church began, and was taken up largely by the reading of the reports of the District Superintendents.

The Rev. E. A. Bauman, Superintendent of the Buenos Aires district, read the first report, in which he made mention of the very encouraging condition of the churches in La Plata, Lomas, Lanús, Junín, Chacabuco, and Mercedes.

The Rev. F. J. Batterson, Superintendent of the Bahia Blanca district, reported progress in the churches under his direction, mentioning particularly the work done in Bahia Blanca, Dolores, and the church recently established in Patagones.

The report of the work in the Northern District was read by Rev. G. W. Werner, who was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Rev. C. J. Turner. Mr. Werner spoke of the special blessing that had attended the churches in Cordoba and Rosario during the year. The educational work in this district, such as is carried on in Rosario, Venado Tuerto and Cañada de Gomez, has been well sustained.

Dr. S. P. Craver reported on the work done in the First Church of Buenos Aires (which in special collections alone has raised over $5,000 m/n.) and the Second Church, whose pastor is Dr. Thomson.

FRATRICIDE IN MONTEVIDEOMURDER ON CHRISTMAS DAY

The police of Montevideo are engaged on another of the recurring bloody family tragedies which offer a monotonous sameness in the horror and stupid ferocity of their characteristics. At Piedritas there dwelt a family named Vasquez composed of Doña Dominga Risso de Vasquez, her son Enrique and another son Domingo with his wife Sofia to whom he had recently been married. The elder brother, one of those tyrannical and bullying natures which unless resisted become impossible, had exercised unlimited influence in the household. Not liking his brother's marriage he would have expelled him from the house but for the fact that the mother objected. To show, however how lightly he esteemed the maternal opinion he brought a woman to the house who, he stated was his mistress and insisted on her living in the family.

On Christmas Day some visitors called at the house and in making the introductions, the elder Sra. Vasquez apparently forgot the presence of the woman of questionable position. This infuriated the scoundrel elder, who vociferating that it was done at his brother's instance and to spite him, drew a revolver and with cool malice shot his younger brother four times killing him on the spot. Domingo's wife who endeavoured to protect him, also received a bullet in the neck and is in a serious condition. It is added that the family is Argentine and the fratricide is under arrest.

CUATRERISMOFORMOSA—CATTLE THIEF'S PARADISE.

The moss troopers of Formosa are doing well in the cattle-lifting business, and the industry is reported flourishing. "Cuatrismo" is, however, not the sole occupation of some of the operators, who diversify it by an occasional murder and a little footpad or highway practice, and the "capataz" of Captain Fidel Valbuena has just been killed in broad daylight, it is believed by the cattle collectors, to show they will not be trifled with. Numerous thefts and robberies have recently been committed, and these are greatly facilitated by the economical custom of extinguishing the alcohol lamps. There is no hope in the police, as the chief says he has no force at his disposal. The excuse seems sound, but it is pointed out that such police as there are chiefly occupy themselves in drawing up reports and in paying visits to the neighbours rather than guarding the lives and fortunes of the inhabitants.

Both the Director of Territories and the Minister of the Interior have been advised of these facts, and it is hoped that they will replace the officials mentioned by others less handy with the pen and more energetic in pursuit of the public good, cattle bandits and town thieves.

SALARIES AT ROSARIOUNPAID PROVINCIAL SERVANTS AND FORCES.

The Government of Santa Fé is in very bad odour with its employes, and no wonder. From Rosario comes the report that, while the month of December is in its last days, yet the Administration has not yet paid one cent. of the salaries due in November.

With engaging frankness the Government says it has no money to pay withal, but does not dispense with the services of those it cannot remunerate. The higher officials see that their pay comes in. Universal blame is hurled at the faulty Administrators who are peculiarly foolish in that they are not even keeping their Praetorians in good humour. The Squadron of Security, the Bomberos, and the Police, are as ill treated as the rest, and if émentes happen—what will occur? It is too much to expect unpaid men to risk their skins for ungrateful politicians.

SUICIDE OR THIEF?ARREST OF MAN OF MANY ALIASES.

Solitude is generally unfavourable to the criminal, both for lack of opportunity to practice and because he becomes unpleasantly conspicuous. Hence the gregarious dispositions of gentlemen who have had a dispute with "Old Father Antick, the Law," and their fondness for collecting names. On Monday, a person of shady antecedents was arrested on the gangway of the s.s. Viena in a crowd of hurrying passengers, and wearing a large group of borrowed appellatives, a selection of which runs Adrian Schoretz, Israel Choreta, Assial Chore, Alejandro Forz, or Chosa, or Noss, or perhaps Chouse. This multiple personality avers a peculiarly mean knave, for having lived some time at Cerrito 32 with a woman silly enough to be fond of him, he suddenly informed her that he found life so insupportable a bore that he was going to kill himself, and do it at once, too, with horrid circumstances and much bloodshedding. The lady, one Mignon Altermann, is evidently not a student of Dickens, otherwise she might have remembered Mr. Mantalini and his frequent resolves to "become a dam'd, damp, moist, unpleasant body." Animated by a misplaced desire to save the rogue, she ran down stairs screaming "da capo" while the desperate suicide collected her jewellery and all available cash, with which he disappeared. He had been to Brazil and had just returned thence via Concordia, when unfortunately Detective Arturo Gerding recognised him and has provided him with a fixed address.

NATIONAL OIL DEPOSITSGREATLY INCREASED OUTPUT EXPECTED.

By reason of the constantly increasing demand for the products of the national oil fields, the Minister of Agriculture has, in conjunction with the President, been considering means for encouraging and increasing the exploitation of those resources.

The entire plan, which is on a great scale, has been submitted to and accepted on principle by Dr. de la Plaza.

An interview also took place yesterday afternoon between the Ministers of Finance and Agriculture, and it has been decided to issue bonds to the extent of several millions of pesos, to make more borings, erect further workshops, sheds, pumping machinery and other requisites, not forgetting the purchase of several tank steamers for transport of the oil from Comodoro Rivadavia. A vessel of this class, recently purchased by the Government in the United States, will shortly arrive. She has an oil-carrying capacity of about 4000 tons. It is understood that a contract for the purchase of another American oil vessel, carrying 3000 tons, will shortly be signed.

It is hoped with these greatly increased facilities to ensure a much larger production and use of the oil than hitherto; in fact, the production of petroleum, which at the beginning of the year was about 6000 tons, only, has increased to between 8000 and 10,000, and if all goes well should attain 15,000 tons per month, or 170,000 tons a year.

CATAMARCA GRAPE CROPSQUANTITY AND QUALITY.

From Tinogasta, in the Province of Catamarca, reports state that the grape harvest, and specially of grapes for table consumption, will be excellent, both in quantity and quality. Numerous buyers have arrived in consequence from Tucuman, Cordoba and Buenos Aires, and the crop will probably realise satisfactory prices.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTENGINE DERAILED ON F.C.S.

A report reached Laprida on Dec. 24 about 1 p.m. that the train which left that place for Bahia Blanca at 5 a.m. had come to disaster at Las Hermanas, 8 miles away, and that several persons had been bruised and injured. The train is No. 205 of the F.C.S., and the accident occurred at a distance of 218 kilometres from Bahia Blanca and 18 from Olavarria. At the entrance to the station the engine became suddenly derailed, checked in its progress and brought up with violence against the vehicles behind it. There were on the train 80 passengers in the sleeping cars, 40 firsts and 80 seconds. The parcels van was badly damaged, and Monte, the guard of that coach, has sustained severe hurts. The driver, Uzabei, had his arm broken, and the fireman, Lewis, was very badly bruised. A train with all necessary assistance was despatched from Olavarria and another from Bahia Blanca, as well as breakdown gangs and engineers to examine the cause. The latter is alleged to be an imperfection in the points, which remained closed although the signal was down and the machinery open. The station master at Las Hermanas declares that when the Laprida train arrived the switch was working perfectly, and there is an alternative theory that some defect in the engine itself caused it to mount the rails.

The track was cleared last night and the uninjured coaches went on to Olavarria, thence to Lamadrid, Pringles, and Bahia Blanca.

STATE RAILWAYS

In his decree dealing with the future of the State Railways, the Minister of Public Works has mentioned certain specified works which he considers are essential and should be carried out at once.

These are chiefly, the installation of signals and other means to ensure greater safety at the station of Laguna Paira on the Central Northern line; the construction of a fence around the station of General Pinedo on the same line, a connecting side line between the second and third lines to the North of Urundel Station. At Cebollar a water tank is to be erected and sheds for storage purposes.

By another decree the Minister has issued the necessary orders for the construction of a branch line between Aymogasta and Quiringa, the cost of which is estimated at $100,000.

All these matters are dealt with and provided for in the Minister's note which will be included in the figures of the new loan.

A VALUELESS GIFTGOVERNMENT SEED IN ENTRE RIOS.

At the request of the Governor of the Province of Entre Rios, Dr. Antonio Sagarna, the expert agricultural engineer Sr. Yamandi is making a tour through certain departments of that Province, with a view of gathering data and making a report upon the actual state of the harvest.

From Gualeguay comes a telegram from the expert in which he says, that the sowing of wheat and flax in the province has been a complete failure.

He states that seed proceeding from the Pampa was used and was poor seed, consisting of only two or three different species, some of which came to maturity too soon and some too late.

A great deal more should be known and published concerning local conditions, of climate and of a knowledge of botany and agriculture.

The result of the government gifts of seeds to the farming community has, according to Engineer Yamandi, resulted in a serious loss, which he estimates at 600,000 quintals having a value of at least half a million pesos.

SEDITIONARY SERGEANTS AT RIODEPUTY DEFENDS MUTINOUS PLOT.

Rio reports give further particulars of the late attempted sedition by the sergeants of the army which might have had the most serious consequences.

Deputy Mauricio Lacerda, in favour of whose proposals the movement was started, defended himself in a speech in Congress on Wednesday, and attempted to justify the action of the supernumerary rank, even if it were admitted as seditious. Many sergeants, he said, resorted to his house, but no plotting took place there, and he declared that the movement was similar to that of 1889, which was destined to proclaim a Parliamentary Republic.

The leader of the Majority, Dom Antonio Carlos, said he had listened with astonishment to the statements of Senhor Lacerda, who actually applauded a movement which he well knew to be seditious and which obliged the Government to proceed with the utmost rigour to suppress it. The guilt of a large number of sergeants appears to be proved.

ESCAPE OF A RINGLEADER

Enquiries continue into the attempted sedition by Sergeants of the Brazilian Army, but the authorities decline to make any definite statement on the subject.

A fact which may or may not be of special significance, is the escape which has just occurred, of one of the ringleaders most deeply compromised in the movement, who contrived means or had them provided, to get out of the Fort of Santa Cruz, in which he was interned. The police are said to be hunting for him.

POLITICS IN ENTRE RIOSTWO MEN MURDERED BY POLICE-SERGEANT.

Two well-known gentlemen in Maria Grande in the Province of Entre Rios have been killed by a sergeant of police named Rodriguez.

There are several versions of the crime. Some of these state that Rodriguez revenged himself on Senor José Villaraza, one of the murdered men, for various acts of injustice, but the version in which more confidence is put is that Rodriguez was drunk and attacked Senores Villaraza and Claudelino Barzola for political reasons. He shot them both.

The affair has created much concern. Senor Villaraza was the brother of the Provincial Deputy Esteban Villaraza, and Sr. Barzola was a wealthy and well-known business man in Maria Grande. Both gentlemen belonged to the Democratic Party, amongst which the greatest consternation reigns.

PURCHASES OF MULESBRITISH AND FRENCH GOVERNMENTS' ACTIVITY.

It would appear from the latest reports that the English and French Government agents who are at present in the Argentine charged with the purchase of mules for the Allied armies are making but little progress. But these reports require to be accepted with reserve.

Chiefly active in Cordoba, Tucuman, Salta and Jujuy the agents are offering a hundred up to a hundred and fifty pesos per head for mules from four to twelve years old.

The statement—a doubtful one—is made that owners and breeders of mules can easily get 150 to 200 dollars per head and are therefore unwilling to sell at the prices offered by the government agents.

Now that there is evidence of a fresh movement for purchasing mules and horses, it will soon be possible to judge of the average basis upon which business is done.

19th November, 1915

Fred. Shaw, Esq.,

Resident Engineer,

F.C. Central del Uruguay,
Montevideo.

Dear Mr. Shaw,

I wonder how you are all getting on? So far I have escaped all harm (touch wood!). I am now attached to the "G" Field Ambulance, and my home is 1800 yards behind the firing line. There is a nice dug-out to retire to if things become too warm. I hope to go home on leave for a week this month and enjoy the luxury of a bed. The winter is on us and the frozen feet are beginning to come in. Poor fellows; it is awful for them to stand in water all night.

Recuerdos to all the family,

BRITISH RIFLE FIRE

SUPERIORITY OVER THAT OF THE ENEMY.

One fact that has been lost sight of in this war is, to some extent, responsible for the striking success which has attended the British rifle fire. The rifle is sighted for a greater distance than either the German or the French. Consequently it frequently happens that the British troops cut up the German advance for nearly ten minutes before the extreme sight of the German rifle can be brought into operation.

KILLED IN ACTION

PRIVATE CHARLES P. WADDLE.

Those who knew Mr. C. P. Waddle when he was in Argentina will regret to hear that he was killed in action at Loos, while serving with the Seaforth Highlanders. The story of his death is contained in the following letter from one of his comrades:—

"Just a few lines, my last promise to poor Charlie, to let you know that Charlie was killed on the 25th Sept. Our Battalion led a charge and it cost us dear and Charlie was one of the many heroes who gave up their lives for the sake of their King and Country. I was not with him at the time but from enquiries I found out that an order was passed along and when Charlie had it half spoken he was hit in the neck and death must have been instantaneous. I will miss him as much as I would my own brother for he and I have been chums since we met at Aldershot. I will try and recover anything he had in his possession and let you have it as soon as possible.

"I don't like this job at all and I am afraid I have broken the news rather coarsely.

"I was attached to the stretcher bearers and was close behind the boys all the time but could find no trace of Charlie as we were forced to retire.

"I don't know how any one escaped at all it was through hell with a vengeance, and those who escaped death are mighty lucky.

"Well, I will close now.

"Hoping you will excuse my roughness and accept my deepest sympathy.

I remain,

Yours, etc.,

A. SHERLAW."

Some weeks later, the Rev. William Crawford, Chaplain to the Forces, sent the following letter to his sister:—
Nov. 16, 1915.

Dear Madam,

If you have not heard from the War Office, I regret to convey to you the tidings of your brother's death in action on Sept. 25 last. We have only just received word of the finding of his body and burial in the field, the reason for delay being that the ground where he fell, has been under constant shell fire day and night and only at considerable risk can burial take place. The news must be sadder coming after weeks of suspense and waiting. It is however something to know the worst. Your brother died I believe instantly and died after behaving himself like a true soldier. I can assure you of deep sympathy of his Battalion who feel his loss keenly.

Believe me

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM CRAWFORD,
Chaplain.

KEEPING THE OLD FLAG FLYING

ENGLISH LETTER TO A LOCAL RESIDENT.

Mr. Henry Martin, of this city, has received a letter from his brother, Mr. Thos. A. Martin, of Wimbledon, who has his three sons in the war, from which he sends us the following extracts. The letter is dated Sept 15, 1915:—

We got the BUENOS AIRES HERALD, with my letter printed in it. Had I known that you intended publishing it, I might have made it more interesting and I would have taken particular care not to have made myself liable to imprisonment under the Defence of the Realm Act, by revealing matters which would give information to the enemy, though in all probability the Germans are pretty well au courant with the information from their sources. I mean my mentioning the fact about Klitchener's Army. I may mention, however, that on Wednesday night last, as we were retiring to rest, we were startled by hearing several loud reports, and on going to the front of the house, could see the faint form of a Zeppelin, about a mile high, making its way north over London, and heard the reports of the anti-aircraft guns. It disappeared from our view; but, the following morning, the papers reported the raid and the deaths of 17 persons, while a personal view of the destruction caused in the city revealed the awful power of the bombs dropped on the houses. If the Germans think they can frighten the people of England by such acts, they are much mistaken. This "massacre of the innocents" solely rouses their indignation and serves to increase the numbers who join the forces—all imbued with the one desire—that of crushing the savage and murderous nation that wages wanton warfare on humanity.

I should not advise you to travel—for a while, at least—while the Germans carry on their diabolical policy of submarining harmless passenger and merchant vessels. It cannot, in the nature of things, last very long now. They have lost more than half their submarine fleet, according to our First Lord of the Admiralty—so that 50 per cent. of the submarines that left their base on their errand of murder are now at the bottom of the sea. The destruction of these submarines has been carried on by our destroyers effectively and silently, without the public being any the wiser, as the Admiralty will not allow any news to be published; though we hear from private sources—officers and sailors on leave home—that scarcely a week passes without one of these pirates being sent to the bottom. Two of them were discovered by aircraft reposing at the bottom of Portsmouth harbour, and, having located them, they took means of keeping them there indefinitely by means of steel nets and cable-chains. This we heard from one engaged in the naval service, and the statement by the First Lord bears it out.

I had a letter from Bob, who is on the "Encounter." He is still on the same job of keeping the seas clear of the German pirates. He envies, he says, the boys in the Grand Fleet and the destroyers, the job of hunting submarines—which, he says, "is better than fox-hunting." He was married to a young girl on January 4 last. I had a letter from her describing the wedding. It appears that about 40 of Bob's shipmates, unknown to him, went to the church, and were there when he arrived. While they were signing the register, they rigged up an arch in the aisle, under which they had to pass, and smothered them with confetti. Outside, they took the horses from the shaft, and drew the newly-married couple through the town to the Compton Hall, where 120 guests, including some of the high officials of the place, sat down to the wedding-breakfast, and attended the reception which was held afterwards by the bride's mother. Speeches and dancing occupied the company till the evening, when the happy pair started off on their honeymoon, Bob having got 10 days' leave from his ship. When he was three days away he was recalled

TO THE BRITISH PATRIOTIC COMMITTEE IN URUGUAY

(Exclusively communicated)

London, Nov. 22, 1915.

The Mistake about Serbia.

Events in the Near East continue to engage attention to an extent which can only be explained by the extreme and tantalising uncertainty of the situation. At the beginning of the year Austria's threat to Serbia, although it looked more formidable than any of her previous menaces, failed to distract attention in this country from the main theatre of war. Indeed the crushing defeat eventually inflicted by Serbia on the invader, although it excited universal admiration and unbounded enthusiasm, was regarded for a long time as merely an incident of the general conflict, not of much importance except to the gallant Serbians themselves. Doubtless that was a mistaken view. But for the Serbian victory earlier in the year the Central Powers might have been eight or ten months in advance with their timetable in the Balkans, encouraged moreover by infinitely better prospects of success than they now command, and certainly with far larger resources to draw upon. Reviewed in retrospect therefore, the Austrian defeats are seen to have been of vital importance.

The situation in the Near East.

Yet it is difficult even to-day to persuade the English public that very great issues depend on the fortunes of war in the Near East. Frankly, they are quite unmoved by the German boastings about an ultimate Turco-German advance via the Dardanelles on Egypt and India. Any such adventure would bring those who embarked on it into collision with not the weakest but the strongest bulwarks of the British Empire and of the result of such an encounter nobody here has any doubt. On the other hand, popular feeling has been profoundly stirred by the spectacle of the attack on one small State by the combined forces of Germany, Austria and Turkey and in particular by the lamentable treachery of Bulgaria in adding a fourth assailant to this unchivalrous combination. From one point of view Bulgaria's part in the invasion has been one of the most harmful incidents of the war. It has inflicted a deep and shattering though not, let us hope, a fatal blow on the fine English tradition of sympathy with small nationalities, and faith in the enduring character of racial gratitude. Disillusion has come and with it a changed and sterner attitude towards the vacillations of Greek policy manifested in the general willingness with which and had to sail away to a "destination unknown." He has been back, however, to Sydney, and the ship having to go through an overhauling, she stayed for two months—so that made up for his short honeymoon. The report of the wedding appeared in the leading local paper, headed "Our First Naval Wedding," and giving a glowing description of the affair. As soon as the war is over, he leaves the Navy and will stay in the Colonies.

Harry, your namesake, is still in the depot at Canterbury, training recruits. He does not think he will be sent back to the front; but one never knows.

I had a letter from Charley, my youngest, the first since the war broke out. He has had some thrilling experiences on the "Papumatta" in capturing German colonies, and, fortunately, escaped injury in an engagement in which six of his mates were killed. He is patrolling the seas, like Bob, and does not come anywhere near the big fighting, like the Dardanelles.

I will close now, as I have three other letters to write to the Colonies.

exhortations to a fuller use of the iron hand in diplomacy are now entertained. If Bulgaria's conduct has weakened the British faith in moral factors in war time, it has at the same time quickened and hardened the British resolve to exact retribution on behalf of Serbia by force of arms. At the present moment it is this motive more than any other that keeps the gaze of England fixed on the Balkans.

Mr. Bonar Law's Optimism.

At no former period of the war indeed could such a distraction have been conceivable. Until lately the attention of the country had remained concentrated on the situation in Russia and France, and if some relaxation of that fixed preoccupation is now possible it can only be for one reason, that the position of the Allies both in France and Russia is at last felt to be secure. Day by day, as everyone knows, and as is specially well known by the Austro-German military leaders, strength is being added to strength on the two Allied fronts alike in men and munitions. It is because of his knowledge of what is happening in those decisive arenas that Mr. Bonar Law, who is supposed to have taken a somewhat gloomy view of the war in the past, now announces that he is more hopeful of the prospects of the Entente Allies than he has been for many months. Ministers generally share their colleague's confidence and with good reason, since they have information not yet available to the outside world concerning the extent of both their own and the enemy's resources.

Freedom of Speech.

One sign of the easier feeling that prevails among the best informed classes as to the general situation is forthcoming in the greater latitude of speech recently claimed and asserted in both Houses of Parliament. Some of the speeches made within the last few days—notably those of Sir Edward Carson, Lord Ribblesdale and Mr. Churchill—have caused surprise at home, astonishment in Germany and no slight concern in neutral and friendly countries. In truth, no more hopeful symptom could be imagined than the apparent indiscretions of those orators. Earlier in the war, when the outlook was believed to be darker and more perilous than now, the two Houses were models of discretion. No Government proposal was either opposed or debated. A reckless speech would have been shouted down, but as no reckless speeches were attempted, the necessity for such discipline did not arise. Now that the earlier tension is over—now, in other words, that the general tendencies of victory are seen to be inclining more and more decisively on the side of the Allies—old habits are reasserting themselves and individual orators are permitted to be as rash and as censorious as they like. It may seem a paradoxical method of showing confidence, but it is unquestionably an old-established English method.

Allies' War Council.

Perhaps the most popular step lately taken by the Government has been the despatch of the Prime Minister with his principal colleagues to France to confer with the French Government on matters affecting the conduct of the war. A closer co-operation between the Allies in questions of policy and strategy is ardently desired by British public opinion, which indeed would be glad to see the principle of such international councils extended. For instance, if Russia and Italy were to be represented at the next conference, a cause of uneasiness would at once be removed, since there has been a feeling for some time past that in comparison with the Central Powers the Entente Allies have been working at a disadvantage through their rather detached methods of co-operation. Of the general political value of such conferences it is impossible to speak too emphatically. It is known that the Anglo-French Council has shattered certain hopes that were springing up in Berlin. As the war goes

AIDING THE WOUNDED

NETLEY HOSPITAL

THE "PALERMO" BEDS.

As already reported in THE HERALD the Palermo members of the Buenos Aires branch of the Overseas Club have provided two beds at the British Red Cross Hospital, Netley, (England).

To-day photographs of the two beds are reproduced, together with a description of their first occupants:—

Palermo No. 1.—Private E. Smith, 8615, 2nd Hamps. with 5½ years service. From Portsmouth; 2 weeks in Gallipoli; nature of injury: gunshot wound in arm; banded with first party from s.s. River Clyde at Y. Beach, advanced and took the crest of the Hill; wounded while capturing trenches in front of Krithia. Condition: Progressing favourably.

Palermo No. 2.—Private S. F. Bush, 10384, 5th Wilts, 14 months service, from Kennington, London; nature of injuries: gunshot wound left hand and left knee. Two months in Gallipoli; was wounded during attack at Achi Baba under heavy machine gun fire. Condition: Progressing favourably.

on, the Allies, instead of drifting apart as Germany had anticipated, are seen to be coming closer together. When Russia and Italy send their representatives to the same council table with France and England, the demonstration will be complete. Evidently it will not be long in coming.

HELP THE BELGIANS

Winter and the Refugees

SIR REGINALD TOWER'S APPEAL

HERALD readers have a warm corner in their hearts for the citizens of gallant little Belgium. Ever since we first appealed for contributions towards the Belgian relief funds, money has come in with commendable regularity. Those donations, however, have been despatched to the Relief Committee of Bexhill, Sussex, who represent only a small section of the refugees. In London there are more than ten thousand Belgians, exiled from home because their country dared to face the German advance. With the approach of winter their plight is once again desperate.

Sir Reginald Tower, K.C.M.G., C.V.O., H.B.M. Minister in Buenos Aires, some time ago appealed to estancieros for gifts of live animals which would be slaughtered and consigned to England for relief work. The response to the appeal was a generous one, but needs are again pressing and Sir Reginald is once again relying on the generosity of stock owners to enable the relief workers to cope with the difficulty. The circular letter reprinted below speaks for itself. All we would add is that it is the duty of every Briton able to assist to do so by answering the appeal without delay.

"You will remember I issued a Circular letter last Christmas asking for contributions of live animals in order to afford assistance to Belgian refugees in the United Kingdom.

"I am pleased to say the response to my appeal was a very generous one, so much so that we have been able to keep up a regular supply to the present time.

"A cablegram has just been received from London reading as follows:—

Refugees have only meat to last to end of year. We are anxiously awaiting further consignments, and are feeding over ten thousand daily. Can you help?

"Reply has been sent that we are sending about eight tons of meat, to be followed by a further ten tons. This will exhaust our means, and I have now to bring to your notice the state of destitution to which these poor people will be reduced if the supply fails, especially in English mid-winter.

"I therefore confidently appeal to you for further and immediate help to carry on this most deserving work. I should like at the same time to express my thanks to all those who have contributed animals: to the Freezing, Shipping and Insurance Companies for the gratuitous help afforded by them, and also to those Estancieros who not only contributed cattle themselves, but collected and arranged for the trucking of the animals destined to the Frigorificos.

"You will doubtless be interested to know the result of my former appeal:—

301 Oxen and Cows were contributed by Estancieros.

150 Lambs were also contributed.

83 Cattle were purchased with proceeds of Hides and Offals, and sufficient money is in hand for purchasing a further 20 animals.

"With the exception of Railway freight no cost whatever has been entailed in the handling of this business.

"Please communicate with me or to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Thomas Lloyd, Calle Sarmiento 459, Buenos Aires."

Yours faithfully,

REGINALD TOWER.

His Britannic Majesty's Minister, and Chairman of the British Patriotic Committee.

AN ADVENTURE IN BRITISH PAPUA

A True Story

BY AN EX-GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL

At the time of the adventure related in this story gold was being found in British Papua to a somewhat considerable extent on the upper Gira River and McLaughlin's Creek, the port for which places was the Mambare River. Owing to the unsettled state of the native population, a strong body of native police was stationed there. The reports received from time to time as to the yield of gold were generally favourable. No reefs had been discovered, but the alluvial deposits were rich, and the gold was worth about £4 2s. an ounce. Consequently, as the Tamata settlement (about 50 miles up the Mambare) seemed likely to become permanent and thriving, His Excellency the Governor deemed it advisable to have the locality surveyed, and sent me his instructions to that effect.

I therefore proceeded to the Mambare, by the Government steam yacht "Merrie England," the Chief Judicial Officer, Sir Francis Winter, accompanying me.

Upon arrival at Tamata we found the Commandant of Police there very ill with blackwater fever. From him we learned that the Resident Magistrate in charge had died about six weeks earlier, upon which the Commandant had assumed charge, only to succumb shortly afterwards to the same complaint.

His Honour then decided to take the Commandant away and leave me temporarily in charge, with a subordinate officer as Assistant Goldfields Warden, Officer of Police, Head Gaoler, etc. In addition to my personal squad of six men, I had 25 native police, including two N.C.O.'s, and four native wardens in charge of about 20 long-sentence prisoners, chiefly from Kiwai Island and the West. Most of these prisoners were quite fitted to temporarily discharge the duties of police if called upon—a circumstance of which I was glad to avail myself later on.

A good deal of work had to be done towards forming the station. The dense scrub and heavy timber all round had to be cleared away to admit light and air, and enable cultivation to be carried on. Boat-house, gaol and barracks for police and wardens had to be erected, and many other matters attended to besides surveys, patrolling the district, official reports, magisterial duties, etc. In all this I was ably assisted by my subordinate officer, who, for the purposes of this story, will hereafter be designated "Alec." Alick was not an educated man; a large part of his life had been spent as a working miner; but a more conscientious, loyal comrade I never wish to meet. He was a capital shot with the rifle, and, though very quiet, a terror with his hands when occasion arose. With his assistance everything soon worked harmoniously, and in a month I had a squad of men fit to go anywhere and do anything.

About this time, three miners, with a number of carriers hired from adjacent islands and other parts of British Papua, started for McLaughlin's Creek by a route that, though longer, was expected to turn out much easier than that hitherto in use. The old track was followed from Tamata to Clarke's Fort, about 15 miles up, and on the other side of the Mambare. From that point, instead of striking at once into the steep ranges, it was proposed to bear to the left and keep on fairly level ground, following the foot of the range round until opposite McLaughlin's Creek, where it might reasonably be expected to strike a leading spur that would take them up to the alluvial diggings near the head of the creek.

From Clarke's Fort the track passes through uninhabited country for about 15 miles, when it crosses the upper Ope River. The river at this point is about 100 yards wide, and can ordinarily be forded.

Here the party found themselves amongst native villages thickly populated. After a little parleying, the natives, who were congregated on the opposite bank, were induced to come across. Cordial relations were quickly established, the miners making them lavish presents from their well replenished stores of tomahawks, beads, tobacco and other articles of "trade." As the sequel proved, however, it would have been wiser to have avoided rousing the cupidity of the natives by an injudicious display of what was, in the savages' eyes, boundless wealth.

The fact of the natives bringing their women and children appeared to be a guarantee of good faith, and not, as it subsequently turned out, part of a preconcerted scheme, concocted by a clever scoundrel, who had temporarily been employed in the native police and who had been one of the principal actors in the cold-blooded murder, about twelve months previously, of the then Resident Magistrate, Green, and several native police.

The exchange of compliments concluded, the mining party prepared to cross the river. Each of the white men was accompanied by two natives, ostensibly for the purpose of assistance, as the river runs somewhat strongly and is chest deep in the middle. When they had proceeded about halfway across, at a given signal each of the white men was seized by his two native companions and thrown in the water, while the rest of the savages made a general rush upon the unfortunate defenceless carriers for the "loot." But at this critical moment one of the carriers—a powerful Taupota man named Sigareni—rushed to his master's aid and dragged his assailants off, thus giving him a chance to rise and draw his revolver. This action saved the lives of the white men, who, with most of their carriers, escaped and returned to Tamata. They had, however, lost all their baggage. Three of their carriers were killed and eaten, and one of the whites had an ugly dent in his head inflicted by a stone—a mark that he carried to his grave.

Upon receiving the news, Alick, my subordinate officer, was dispatched with 15 police to endeavour if possible, to recover the booty and capture the ringleaders of the disturbance. This step had evidently been foreseen by the natives, as, upon reaching the Ope, he was attacked by them in great force. They were driven back and the river was crossed in safety, but they returned twice to the attack. No prisoners were taken, and, as might have been expected, it was found that the "spolia opima" of the previous raid had already been divided among the victors. Consequently there was but little of it left to be discovered in the village huts. Ammunition was getting scarce, and under all circumstances Alick deemed it advisable to return with his men to the Tamata station and report.

The prime instigator of the outbreak was stated to have fallen in the course of one of the attacks on the police; but the net results of the expedition had been indecisive and unsatisfactory, and I therefore decided to go myself with the Assistant Warden and 25 police and bring matters to a final issue. Several miners also asked to be allowed to accompany me, with a view to making their way to McLaughlin's Creek, and the whole party, including carriers, then numbered about a hundred souls.

Nothing of importance happened before reaching the Ope; but I had noticed fresh footprints on the track for several miles and therefore knew that our approach would be heralded by spies and scouts. I was consequently not surprised to find the natives drawn up in force on the opposite bank. A long palaver ensued without result, beyond confirming the statement that their leader had fallen in the previous skirmish. They refused to meet us as friends or to allow us to enter their territory. We therefore abandoned negotiations and crossed the river, the Ope men falling back as we advanced.

After proceeding about four miles without molestation, we came to a village the name of which we subsequently ascertained to be Buruku-tutu. The population, which probably numbered some 400, hastily took flight upon our approach, and could not be persuaded to return. Here we established ourselves for the night, taking the precaution of clearing all the timber and undergrowth within 40 or 50 yards of the outskirts and posting double sentinels, as it seemed likely that we might be rushed during the night. The natives were prowling about all night long, but owing to our vigilance no surprise attack was made upon us.

Next morning during early breakfast I sent out a party to reconnoitre, as our road continued through long cane grass, from which the hostile natives could easily effect considerable damage upon passing travellers, without being seen themselves. Our hasty meal was barely concluded before the scouts returned with the report that a number of spear traps had been set for us along the track and a large body of fully armed natives in a very excited state was mustering at another village about half a mile away. Evidently they meant mischief, and I came to the conclusion that it would be better to leave the miners and carriers in camp and go to meet the enemy than to run the risk of their waylaying us along the track.

"Fall in, Corporal!"

"Very good, Sir!"

In about the time it takes to write it, the men were drawn up, Alick being right-hand man. At that moment—"Boom, boom, boom!" came the deep sound of the great native war-drum, followed by a rolling "rataplan" and a tremendous shout, ending with a fierce "Ha—ha—ha!" that caused the blood to tingle and the fists to clench involuntarily.

I glanced down the line and was interested to observe the attitude of the men. Slightly leaning forward, with their lips parted a little and teeth shewing in a sort of snarl, their fighting blood was plainly up. Alick had adopted the same posture and expression, and the old saying about the slight difference between civilised and savage man passed through my mind. A hasty inspection of rifles and haversacks satisfied me that all was right. I explained to the men that I wished to advance cautiously and take the enemy by surprise in order to capture prisoners if possible, and then gave the word "Forward!"

Alick led the way, with Corporal Maipu, and I brought up the rear to guard against being taken by surprise in that quarter. Both Alick and myself were armed with 12-chambered Winchesters (excellent weapons for bush work where the range seldom exceeds 400 yards) and 450 calibre revolvers. The men all carried Sniders, a bullet from which, if it hit the mark, is far more effectual than the projectile thrown by the Lee Enfield Carbine.

We moved rapidly but noiselessly; nevertheless our object was frustrated by the foe, who were on the look-out. A confused noise in the front apprised me that they had taken the initiative and had attacked.

I and my men doubled up as hard as we could run, spears and bullets were already flying. Just as I overtook the Corporal, "Swish!" came a heavy black-palm spear from the right and passed through his leg. The force of the blow momentarily staggered him; but he never uttered a word. Bending down, he snapped the spear with his right hand (he was a very powerful man) and continued fighting with 18 inches of barbed spear-head sticking through his leg. His assailant fell next moment to bullets fired simultaneously by myself and Alick, who was by my side.

A man darted out from behind a coconut tree with the intention of driving his spear through me, but my levelled rifle caused him to jump as quickly back before I could pull the trigger. Another man behind the same tree then tried his hand, with the same result. While this game of bo-peep was going on, Alick suddenly put his rifle over my shoulder and fired.

"D—n it, Alick! Why did you do that?—You have nearly deafened me!" I exclaimed.

"Look there!" was Alick's sole reply, as he pointed at the body of a native five or six yards to the left. The fellow had taken advantage of my pre-occupation and endeavoured to spear me from the left, when Alick rolled him over just as he had his spear raised.

Meantime a very free fight was going on elsewhere. Having got to close quarters, the natives were fighting chiefly with club and shield, while my men were compelled to club their rifles. One of the police was knocked senseless and two others were slightly wounded, in addition to the corporal. In a hand-to-hand conflict like this, twenty-five men, picked and trained as they were, stood a chance of being overwhelmed by sheer numbers, although they were fighting like fiends. More than one had dropped his weapon and was grappling with his opponent. Alick, however, seemed to be ubiquitous, and the magazine rifles and revolvers ultimately turned the scale in our favour. Slowly the natives began to retire under volleys of bullets from 27 rifles; but it was a dignified retreat, just a few breaking into a dog-trot. I could not but admire the pluck of these men who had now engaged the police four times and did not appear to be yet satisfied.

Leaving a dozen men on guard, I obtained sufficient proof that the inhabitants had been implicated in the attack upon and robbery of the mining party, but recovered no property of any value. As there was a possibility of the main camp being attacked, I decided to return at once, all the wounded, with the exception of the corporal, being able to walk.

We had succeeded in taking several prisoners, whom I now proceeded to interview. One of these was a withered old hag who, clad in a witch's dress consisting of a cap and shirt of native bark-cloth on which were neatly sewn a kind of native beads known as "Job's tears," had been very conspicuous in haranguing and inciting the warriors in their attack. The prisoners evidently expected a short shrift and little mercy. I once more assured them that the Government did not wish to be constantly fighting with them but only to pass through the land unmolested. I explained why we wished to do so and how impossible it was for them to resist. On the other hand I promised that no harm should be done to their gardens or possessions, and pointed out the advantages that would ensue upon the establishment of peaceful relations. Finally, to their surprise, I released all but the old witch with a trifling present to each, and requested them to persuade their leading men to come in and talk matters over, which they did next day, when I also released the old lady.

From what transpired it appeared that they had lost heavily in the preceding day's skirmish and were satisfied that further resistance was useless. They were unable to return any of the stolen property, which had by this time been distributed and bartered away to numerous other tribes, but in partial compensation their gardens of taro (or what is known as "koko" in West Africa), yams, coconuts, sugar-cane, betelnut, etc. were placed at the disposal of the Government party and miners and carriers while in the locality.

No further contretemps occurred, and since then natives from those parts have frequently visited the Government station at Tamata in a friendly manner. In fact a circumstance that has frequently deeply impressed me is the rapidity with which these people, shy and suspicious by nature and upbringing, learn to place implicit confidence in the British officer.

Some of these tribes are of magnificent physique, and it is to be sincerely hoped that the Government will continue their cautious policy in introducing European settlement and exercise a paternal supervision over the future welfare of these islanders.

"SOME" CHEAP DRESS

Under the heading "An Accomplishment Worth While," an American paper publishes a paragraph about Miss Margaret Nolan, of Des Moines, Iowa, who made the graduation dress which she wore at a total cost of 30 cents! It seems there was a competition of some sort, one can guess that it was initiated by a man, and that it was to induce the girls to study economy in clothes, amongst other studies; and the winner beat her nearest competitor by 20 cents; also we are told she bought four yards of cloth at five cents a yard, a three-yard lace remnant at five cents, a dozen buttons for three cents, and she used two cents' worth of thread. When she wore the dress she graduated from the eighth grade at the age of 13 years.

Probably the strain on five cents a yard stuff finished the dress in one wearing! And a three-yard lace remnant for five cents!! What amount of sweating went on to enable such a sale? And is the accomplishment of making a dress for 30 cents worth while?

Of course, a man passed the paragraph along to me, and naturally with the comment: "There is something well worth a par!"

But as I had just spent—well I would not like to say how much more on a dress—I did not bubble over with the expected enthusiasm at the skill of the girl in making the dress, or her wonderful endeavour in making it at a cost of 30 cents. I felt sorry for her—sorry that she considered it worth while. Every girl and every woman who can make their own clothes are to be commended certainly; but who are they that do it from choice?

Most of the women I know who can do this thing well, have either learnt and paid for their lessons, or they have learnt and been paid by their employers. But if every woman and every girl emulated this brilliant and shining example, how would the sewing women of the world fare? I know a woman who bought some paint and proceeded to paint her summer house—just to amuse herself mostly—and every man who saw her hurled at her head the accusation that she was taking the bread out of a good man's mouth—but no man would say that of a woman who did other women's work. One mere man remarked on reading about Miss Nolan: "What a valuable acquisition as a wife"; but mere men never do make these skilful and accomplished and economical girls their wives. The poor things go on making cheap dresses all their lives and envying those wives whose husbands pay for smart toilettes, and who for the most part, be it said, hate to see their wives in "home-made" frocks; but they certainly have benefited by being able to make their own frocks—if they couldn't they would never have any at all.

The girl or woman who wears her own-made frocks, and who is not a professional wears them because she has to do so, and not from choice—I know my sex too well—or they may do so to win a competition or for any other old reason except that she likes it.

THAT "30-CENT" DRESS

From another correspondent I have received the following to which I shall reply later on:—

"Dear Egeria—As the man who gave you the cutting about the cheap home-made dress, that won the prize in the competition for the graduation dresses in the American school referred to, and as you say, gave it with the 'natural' remark that it was well worth a par, permit me to suggest kindly that you have entirely mistaken both my intention and that of those who promoted the competition. No sensible man is foolish enough to suggest that all women's dresses shall be home-made, and that at a cost of 30 cents (American). Every man understands that women must have dresses costing more, and that all women cannot, and should not make their own costumes. Every sensible husband and father recognises that his wife and his daughters should be properly attired, and he is prepared to spend upon a perfectly natural and legitimate desire all that he can spend within the limits of his income and the other demands upon it.

"But you must be aware that behind such a competition as that which evelved the home-made dress costing only 30 cents, there was no intention to inaugurate a movement to garb wives and daughters in such simple costumes. The purpose was greater and much more sensible; beneficial alike to woman as to man. You must have seen in your school days the pernicious results of encouraging girls to appear at school festivals such as graduation ceremonies, in the most elaborate and expensive frocks their parents could afford, or could be worried into providing, frequently beyond their means. You must have seen the vulgar and ostentatious display of finery by girls whose parents happened to have the money with which to deck their children. What was the result? The inflation of the ideas of importance of the wearers; the hurt to the feelings of less fortunate children, and the encouragement of false notions of the relative importance of things. I take it you will agree that the be-all and end-all of a girl's or a woman's existence is not to out-dress her fellows. If you do not agree, then what becomes of woman's claim to equality with man in everything? Man does not exist to wear better clothes than other men, and the same American fathers who conceived the idea of encouraging simplicity and economy among the girls of the particular school referred to, would have no need to institute such a competition among their sons. These same fathers would be quite prepared, if such a thing were possible, to agree that every graduation dress should cost, let us say $25, if that be a reasonable price for such a dress. They did not aim to clothe their women-folk in sweated materials at a ridiculous cost. They aimed to teach the girls that there was more virtue in being able to make their own dresses, and wear them, even when they cost only 30 cents, than to be parading before a whole class of differently-circumstanced girls in frocks that might have cost as high as $200.

"Let me ask you what would be one result of such a competition, assuming that the girls and women present could overcome their mystification at how one of their kind could make a dress for 30 cents. Would it not be that dress would occupy less attention, and that scholastic attainments exhibited by even the humblest and poorest would take their proper place within the perspective of those present? You know what extravagance, in dress leads to when encouraged among schoolgirls. She who wears a $50 dress for graduation—one occasion in a lifetime—must perforce create a desire in all the other girls for similar expensive costumes. The parents suffer, if they be poor, no less than the girl herself, when the latter comes home outshone and discontented; her head filled with foolish notions about the importance of dress, notions gained from the equally foolish remarks of every other girl and woman. The wearer of the most extravagant dress in turn wants to continue her conquests. Her wedding must see her in a gown that costs probably a year's savings, and an orgy of dress extravagance is entered upon.

"If the men who instituted the competition had made such a proposal for limiting the cost of the dresses of grown women, they would have convicted themselves of execrable folly, but as clearly the idea was the inculcation of a proper perception of the relative importance of things, in young and impressionable minds, why attack them, as though they had entered upon a dark and despicable conspiracy to rob woman of her rights, one of which is to be as well dressed as she, or her husband can afford?"

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

As a contrast to the above, the fashions for the Gay Parisienne by a correspondent will read interesting.

Soft warm days and lengthening shadows announce the return of autumn. The boulevardiers, after a short flight, have returned to their well-known haunts, and fashion with her usual insouciance forecasts her vagaries. One would have thought she would be sensible and wise for once as she has been sobered in hue, but not she! With the privilege of a spoiled and petted darling, she is more didactic, bizarre, impractical, yet as wholly fascinating as ever. Skirts grow wider and shorter, and boot-tops higher. All materials are dearer, and the prices of leather mount daily, but what reckes she? Does she not know that the more fantastic, the less so-did, the more exacting she can be, the more fully she charms and distracts and the more employment she gives to those who have her to thank for their daily bread. If Madame would only as promptly render her dues to her couturière as Fashion does hers to society there would be little to complain of in her world. Choice and style of dress is still restricted. It could not be otherwise, for it is yet possible, on very still days, to hear the boom of the distant guns dropping their shells at intervals over unhappy Soissons and Rheims, and all social affairs are simple gatherings in the home, with an occasional matinée and the ever increasingly popular "five o'clock." Dinner gowns are rarely more elaborate than those the Parisienne would select for a quiet dinner with her mother-in-law to read over the latest letters from the front.

Woollen goods are dear and very scarce, and but a limited supply can be obtained from England, where, though every loom is doing its utmost, they cannot begin to provide enough. It is for this reason, doubtless, that silks, velvets and voiles are used so much in this autumn's models. I have even seen so bizarre a combination as shepherd's plaid cloth mixed with voile and worn over a silk slip. There was a broad hem and collar and cuffs of the plaid and a few strips of the latter to strengthen the seams, the rest being in voile. I can't say I quite liked it. It was too reminiscent of grandmother's scrap-bag and the rather dreadful things which used to come out of it—ends of bed-spreads in patchwork, ragmats and bits of odd portieres.

Tailor-made costumes still incline to the military effect which is, after all, natural enough, as such costumes are made for hard wear and must be simple in cut. It does not seem possible, alas, to get away from the over-wide skirt though many women here absolutely refuse to wear them as short as Dame Fashion desires. It is only the extremists, however, who have taken to those measuring five yards round.

Military toques, including some quite bewitching models with variegated tassels, are frequently seen. The more fancy shapes are worn much higher on the head than formerly and have a most alarming tilt in the back. No more comfortable bonnet-like hats pulled well down on the head and almost hiding the eyes. My readers must prepare to coil their hair well down on the back of their heads as those wonderful erections right on top are no longer to be encouraged. Yes, it must be quite on the back and must increase both in volume and projection. In fact one must look as much like one of Du Maurier's heroines as possible even to the adoption of those funny little ruffles creeping up the sleeves almost to the shoulders like caterpillars in motion. Another ruffle effect is that produced by a long and somewhat loose swathed sleeve, having an inverted ruffle round the arm hole. The sleeve tapers towards the wrist where it terminates in a falling ruffle. This inverted ruffle may be regarded as a revival of late Victorian fashion or as a new development of the epaulet. The line between the shoulder and the arm is to become more marked. In fact, almost everything we took off or discarded in women's dress for a generation or two is now put on or is soon to be put on again. I am waiting breathlessly for the "bustle," and the rows of overlapping shell or bone buttons, both to be regarded as the last word in uselessness! Mais que voulez-vous! It is the imperious decree that one must follow if one would be smart!

Few theatres are open, so the few which are so are crowded to excess. A most touching scene took place at the recent re-opening of the theatre Sarah Bernhardt. Everyone felt that it would be like the glorious artist to set her approval on the brilliant play, "Vierge de Lutece," by Monsieur Villeroi, by being present at the first performance. The theatre was crowded, and when Madame Bernhardt appeared in the shadow of her box, which had been beautifully decorated with a regular framework of rare blossoms, the enthusiasm of the vast audience could not be controlled. There were continued cries of "Vive Sarah," "Brava Sarah," and many old friends pressed forward to bestow a greeting, and only dispersed reluctantly when the three vigorous raps were given which announced the rise of the curtain. Madame Bernhardt received the artists in her box after the play; bestowing on them warm words of praise and encouragement. The majority of the audience kept their eyes on their beloved Sarah rather than on the stage, for even as a spectator she was still the towering artist and now more so than ever, since her courage has lifted her above her martyrdom.

I have seen a few evening gowns lately with trains, but they seem to have absolutely nothing to do with the skirt proper, but rather to have been added as an afterthought. I must confess to finding them tremendously amusing, and rather practical, for as all late afternoon and dinner gowns are semi-decolletee it is quite possible to take a long and rather triangular strip of soft material, embroidered perhaps, and edged with soft fur, throw the narrow end over the shoulders, wind once round the waist, distribute the centre fullness gracefully over the hips, leaving a long end to trail a yard on the floor, behind, and thus produce a full evening costume. The effect is somewhat like that of a peacock, with the short skirt underneath showing an expanse of fine silk hose in dainty slippers, but it is a la mode!

Fortunately, all of the hats worn at present are not small. While the toque, in velvet or feathers, is perhaps the most popular, a concession is made to those whose style of face and head demands a larger chapeau. Very becoming are the large soft brims of velvet, slightly bent back from the face. A very pretty one is in pale grey and very deep smoke velvet, with a touch of silver in the velvet band which holds the simple feather decoration.

A costume is of bienue marine voile, with bolero and part of skirt of velvet of a darker shade. The corsage is of rose ninon, covered with white mousseline do soie. The corners of the bolero are turned back, suggestive of la mode militaire. In fact, boleros do the most surprising things, sometimes turning into fichus and sometimes ending in sashes or odd belts. They seem to feel that they do not belong to the costumes and are doing their best to correct an effect of incongruity.

In mentioning boots, earlier in this article, I forgot to say that the latest, highest topped ones, lace on the side.

Land of Lilliput.

Conducted by Egeria

My dear Lilliputians,

Are you not all glad of the beautifully cool weather we are having for Christmas? I am sure all of you who have taken part in the displays and entertainments at your schools are, for when the heat is very bad, it makes everybody disagreeable in spite of themselves and the nice Christmas thoughts they should have.

I went to a play the other evening, and saw quite a number of "Thoughts." There was "Merry Thought," a pretty, dainty Lilliputian, but one which we cannot always entertain; then there was "Loving Thought," a blue-eyed and blue-clad Lilliputian, who was never too tired nor too busy to carry loving messages, and I saw "Bad Thought," too, all clad in scarlet; but all the Lilliputians around him were so happy and merry that "Bad Thought" flew away very quietly. All the many who took part in this play looked as if "Merry Thought" or "Loving Thought" were constant companions.

Of course, you have all read Robinson Crusoe." Some years ago every child read this book about the man who lived so long alone on Juan Fernandez Island. Now we hear of another Robinson Crusoe, from a letter written by a midshipman on board a British ship which rounded up the Konigsberg. He says:—

We had to go to Aldabra Island, which is about 400 miles east of Zanzibar. We arrived at dawn one day, and a landing party was sent ashore to find out what they could. While we were doing this the old — was going to steam round the island, a distance of about 60 miles, to see if the enemy was on the other side. Well, away we went, all merry and bright, and when we got within about 400 yards of the beach a boat put off with a white man in it. He turned out to be a Frenchman, the only white man on the island. When he came close to us he asked us what we wanted, and we said we were going to land, so he showed us the way through the reefs. When we got ashore he very hospitably refused to do any business till we had gone to his shanty and had a cup of coffee. S— and I, not having had any breakfast, were delighted. When we arrived at the house, a gigantic black man handed us each a green cocoanut in the husk, with a hole cut in the end, full of delicious cocoanut milk.

The Frenchman (who spoke good English) had run out of tobacco, and when we offered him a cigarette he nearly wept with joy. He lives an absolutely Robinson Crusoe existence. He didn't even know that Turkey was at war, and the last news he had was that the Formidable was sunk. The only papers he had were two magazines of 1913 and one of 1911. He informed us that he had read these over and over again until he almost knew them by heart.

When we offered to send him off papers, tobacco, etc., from the ship, he did not know how to thank us. We went all over the island (or, rather the inhabited part of it) and saw everything. There are flamingoes, ibis, frigate birds, and I don't know how many more varieties, which you usually see in a zoo. The business is chiefly turtle-catching. He took us to see the enclosure in which he keeps the turtles which he is going to send away alive. There were about 60 of the largest turtles I have ever seen in my life. It appears that they catch on an average 60 turtles a night in the season. Most of those of course they kill, but they keep some alive to send to Europe, where they fetch as much as £120 each.

After being on the island about four hours our ship appeared, so we had to put off. On leaving he made us a present of a live turtle, which had just been caught, weighing 350lb. Some turtle! Of course we thanked him, and when we reached the ship we sent him some biscuits, milk, tobacco, etc., and enough reading matter to last him for six months.

I wonder if "Merry Thought" and "Loving Thought" ever visited this lonely man!

Now I will tell you something which will make you smile. Do you know that there is a place in the world where they shoe geese? Vilna or Wilna, which the Russians left some little time ago, is in a district celebrated for producing geese, and these are driven to very distant markets. To prevent the birds getting footsore on the long journey, they are made during the late autumn to practise the now notorious German "goose-step," first in tar, and then through fine sand. The geese are thus provided with perfectly fitting pairs of boots, in which they can comfortably perform the 200-mile march to the goose fair at Warsaw without having to cackle for a chiropodist. This reads like a joke, does it not?

This week your story is called and written by Lucy Murray for a New Zealand paper. I hope you will like it.

The nightingale was very much in love—there could be no doubt about that. For generation after generation one of his family had adored one of the Rose's housemaid, and he felt as if all the loves of all the other nightingales for all the other roses in the past were outpouring from his little heart to-day!

His lady was no palid rosebud, frail, and fading ere yet in full blossom. Ah no! She was a great, deep red queen, such a one as might have driven an artist into an intoxication of colour madness. Each rich, ripe leaf was daintily curled as for a ball-room, and from the curves a sweet, bewildering fragrance stole.

From his perch on the old willow near, the nightingale kept guard—quite a peaceful one—but the day was near its noon. Then, all suddenly, a new feeling awakened within him—jealousy!

A daring bee had come slowly along the garden walk, and playing about from flower to flower reached the sweet Rose-Queen, and—oh, poor nightingale—planted a lingering kiss on her crimson cheek.

For a long, eternal moment he remained thus, then he fluttered busily away to return, and bury himself deeply in her breast.

The nightingale was mad with fury, and just for a minute he decided to attack the bee, but as he approached, the intended victim rose into the air, and before he realised it, had gone beyond his sight.

What could the nightingale do? In his passion he besought the sun above to fling all his white rays down on the hated bee, and burn him to death in the molten heat. But the sun only laughed, and replied that he was too busy to attend to so slight a matter.

Then the nightingale petitioned the raindrops that they would fall upon and drown the bee, but the raindrops were too engrossed in bathing the rose to even hear him.

Lastly, he called on the winds to rise up and blow the bee into the sand deserts, far, far away; but they also gave him little heed.

Their despair seized on the nightingale and for some hours it seemed as if all joy had fled from his eye. Even his worst enemy might have pitied him.

But relief was at hand. Suddenly along came the bee once more, sailing lightly on, and as he neared the rose, up flew our nightingale.

"How dared you kiss that lovely

ABOUT RINGS

The first thing that the child wants by way of ornament is a ring, says a North American paper. And in the childhood of the human race the same desire was manifest.

Rings are so ancient that no one can say when or where they originated. The Egyptians had them thousands of years before Christ, and the Babylonians and Hebrews used them in very ancient times.

In that early part of the Bible, the Book of Genesis, we read:—"Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand and put it upon Joseph's hand." Curiously enough, this very ring has been found in a tomb of the Necropolis of Sakkara, near Memphis.

This is the earliest known ring, and undoubtedly rings were used at first chiefly, just as this one was used, as a mark of authority and distinction.

When reading and writing were little practised a ring with some special device served both as identification of the bearer and a mark of the writer of a document. The impression of the device on a ring went far toward giving the stamp of genuineness to a letter or contract, and to-day we preserve the legal fiction in adding seals to legal documents.

The ring or circlet of bone or shell is found in caves of prehistoric man, showing that even then rings were used for decorative purposes, and in the history of all nations there is no time at which the ring is not found.

The discovery of the ring was probably accidental. Someone twisted a bit of vine around one finger, or slipped on a perforated shell, or a disc of bone from which the marrow had been extracted, and the ring had been invented.

What Egypt and Babylon did was also done by the Greeks and Romans, and in Sparta it was found necessary to make a law against luxury by stating that none save iron rings were permitted to be worn. Luxury in rings was carried to extremes in Rome, where at first they were worn on one finger only, then on all the fingers, then on each joint of each finger, and finally a real Roman fop had to wear certain rings only on certain days in the week. Some of these Roman rings were of extraordinary size.

The ring was early used as a lover's pledge. While some assert that we owe the origin of the ring as a wedding pledge to the Romans, many believe that it goes much further back, to the Egyptians, Babylonians and Hebrews.

Among the Romans the rings was given at the engagement, probably as a pledge that the engagement to marry would be kept. Pliny says that rings in his time were of iron, but they were certainly made of gold in the second century.

In Rome, at the signing of the marriage contract, there was a great feast, and the man gave the woman a ring, which she put on her left hand, on the finger next to the smallest, for the Romans held that there lady?" he demanded furiously.

"What lovely lady?" demanded in his turn the astonished bee.

"That royal beauty! That dazlingly brilliant creation of nature's glory," cried the nightingale, rolling out his words with fine effect.

"Where?" gasped the bee. "What do you mean?" I see only a simple, darkly-dressed lady who was very kind to me when I visited her before, giving me rarely sweet food and rest. She was goodness itself to me—but beautiful! My dear friend, you must be teasing me! She is homely as yonder black hen, of course.

And he buzzed away, leaving the nightingale to apologise for his mistrust to the rose, and learn from her the fact which he had already gathered, bewilderingly from the bee—

That wonderful as these insects are in their way, yet to their sight the dusky paucity is no duller than the rich, red rose!

Wishing you all the happiest of Christmases. With love, from was a nerve running directly from this finger to the heart. This ring was at first of iron or copper with little projections in the shape of a key to suggest that the wife had possession of her husband's keys. Later these rings became very much more costly and elaborate.

Some Roman nuptial rings had inscriptions, such as "Ama me" (love me), "Amo te" (I love thee), "Bonam vitam" (a good life). One ring picked up in the ruins of Pompei represents a man and a woman joining hands.

The use of the ring as a sign of betrothal is very general. Copts have a custom of betrothing girls at six or seven years of age by putting a ring on the finger of the girl thus "sealed." In Persia a ring is among the marriage presents made by the groom to the bride. In Spain, if a man gives a girl over twelve years of age a ring, that constitutes a betrothal, to which he may be held.

Shakespeare refers to a custom prevalent in England in his day of exchanging rings at the betrothal, as in "Twelfth Night": "Strengthened by the interchanging of rings." In Germany, the exchange of rings at the betrothal is a very common and time-honoured ceremony.

In the early Christian Church, a ring of troth was given to the woman by the man. The first Christians engraved upon their seals symbolical figures, such as the dove, fish, anchor, lyre, etc. The rings used for the marriage ceremony represented pigeons, fish, or more often two hands joined together. In the Christian weddings the same finger was used as that for the wedding ring, but not for the former reason of any connection directly with the heart.

In the ancient ritual of the English marriage the ring was placed by the husband on the top of the thumb of the left hand, with the words: "In the name of the Father"; he then moved on to the forefinger, saying: "In the name of the Son"; then to the middle finger, adding, "And of the Holy Ghost," finally placing it upon the fourth finger, with the word: "Amen."

The ring has now become so closely identified with marriage that it is regarded as the one essential sign of marriage, and many hold, especially the ignorant, that a marriage is not valid without it. But during the time of the Commonwealth in England, the Puritans seriously contemplated doing away with it, as having originated with the heathen.

One dominant superstition has been built up around the ring as a symbol of marriage; that it is bad luck and a sign of misfortune to remove the wedding ring, if only for an instant.

The plain gold ring for the wedding is modern. In ancient times it was often ornate in design, bearing a Cupid and Psyche, or a Christian device.

Rings were also used largely as amulets, either because of some word inscribed upon the ring, supposed to ward off evil spirits, or because good influences might be summoned by the wearer. The most famous of these in song and story is the "Seal of Solomon," which figures in the "Arabian Nights" and in many Oriental legends. It was supposed to be inscribed with the letters of the ineffable name of God, and to be able to summon to assist its wearer the good spirits, or jinns, and drive off the evil demons.

Under the will of Mr. Alfred Vanderbilt, who was a victim of German barbarity, having gone down in the ill-fated Lusitania, three small boys, the eldest five years, the youngest not yet old enough to talk or walk, inherit millions of pounds. The will has been filed in New York, and its clauses distribute something like £10,000,000. Mr. Vanderbilt had three sons. The eldest, William, was the son of his first wife. He inherits the trust fund of many millions left to his father by his grandfather, Cornelius Vanderbilt. The two younger sons, Alfred, aged three, and George, the baby, inherit the bulk of the fortune. To Mr. Vanderbilt's widow, who was Mrs. Smith Hollins McKim, there comes a big legacy, which includes £600,000 and the income of a trust fund of a million.

ST. LUCY'S ENGLISH SCHOOL

ANNUAL EXAMINATIONS.

On December 3 an official examination of the pupils of St. Lucy's School in Calle Montes de Oca was held by 18 appointed teachers from the Consejo Nacional under the Presidency of Sres. Albert and Barso.

The certificates for the successful pupils were distributed on Dec. 23 by Mrs. Carey who has taken so much interest in the school and its work previous to her marriage a few months ago.

The results were surprising and reflected the highest credit on the school teaching. Before stiff examiners, even severe examiners, 97 per cent of the pupils at St. Lucy's English School were accorded certificates by the government officials.

A further examination test was held on Dec. 23, but one out of an official nature and proved equally as successful as that of the government examiners.

The Government Inspector and President Sr. Barso had a few words of congratulation to offer, especially as concerning arithmetic proficiency. This and the fact of the exceptional number (97 per cent) of certificated pupils establishes what may be termed a record in English Schools in the Argentina.

The official list is as follows:—

QUEEN VICTORIA COLLEGE

ANNUAL PRIZE DISTRIBUTION.

On December 23 the boys of the Queen Victoria College, San Fernando, assembled to hear the results of the examinations held during the preceding week, and to receive the prizes awarded to those who had obtained the requisite marks. Owing to recent bereavement in the family of the Head Master, there was no "fiesta" or public ceremony, as has been customary since the foundation of the College in 1896. At the commencement of the year the Boarding School Department of the College was given up, but the Day School for Boys has continued as usual. The work of the year has been directed towards a thorough preparation for life in this country, under present-day conditions, as much importance is attached by the Head Master to instruction in Spanish as in English. The classes in "General Knowledge," always a valuable part of the curriculum, have been occupied with the events of the year, and with a study of the many historical and scientific problems which the war in Europe have suggested. The College is well represented in the struggle for liberty, at least sixteen Old Boys being known to the Head Master as either at the front or preparing to serve.

The Head Master, Mr. A. Stuart Pennington, addressed the boys on their responsibilities under the new era which will be ushered in at the close of the Great War, and after reading the results of the examinations, handed to the recipients the prizes won according to the following list:—

CAROL SERVICE

AT DR. SMITH MEMORIAL HALL.

The Dr. Smith Hall, Belgrano, was filled on Dec. 23 on the occasion of the Carol Service. There was just that nip in the air which, with the cold moonlight, helped the exile to forget that the trees are in full leaf and that midsummer is raging. It directed the fancy to other nights when the voices of the choristers have risen from an iron-bound road, a world dumb with snow, or been heard fitfully in the lashing gusts of a squall. These old favourites do one infinite good to hear, and the programme both as set forth and performed was good in every way. A curious feature of a function of this kind is that the sacred character of the edifice, the sight of Gothic windows cheeks any unseemly tendency to "prophane" applause, while there is an uneasy feeling that the prayers, reading and sermon have somehow been omitted.

Except for the fact that Mr. F. Adle had unfortunately been prevented from attending by indisposition, the programme was gone through as published:—

Instrumental Introduction.

Hymn No. 126 (V. V. 1, 2, 3 and 7), "O for a thousand tongues to sing," the Congregation.

Solo, "Lift thine eyes," Mr. F. Bideleux.

Carol No. 6, "The First Nowell," the Choir.

Carol, "Hark the Angels Singing," the Misses Young and Choir.

Hymn No. 41, "O come, all ye faithful," the Congregation.

Intermezzo, violin, Mrs. Ida Davis.

Solo, "The Dawn of Redemption," Miss Muriel Marr.

Anthem, "Christians Awake," the Choir.

Carol No. 7, "Jesu, Hail! O God most holy," the Choir.

Solo, "Nazareth," Mr. F. Bideleux.

Quartette, "Sleep, Holy Babe," Miss Lulu Lumsden, Miss Jeannie Young, Mr. F. Tribe, and Mr. F. C. Lee.

Carol No. 33 "Cradle Song," the Choir.

Solo, "Ave Maria," Miss Lulu Lumsden.

Te Deum Laudamus.

Hymn No. 134, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," the Congregation.

Mr. Bideleux has nearly entirely got rid of his late throat attack, and sang "Lift thine eyes" and "Nazareth" in excellent style. In the finale of the last he displayed great power and feeling. "The First Nowell" is a very fine carol, and the choir rendered it in an unexceptional manner, which was a delight. It was quite evident that the congregation enjoyed "O come, all ye faithful," one of the finest of all the Christmas hymns, and it was delivered both with precision and gusto. It may be remarked that the choir, consisting of some half dozen male voices and eleven ladies, sang excellently well together, and with good effect and expression. They were most capably supported throughout by the Rev. W. M. Lalng at the piano, Mr. R. H. Roberts at the harmonium, and Mrs. Ida Davis, who is a violinist of real ability. "Christians, awake!" is a fine anthem, but of course an entirely different setting to the hymn of that name. Miss Muriel Marr acquitted herself well in "The Dawn of Redemption," and Miss Lulu Lumsden's rendering of "Ave Maria" was excellent; she has a clear and flexible voice.

The quartette, "Sleep, Holy Babe," and "The Cradle Song" are both delightful pieces. Of all the settings of the Te Deum, it may be said that they are majestic and rich. There are few anthems or canticles more impressive than this, and it lost nothing in the hands of the choir.

The service terminated with the hymn, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," which with its rolling refrain, formed an admirable close to a truly enjoyable evening. Mr. R. H. Roberts on behalf of the choir, thanked those present, expressing their gratification at the number of the gathering, and thanking all who had contributed to the collection (in kind) for the Children of the Belgrano Home Christmas Treat, and announcing a service

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

The British steamer Avocet had a thrilling adventure with a squadron of German aeroplanes while on a voyage from Rotterdam to Manchester. She was attacked by three aircraft which came from Belgium, and for half an hour or more was under fire, and menaced by bombs, of which 35 were dropped. The crew of the ship used rifles against the attackers, and the Chief Officer sent up a rocket as a distress signal, and nearly brought down one of the aeroplanes. The bomb-dropping was erratic and not one struck the Avocet, though she was hit by machine gun bullets. The adventure is made the subject of our first illustration this week. All attention is now centred on the Balkans situation and the threatened attack on Egypt. We are able to give a number of pictures of special interest illustrating various phases of the campaign. In the first we have a view of a French hospital station on the railway line near Strumitza which was in the hands of the Allies for a time but had to be abandoned. The second picture gives in map form the chief points of military interest in the Balkans, and will help to explain the cablegrams now coming through regarding the operations of the Allies. In the following picture we get an idea of the modernization of the Greek army which is now uniformed in khaki and has almost entirely discarded the old fighting costume. The picture of the flight of the Serbians before the invading armies of Teutons and Bulgars is an artist's conception of the scenes depicted by war correspondents in the Balkans who described the frantic haste of the inhabitants to get away from the enemy. Serbia had already experienced the horrors of invasion and knew what fate awaited her people when the Austrians and the Bulgars came in strength and as conquerors. The following photograph is self-explanatory, representing as it does the condition of the Polish refugees before the German advance. The final picture gives a fair idea of the strong British military post at Aden, a fortified town on the South West coast of Arabia at the entrance to the Red Sea. The Teutonic forces are threatening an advance along the coast and it may transpire that Aden will play an important part yet in the war.

They include Mr. Appleyard, who was at Loos; Mr. H. F. Bedington, who is in Uganda chasing Germans and who mentions "There is good shooting here"; Mr. A. Mackenzie, who has been off Cape Helles and has met Achi Baba; Mr. S. F. Cresswell, who has become Lieutenant of gunners; Mr. J. P. Munro, who enlisted at Bristol; Mr. H. Hopley, who has been in a hot corner "somewhere" in France; Mr. Garner, who was at Hooge and got a bullet in the head; Mr. W. H. Hine, who enjoys the spectacle of German aeroplanes being shot down by our own.

The Real General De Wet

A FORMER FREE STATER'S VIEWS

"De Wet is not one of the old British-hating Boers at all; as a matter of fact, he has always had strong sympathies with Britain. The real cause of all the recent troubles has been the feeling between De Wet and his fellow Free Staters on the one hand and General Botha on the other."

This is the opinion expressed by a former Commandant in the service of the Orange Free State, Mr. D. M. Bresler, in an interview with a representative of THE HERALD.

"The story of disturbances in South Africa," continued Mr. Bresler, "is a long one. It dates back to the days immediately following the Boer War of 1881, and is purely political in character. At that time, although it is not generally known, a movement was on foot in Cape Colony, headed by Mr. J. H. Hofmeyer and inspired by Sir H. de Villiers, the Chief Justice—the real fathers of the present South African Union—to form an organisation to consider the best steps to take to ensure the future of South Africa.

"Meetings were held in various parts of the country, and the subject was discussed in many forms for several years; finally it took expression in the formation of the Afrikaner Bond. This Bond had as its avowed policy the union of all South Africans so as to form a colony similar to that which is in existence to-day, and in its programme there was no thought of the establishment of a Republic. What was desired was an autonomous South Africa under British protection.

"Now the Transvaal and the Orange Free State did not officially recognise this bond, but in sentiment the Free State supported it; and afterwards, when Cecil Rhodes became a member and was endeavouring to bring about the desired Union, the then-President of the Orange Free State, Mr. Reitz, worked in hand with him. As a matter of fact, one of Reitz' own children was baptised 'Cecil Rhodes.' Sentiment in the State was all for the movement, and even in the Transvaal there was a strong and growing party in favour of it. The only powerful influence against it was that of President Kruger and his party, but which was becoming smaller as years went on, and only another election was necessary to ensure the deposition of the President. Had that happened, his party would have ended. Then something happened. The reformers—men who had had very little money and who had suddenly become rich—thought of deposing Kruger and establishing a Republic of their own.

"Rhodes thought these men might succeed, so he decided to take them in hand. That was the great mistake he made; and then came the Jameson trouble. It has been believed that the Jameson Raid was an attempt to take the Transvaal for Great Britain. It was nothing of the kind. The Raid was directed against the Reformers, and its object was to control them and the situation generally.

"This was a great blunder, for it failed and threw everything into the hands of Kruger, who once again became powerful. We in the Free State were disgusted and saw little chance of the plans for a Union meeting with success. We then realised the only hope for the future was war, which would put things right.

"It was then that we of the Free State armed, but very reluctantly, and we used every means in our power to avert the coming struggle. Kruger was compelled to try every possible way of avoiding a conflict, before we would consent to come into it; but eventually, without our knowledge, Kruger declared war. We were then, against our wishes, drawn into it, and we determined to fight to the last.

"With Botha and Kruger's party, things were different. They had forced a war on the country, and when things began to go badly they were the first to put their hands up and urged the Free State men to make peace without terms. It must not be forgotten that Botha was a member of the unconditional surrender party, and it was there that the trouble began, for the Free Staters would not agree to peace except there were prospects of good terms and a united South Africa with eventual autonomy.

"When the war had ended, Botha, Delarey and De Wet went to England and the Continent to collect funds for the families of those who had suffered in the war. It was also decided that they should jointly publish a book on the campaign. But the combination was not a happy one. De Wet published a book of his own and left Botha and Delarey to do the partying and lionising. As De Wet said to me, 'I am sick of this sort of thing; I can't stand it.'

"That incident may not have been very important in itself, but it is sufficient to show that there was—long before the Union—some feeling between the Free State leaders and Botha and his friends.

"When autonomy was granted, the Free Staters distrusted Botha, and from the outset Hertzog was suspicious of Botha. Hertzog's suspicions were justified. Botha was never willing to treat him fairly and in the end he left the Ministry. Very naturally, Hertzog felt that he had a personal grievance and he was supported by the Free Staters; but he was just as loyal to Britain as Botha himself. You must not forget that when Britain withdrew her protection from the Free State many years ago, a petition was signed asking the Imperial Government to reconsider that decision, and that the Free Staters were in favour of the Afrikaner Bond policy of forming a United South Africa under British protection.

"Last year, war broke out between England and Germany. South Africa was loyal and there was not the slightest intention on the part of the Free Staters to aid the Germans—whom they hate. But there was already a very strong feeling against Botha. When called together the South African party and asked their advice on the situation, they agreed—including General Bevers—to attack German South-West Africa. One stipulation, however, was made, and that was that volunteers should be invited. Only in the event of invasion were the South African forces to be summoned to the colours. Despite the pledges given Botha overruled everything and immediately adopted methods of compulsion.

"A political movement against Botha was at once commenced, and permission to hold meetings was asked. When those meetings were held, Botha treated them as unlawful assemblies, and made capital out of a movement which was entirely political and directed only against himself. Later, of course, some of the men fell under the influence of Maritz and similar people, but the revolt was not directed against British rule; it was merely an attempt to resist the methods of Botha. That it did aid the Germans was not because the Free Staters wished it to do so."

"Why," added Mr. Bresler, "the Free Staters have always detested the Germans; their education was more English than Dutch; and the Superintendent-General of education—the father of their educational system—is a Scotchman from Aberdeen, Mr. Brebner.

"The fact is," he continued, "that the Free Staters were driven to revolt by the high handed actions of General Botha. He has always been distrusted; not because of his loyalty to Britain, but because we have tra-

VILLA FOR ARGENTINA!

Rebel Leader's Plans

CARRANZA'S HOPES OF PEACE

New York, Dec. 23.

It is reported that now that Villa has surrendered General Carranza intends to hunt down the guerilla leader Zapata. He announces that he expects that by two months at the farthest peace will be restored in Mexico.

Villa is stated to have purchased 5,000 acres of grazing land in Argentina and a herd of cattle, and will settle down there with several of his followers.

ANOTHER ARSENAL FIRE

CAUSED BY SHORT CIRCUIT.

It is evident that fire is a constant menace to the national arsenals. The ruins at Puerto Militar are scarcely cold and the recent outbreak at the city arsenal is still fresh, when another has taken place at the latter establishment. This time it was not owing the sagacious placing of tanks of inflammable oil directly over boilers and furnaces, but to the customary "short circuit," that so fruitful cause of burnings. It set fire to some combustible materials stored in the Arsenal cellars, but the Arsenal "bomberos," now in thorough trim and very vigilant, were upon it before it could get a hold. One had a burnt hand and another was nearly choked with smoke but happily the losses are not great. It is, however, a warning. This is the second outbreak. The third time pays for all.

ditions and customs which we would not willingly allow to die, under whatever flag we might live. But we believe that Botha is a dangerous man and that he cares nothing for tradition. That he has no regard for pledges was shown when he summoned the men to the colours to fight in German West Africa instead of calling for volunteers for the work. There is a barrier between Botha and the Free Staters, and it cannot, under present conditions, be removed. South Africa has a future, and that future lies in the Union under the protection of the British flag, but there cannot be real justice and real peace until we have a British Premier, taken from the Unionist party. No Free Stater wants Botha in power.

"As for any suggestion that we would welcome a German victory, or assist the Germans to gain one," said Mr. Bresler in conclusion, "that is entirely false. The white people of South Africa have one danger to face and that is the black people. They outnumber us, and we must have unity in order to be able to meet them. If European power other than British were to secure a foothold in South Africa, too much attention would be shown to the conflicting interests of those nations, and too little to the great problems which face the country. British rule is necessary there, but we do not want Botha. I regard the release of De Wet and his friends as one of the finest things that the Governor-General could have done. It will strengthen the ties between the Free Staters and Great Britain—and it is a blow to Botha."

"THE MILLION"

Winning Number: 18775

EXPLOITING THE PUBLIC

Another "Million" lottery has been won, exultation reigns in the breast of the purchaser of No. 18,775, and tens of thousands of optimistic people have settled down to await next year's swindle.

The result of the draw for Christmas, 1915, was known early in the day, and, with the $50,000 prize won during the first few minutes of the proceedings, interest was dead at a sooner hour than usual.

Now that the event is in a fair way to being forgotten, it is interesting to consider the attitude of the public towards this, the greatest of swindles. Some few tickets are obtained at headquarters in the early days of the lottery at the face value of $157.50, but it is no easy matter to purchase decimos at a centavo less than $16 after the opening days of sale. Then the upward rise commences: $17, $17.50, $18, $19, $20, $20.80, $21.50, and finally $22.80. The vendors, like so many hungry spiders, await the foolish creatures that enter the shops for an entero or a decimo. It is all the same; both rich and poor are fleeced. And the big spiders fleece the smaller vendors by selling wholesale at prices inflated 40 or 50 points, as the days go by.

Fortunately for the public, and unfortunately for the vendors, a slump occurred this year. At establishments innumerable it was discovered twenty-four hours before the draw that a fall of forty pesos on an entire ticket had taken place. Practically any man was willing to sell at $17.50 on Wednesday evening, and in the early hours of yesterday morning—as the panic commenced to spread—$16 for a decimo, or $160 for an entire ticket, was a common rate. And still the people failed to respond. Undoubtedly there were many vendors who ceased operations with unsold tickets on their hands. The inflation of prices had been artificial; it had not been due to any excessive demands for tickets; and it was only when the vendors discovered that their plot to compel a stampede had failed that prices fell again to normal. Meanwhile, the public were assured at every turn that the establishment they were passing had "El Millon Seguro," or "El Millon en fija." Imbeciles may have believed the story; sane men did not.

In one minor respect, at any rate, the man in the street held his own. The result of the 6,000,000 peseta lottery in Spain was duly announced the night before the draw for the "Million." The final figure in the winning number was "5." The public bought all the "5's" obtainable at the cheap rate, and their superstitious belief was justified, for the winning number for the "Million" also ended in "5."

This year's "grande" was sold by Messrs. Vaccaro, in the Avenida de Mayo—not the first time they have achieved this honour—and throughout the day the passers-by displayed interest in the establishment wherein had reposed the scrap of paper valued at a million pesos. It is to be presumed they exchanged the usual stories of how they had declined the combination of figures that won and had insisted on others, or that they had just been going to, but didn't. Anyhow, there would not be a big lottery in which there were not a supply of hard-luck stories. What the people do not understand, however, is that when they buy a share in the "Million" they are being swindled openly. As "la Nacion" sapiently points out, it would be better for many people if they purchased tickets for the lottery on December 31. In that the winners receive a better return for their money.

The draw for the principal prizes is as follows: — $1,000,000, 18,775; $200,000, 24,192; $100,000, 23,700; $50,000, 3,753, 1,529; $20,000, 13,757, 11,742, 7,418, 4,622; $10,000, 10,530, 8,321, 4,518, 8,351, 16,433, 19,508, 15,840, 15,187, 24,816, 17,871.

THE TURF

PALERMO

SATURDAY'S RESULTS

Whatever one's opinion may be of the result of the racing at Palermo on Saturday, there is no doubt that the weather was all that could be desired for the holiday.

We hear a whisper about "weather be d—" we didn't want weather, we wanted racing and a good day. Now if I had only backed—"!!! and the story goes on. It is impossible to please everyone, but in this respect the weather was not to blame.

As a race meeting, however, it left much to be desired on account of the too numerous scratchings which somewhat spoiled the fun. An excellent attendance even from the commencement of the meeting took advantage of the holiday weather, and on the whole money was made.

In respect to the classic event, the one surprise was the feeble running of San Paulo. As the result one can almost look upon him as a horse whose racing days are over for the present. He will never have a better chance of winning a classic race than he had yesterday and yet he failed and failed badly.

The race went to Aguerrido in more or less of a hack canter at the expense of Felpilla, who led the field followed by Retrochero, Aguerrido and San Paulo last. Weight as expected killed Retrochero's chance, who fell back beaten on entering the straight. Aguerrido turned on steam and easily wore down Felpilla. The race was run in excellent time. Aguerrido who won by one and a half lengths did the distance in 1.37 2/5. San Paulo in the run home made up a good deal of ground and ran Felpilla to a neck.

From start to finish the meeting went off without a hitch or a noticeably unpleasant incident.

There was nothing surprising in Carreras annexing the first event. Only by fine riding on Denna's part, however, did he get home by half a head from Canotiere, with Querida a similar distance away third. It was by far the best race of the day. Querida made the running from Guandacol, Chiquitina and Fulana. The pace was fast and the field well bunched up. How Carreras or rather Denna got through in the run home was remarkable, and this young boy put up actually one of the very best exhibitions of jockeyship possible. It was a strenuous finish and an exciting one. Pegaso never showed up at all, nor did the well fancied Somaten. All the prices paid were good.

Merluza had a ridiculously easy win in the second event, although Malilla ran a decent race. Making the running this latter was followed by Perfidea and Augusta and held her own well all the way except for Merluza, who when called upon simply strode away from the others and won cantering by three lengths. There were also three lengths between Malilla and Kota the third horse. It would be absurd to say that any of the others tried a yard.

With the running of the third event came a surprise. The debutant Danseur ran a very fine race and polished off a strongish field to the tune of $68. What happened to Bicarbonato is easily told. After making the running from Primer Actor and Testun, he never tried a yard when tackled, and when he fell back and Danseur came on it was a fine race. Sir Carlos ran strongly too. They were all well bunched together after passing the paddock enclosure and went on for a hard ridden finish, which ended in Danseur winning by three-quarters of a length from the hot favourite Testun with Waterville third half a length behind and Sir Carlos fourth by a neck.

These latter two travelled very well at the finish.

This was something of a smack in the eye for the Great G.P. and they were none too happy when Sincera II in the next event ran a grand race and slammed a strong field.

Don Gabino got away first with Thamar and Espadañal following. About the 1400 post Velasquez came up and took third place. Thus he travelled to the straight when Massenet came along. Easily running down Thamar he took the lead, only to lose it to Sincera's strenuous challenge, who ultimately won by a length, in the good time of 2.5 1/5.

Aguerrido and Bizet made up for these two reverses.

In the latter race Sandringham was away first and Pasco second, the favourite travelling easily in the fourth position. There was no further interest when once the straight was reached. Bizet came along at a great pace and walked over the others to the tune of one and three-quarter lengths in front of Farol and almost four lengths separated Farol from Dijon. The time was splendid, 1.37 2/5 takes some doing.

Santa Damiana was made favourite for the next event, but only by a small margin over Piña. Sin Humo jumped away and the race was over. There was no catching him and although The Libel and Santa Damiana ran hard and finished officially half a length behind Sin Humo, the winner had much more than this left in him. He paid the good price of $7.10. The Libel showed grit in dead heating with Santa Damiana. Our sporting chance Maraschino was beaten cold and by several lengths by Arveja, in the last race, which has its peculiarities.

Nondina took the lead and for some reason was pulled back and waited on the others. But there was only one horse in the race which ended in a procession with Arveja first, Maraschino second and Nondina last. It is very many meetings ago that a three-horse race has been won by the favourite. However everyone was pleased with the $3.55 picked up by this race, which pulled things straight for many.

SUNDAY'S RESULTS

It was a grand day's racing that was seen at Palermo on Sunday, or perhaps better, it should be said, experienced at Palermo on Sunday and the persistent race-goer had an excellent day. Favourites behaved themselves fairly well on the whole, and it was really only in the seventh race that anything in the nature of a shock was suffered.

The meeting had its special features, consisting of a dead-heat and a disqualification, and again, in David Englander winning three good races, with Sun-Yat-Sen, Eureka III, and that grand old horse, Last Reason.

The result of the classic only went further to show that the class of this year's products is only very ordinary. Both Canora and Floripar, who were expected to do things, especially the former, were beaten stiff by both horses of the Iceache combination.

Canora made the running, with Floripar, leaving the two old stagers Mustafa and Last Reason, to bring up the rear. Between these two latter horses a grand race was seen, which ended in favour of Last Reason by half a head.

He is a wonderful horse, is Last Reason, and the only 6-year-old that is any good at Palermo, and who to-day does even more than hold his own. The time of the race, too, was first-class, and 2200 metres in 2.16 4/5 is really fast.

Englander rode Sun-Yat-Sen to victory in the first race, after allowing Ermita to make the running. It was a perfectly easy win, and a logical one. The only illogical thing about the race was Ermita's painful exhibition, about which the less said the better. However, it can be remarked that Ermita is a most unlikely winner until after she has had a good rest. Sanchez ran fairly strongly into second place.

The public got their second win when La Amendra cantered home two and a-half lengths in front of Camboata. She was installed a hot favourite and won her race from start to finish.

An exciting dead heat between Los Angeles and The King came with the running of the colts' race. Winer, the favourite, ran third a length and a quarter away.

It is some time since Edmund Frazer figured as a winning trainer, and it is to be hoped that the end is coming to his late bad luck. On Saturday he had a nice win with Carreras, and on Sunday, won the first race at La Plata with Rasqueta, and on receiving the news played up on to The King, so that it looks as though a change is coming in Frazer's luck.

In the run-off Los Angeles had no difficulty in beating him, which strictly was quite a logical result.

There were two horses in this race worth watching; they are Le Notre and Chirlo. The former is a certain winner in time, and it was somewhat remarkable to notice that Chirlo was so heavily backed with young Maver up, and on his first run, too. We shall hear of both these two youngsters before long, and only hope we may be "on" them when they win.

Eureka III, polished off the mile in 1.37 2/5, and had an easy victory over Debutante. Our effort to find an outsider was made at the wrong moment. Tareta was not out to win, judging by the way she ran, and we must admit that even had she been, she had no chance of beating Eureka.

So far everything had gone smoothly for the public, who were pocketing the money fairly easily. It was just a toss of the coin whether Canora or the Iceache horses would be favourites for the classic. Canora had the honour by about 150 tickets.

Why the public should have thought fit to make Perjura favourite in the sixth race (one over 1400 metres) is a mystery, and quite illogical. Passimal was the logical candidate, and should have been favourite. Betting away from her was on the off-chance of the other winning, but certainly to bet away from her until another was installed favourite was absurd.

Las-si-mai won with a fair amount in hand from Chilca and our "sport," Diosa. Espinita is the animal which did not show up too well, but one who will undoubtedly win some other time. Thanks to the G. P.'s fancy for Perjura, Passi-Mal paid a nice price. $10.10 was much better than could reasonably be expected.

This race gave the Iceache Stud their double, just as the meeting also gave the Stud Amistad theirs.

In the seventh event Tamandare was backed to the clouds, and incidentally ran last. Acosta won on Chiribiribi, but only by a neck from Desastre, who put up a strong finish, carrying 48 kilos. Desastre is almost in winning form now.

This event was a horrible thing for the public, and with Arveja plus Torterolo failing them in the last event, some of the nuts did not appreciate it. However, that Torterolo lost on Arveja in this race was not his fault. The horse broke down in the run home, and was pulled up and walked in. The jockey dismounted.

Redentor won the race by the smallest margin in a tough finish with Calambour. But Denna was invited to explain his riding to the stewards for boring and interfering with Calambour and therefore backers of Calambour leached once again, and for them the day was a good one.

Before closing these notes there are one or two matters as the outcome of yesterday's racing that are worthy of remark. First and foremost comes the outcry against the manner in which Floripar was run in the classic. The experts claim that this was nothing short of disgraceful, and that all Floripar did was to interfere sufficiently with Canora and prevent her winning. Thus say the experts, and point out how scandalous was the affair. We take no part in the discussion, but we certainly do feel justified in telling the public what we think of them for their exhibition of hostility after his losing on Tamandare.

The horse lost because he was not good enough to win, and it was not the jockey's fault the public made him favourite. Again, if the public behave in this disgraceful and unsportsmanlike manner, they deserve all they get. Sport is sport the world over, but there are some at Palermo who seem determined to bring discredit upon it.

The third point arising out of the meeting brings from us a strong protest concerning the running of Arveja. What is an official veterinary surgeon for? Torterolo reported the horse unfit to run before the race, and complained of his shoeing. No notice was taken, and as expected, the horse broke down. Apart from this, while having every sympathy for Arveja, we have none for the owner or trainer. In any case the horse should not have run, and after his recent performances should have been allowed at least a few days' rest. When people become greedy they have only themselves to blame if anything happens. Thus have the Stud Ultimatum cooked a goose that laid them the golden eggs.

The meeting was remarkable for breakdowns. Good By broke down. Chaica possibly will not be able to run again. A rupture of tendons was the cause of her being brought back in the ambulance. Add to this the case of Arveja, and one asks again where was the official "vet.," and what are his uses?

After the meeting Torterolo left for Montevideo, where he is engaged to ride Solis in the big classic.

LA PLATA

Racing at La Plata on Sunday produced some excellent results, and the meeting was remarkable for a series of exceedingly close finishes. It was also one of the most satisfactory meetings, from the public point of view, that has taken place there for a considerable time.

The first race was won by Frazer's Rasqueta, and the public were well on her, and allowed no more than a $3.30 dividend to be paid out. She won by several lengths, cantering away from No te Creo, who ran three and a half lengths in front of Ganancia. It was a hollow victory.

The good news of Rasqueta's win arrived at Palermo just in nice time to enable a good stiff bet to be made on The King, who although dead heating, paid a nice $9.65 dividend. This double was a highly pleasing one to Mr. Frazer, whose luck has been out of late.

After the first event came the remarkable series of finishes right up to the end of the programme. Never more than a neck, half neck; head or half-head separated the winner from the second horse from now onwards. Capitan Piazza won by only half a head from Spingardi, and the next event ended in a dead heat between Old Green and Mal Palo, both running several lengths in front of Hormigon.

The dead heat was run off, and ended in a very easy win for Old Green, who is a much better colt than Mal Palo. There was immense excitement in the fourth race, Galga only winning by a neck from Pichuleta, with Iru half a neck behind.

Half a neck again in the fifth race separated Merito and Saqueador. El Payo, Apiz, and Estoico II, the winners of the last three events, were all neck verdicts, so that there could be no complaints that the sport on Sunday afternoon was not thrilling enough. The full results were as follows:—

Premio Vocinglero, 1600 metres.—1 Rasqueta 58, by Gerolstein and Guerilla, stud 58 by Ger. E. (F. J. Perez); 2 No te creo 57; 3 Ganacia 55. Also ran: Marguerite 55 (4).

For the championship of the First Division it may be accepted that San Isidro and Racing will play off, and the match will in all probability take place on Sunday, January 9.

RACING v. PLATENSE.

This match, the only one played amongst the First Division teams on Sunday, was decided at Avelaneda, before a large number of spectators.

Racing won with the greatest ease by 5 goals to nil.

The teams were:—

Racing: S. Arduino; Presta and Reyes; A. Betular, F. Olazar and R. Pepe; Z. Canaverl, A. Ohaco, A. Marcovecchio, J. Hispital and J. Perinetti.

Platense: A. Perez; A. Ansaldo and E. Berti; J. Santangelo, J. Zacheo and A. Felisari; A. Garcia, J. Colombo, T. Winigaglia, A. Amores and M. Malmaceda.

The match was a very one-sided affair. In the first half Marcovecchio scored three times. The first goal came from a passing movement between Canaverl and Ohaco. The second from a brilliant individual effort by Perinetti, and the third from a pass by Canaverl.

In the second half Ohaco and Canaverl were the scorers.

ARGENTINE BOY SCOUTS

SUMMER CAMP.

The troops of Boy Scouts of the districts of Avellaneda, Barracas, Caballito, Once and Villa Devoto, mustering some 80 members, have arranged to have their annual encampment at the Estancia "Santa Rosa," the property of Sr. Rlvero Haedo, who has most kindly offered suitable accommodation for this purpose.

The above corps will therefore set out for Estacion Islas Partido 25 de Mayo on the Southern Railway, leaving the Barracks situate at Isabel la Catolica 915, on January 2, at 6.30 a.m.

The encampment is to be held till the end of January next. The programme consists, as usual, of daily exercises in physical training and exhibitions of skill in first aid, nursing and life-saving, and various tournaments in manly sports.

Examinations of competence to pass into second and first class will be held.

Discourses by the Captains on Scoutism and moral virtues will be an interesting feature of this encampment, from which, it is hoped, the excursionists will return to their homes stronger in body and happier in mind.

This encampment will be under the direction of Chief Scout-master Claudio Lago.

A COW'S CAREER

REIGN OF TERROR IN BERNAL.

Bernal, or rather a portion of this suburb, was in a state of considerable excitement yesterday morning, and all through a cow. There was apparently some cause for alarm, for after peacefully being led through the streets by a peon, the animal suddenly took it into its head to break loose. Careering right and left, it became enraged at the efforts to chase it, until, completely beyond control, it charged a lady, Senora Maria Amilio, and inflicted a nasty wound in her stomach. She was attended to in a local chemist's shop.

Continuing her wild career, the cow next attacked a man who bolted into a lecheria and managed to avoid the full force of the charge, but at the same time was slightly hurt. It was due to a woman that the man escaped. She struck at the cow and diverted its attention, but was herself unable to escape, and was severely injured and gored. Her condition is grave. The animal did no further damage before being recaptured.

BOXING

BUENOS AIRES BOXING CLUB

IMPROMPTU ENTERTAINMENT.

There was something in the nature of a surprise in store for the visitor to the Buenos Aires Boxing Club on Dec. 27.

It was not an especial evening, and only one of the usual ones given at this home of sport. No printed programme, and nothing startling, but at the same time everything good. The surprise to the casual British visitor consisted in seeing the youth of Argentina in the boxing ring. One has become so accustomed to see them do anything but box and enter into what the Britisher considers sport, that the change was pleasant and surprising.

Last evening at the club was an entertaining evening, and an exceptionally large number of people—members and non-members—were present. The non-members were the subject of later remarks by the President. No further admittance will be given to those who are not members, a wise and judicial step, this, because the club is self-supporting, and it is quite unreasonable to expect a really high-class and entertaining boxing night unless one has the right to expect it.

Some of the boys—perhaps they would prefer the term "young men"—who stepped into the ring were clean built, muscular lads, and did great credit to their teacher, Willie Gould. The difficulties of teaching the young blood of Argentina the true meaning of sport can be fully appreciated by the average Englishman, and thus the boxing instructors' success is made all the greater.

A small room, with a perfect boxing ring constitutes the Buenos Aires Boxing Club premises. If it is possible to judge by last evening's exhibition, then they are worthy of better premises.

The programme given was attractive, Julio Perez and Jose de Lion met over three exhibition rounds. The former was much the superior, and reflected great credit on his teacher, Willie Gould. He treated his opponents with consideration.

P. Sanglas versus Ehuartln was a nice match. They both were in earnest and some hard knocks were given and yet it was a good, clean, stand-up boxing match.

Although the meeting between Frascoli and Bringas was a show, which perhaps could be described as the fight of the evening, it did not appear any too clean a one. Attractive, yes, but one of the competitors was a distinctly foul fighter, in that he used one stroke which would in the English ring or the American circle have brought him into trouble. Again he was foul in an attempt at a kidney punch, and a few other incidentals better left unsaid. These remarks are for the boxer's own benefit. Next time he fights foul he will not enjoy it so much.

McCarthy and Gallardo had the honour of the three closing rounds. A rattling, lively exhibition was given, and with plenty of fun in it.

McCarthy has forgotten more than three-quarters of the people in the room knew about boxing, but signs of adiposity were noticeable. McCarthy was wonderfully quick, sufficiently tricky, and thus a fine and entertain-

LACK OF PRISON ROOM

A Growing Scandal

NECESSITY FOR REFORM

The question of overcrowded prisons has again become one of predominant interest and undoubtedly calls for speedy and thorough attention. According to "La Nacion" proper remedial measures would cost not less than $11,018,500 for the Prisons of the Capital alone according to the architects who have considered the subject and furnished estimates. Such a quotation is, however, sufficient to postpone the work practically to the Greek Kalends, for it belongs to a class of necessities which are admitted to be such but concerning which no one is violently desirous of taking immediate action, especially when such betterment must be expensive and possibly entail the postponement of other projects which are more desired.

It is a well known and scandalous fact that in the National Prison, the shortage of cell accommodation results actually in promiscuous herding together, often under most unpleasant conditions of people under arrest, persons on trial and actual convicts, a state of affairs which is shocking and must result in great moral injury to minors who may for some trifling offence find themselves in touch with hardened criminals of the violent type, debauchees and rascals of every description, very bad company for the impressionable to say nothing of the fact that the uncondemned are obliged to associate with the convicted and to partake of their conditions of life.

The Minister of Justice while unable to do away at once with these arrangements desires and intends to effect an improvement which is to be begun at once.

His intention is said to be the erection of an edifice in the vacant ground of the National Jail with cell accommodation for 1500 prisoners according to the recommendations of the Committee in Prison Improvements who calculate its cost at something over a million. This reduced expense has been arrived at by using material obtained from Government sources as in the case of the Pavilions at Marcos Paz; these measures together with the economies of using the prison workshops, giving up the unsatisfactory quarters (often dear also) in which police are disposed and lodged will reduce the outlay very notably. Of course, this will not make the Prison system perfect, far from it, but it will do away with some of the worst features of the present state of things and is of good augury for the future.

There is of course a great deal to be done in the way of improving Provincial prisons, as recent scandals remind us, but the subject is too large and the expense also very great, wherefore it is probable that the present state of things must endure some time longer.

ing bout was seen. Gallardo is a hardy and powerful opponent, but very slow.

Last night's referee was señor Marcelo Peacan del Sur, and the time-keeper Sr. Isaac Aguirre.

PARQUE LEZAMA FETE

In Aid of Allied Red Cross Funds

A STUPENDOUS SUCCESS

FRIDAY

How the whole world of Buenos Aires gave their support to the Grand Festival at the Parque Lezama in aid of the Red Cross Funds of the Allied Nations will go down in Argentine society history as one of the finest efforts for a good cause ever witnessed in the Republic.

The Municipal Intendente had loaned this park—perhaps the most spacious and beautiful in the city—for the purpose to a representative committee of ladies, at whose head was Inez Victoria, Marquesa de Mora, on the understanding that one evening's receipts at the entrance should be handed over in aid of municipal hospitals. The lighting, too—an array of coloured electric stars—and the services of a municipal band, and the band of the Depositorio de Marineros were also readily promised.

Nothing could have been more favourable than the weather, which without a sense of oppression, was sufficiently refreshing and fine to permit of the most dainty of costumes and to allow of everything being done to the greatest advantage.

Thronged of people visited the park last evening, and as late as 11 o'clock at night more arrivals kept pouring in through the gates. To estimate exactly thousands present last night is impossible, and even the officials in the box offices had not got through their task at a late hour.

Many coloured lights signified the arrival at the Park, and on passing up the wide walk one became surrounded by ladies, strenuously pressing forward the many dainty things they had for sale. Who could resist them? But few of the many. Half-way up the walk was Lilac Cottage, the centre of business, and then came a vista of the stall of the Allied Nations which was the place where all the good things that come from England, Russia, Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, were represented. There a great trade was done. Amongst the ladies in charge of these stalls were Marquesa de Mora, and Mesdames Thomas Bell, Chevallier Boutell, Gamburg, Moss, Drabble, Norton, Van Peborgh, Del Becque, Withington, Mackie, Philip, Tudor-Wilson, Geoffrey, Tudor and Wigg. At the Russian stall was Senora Rosa Pavlovski. Madame Dupont and Mdlle. Juanita Dupont, were at the French stall. Other ladies were Senoras Torre, Rosa, Pega Sana, Soberan, Egarte, Marini, Luboli, Law, and Gwujen. In all, some 80 ladies constituted the committee. These with a hundred young lady helpers, were tireless in their endeavours. One lady even before the fete commenced, had collected $2771!

A particular interesting item was seen at one stall, namely, an autographic letter of the famous Garibaldi. Presented in a frame, this will later be raffled.

Passing further into the gardens, one came upon the terrace from whence a view could be obtained of a vast arena below, where there was seating for thousands, and in the centre of which were the stage and the band, open all around. A good view could be obtained of the various items which were given, but admittance was refused to any who did not pay for the privilege of a closer inspection. Even the Press had no chance, with the result that no details of the music, dancing and singing can be given.

The printed programme was as follows:—

1. National Anthems of the Allied Nations.
2. A series of allegorical pictures representing the five Nations, in which the following ladies took part:—Ophelia Surra, Russia; Eileen Scott, Italy; Gladys Baillie, France; Carlota Nicholson, Red Cross; Estela Koch, Serbia; Stella Dougal, England; Molly Mortlock, Belgium; followed by 2. Minuet, by Señoría Anita Nieve; 3. Tarantella, by Señorita Violet Bisset; 4. Castanet dance, by Señorita Ada Shaw; 5. Vic d'une rose (a dance), by Señorita Chicken Ruggeroni; 6. Russian dance, by Señorita Anita Nieve.

Part II.

1. Spanish songs and dances.
2. The London Girls: Misses Celia Lee, Nellie King, Gladys Ray, and Eileen O'Connor, from the Theatre Royal.
3. Russian dancers, "Los Zarestzi."
4. Italian singers.
5. Mlle. Viviana, a French singer.
6. Spanish dancers.

Further afield was the Christmas Tree, an immense and wonderful tree some 50 feet in height and gorgeously hung with coloured lights, flags, and children's toys. What a business was done! Crowds visited the tree, and hundreds of little ones went away with their wee arms full of dainties.

Away to the right was the cinematograph amidst the supper tables whence at 11.30 p.m. a great number of people drifted to partake of the good things.

Fireworks, too, enlivened the proceedings.

The success of this fete must have been stupendous, and even greater crowds are expected to-day and Sunday.

Owing to there being no list of stallholders and of lady assistants, and to the fact that there was no organisation in existence which could furnish full information, many ladies' names may be inadvertently omitted, and other details of importance may also have shared the same fate as did the theatrical entertainment.

It was these points which furnished the only drawbacks to a remarkable fete at which no single person of importance in the Allied society of Buenos Aires was missing.

The programme of the festival arranged by the Committee of ladies continues to-day. For the matinée which begins on Sunday at 3 prices of entrance will be $1 for "grown ups" and for children 50 cents. This occasion is peculiarly a children's fete, and a programme of special attractions to the juvenile world has been arranged for their delectation.

In addition to those already reported, the following donations have been received:—

In cash.—Franz van Ryel and Co., $10; Lily D. de Allston $10; Comp. Anglo Argentina de Carbon $50; Sr. Virgilio Vaghi $10; Mrs. C. M. Anderson $100; T. R. Ainscough $50; F. J. Balfour $10; "Niblick" $50; "R. M." $50; E. A. Ryan $10; "S. J." $5; "A. A." $25; "La Patria degli Italiani" $100.

In kind.—Casa Tagini, 6 boxes powders, 6 inkstands; Carlos Hofer and Co., 3 cases Fernet Branca; Comité Patriotique Français, 3 branches of artificial flowers; Alfredo d'Huicque, 8 tins of coffee; Chernot and Co., an embroidered cloth; "La Patria degli Italiani," pocket almanacs.

SATURDAY

A SECOND DAY SUCCESS.

Everything was again in full swing at the Parque Lezama last night, which marked the second day of the fete organised by a committee of society ladies in aid of the Allied Red Cross Funds.

A vaster crowd of people than ever attended the celebrations, but whether those who were present were so active in buying, in subscribing to raffles and the like is a doubtful point. It appeared as though the greater number present were content to stroll about and enjoy the scene and brilliantly lit garden, to remark upon the dainty dresses and to wander under the trees pour passer le temps.

There were a few changes from the night before. The famous band of the Deposito de Marineros was playing close to the entrance (incidentally blocking up the walk and leaving only the narrowest of ways for the entering crowds to pass) instead of down in the amphitheatre.

Another municipal band put in an appearance and was playing near the supper tables. Occasionally the strains of the theatre orchestra mingled with those of two bands could be heard.

It is as yet impossible to estimate the thousands of dollars which the fete will bring into the coffers of the Red Cross Funds. Without question, the attraction has been magnificently supported, and for the moment that is enough.

Changes in the programme of the theatre were made, which last evening opened with Spanish dances. The four "London Girls" in their English dance met with a good reception and were followed by Russian dancers and Italian duetists.

Mlle. Viviana, the French singer, met with a great reception and was twice encored.

Even through the strains of the powerful band playing in the gardens her fine voice could be distinctly heard and appreciated a great distance away.

The second half of the programme was very attractive and consisted of patriotic songs by M. Florent Dumortier, the Brazilian maxixe, tangos, and Prof. Giacomo with the violin.

Another attraction was the singing of the Italian Choral Society under the leadership of Signor Ponchielli. All other attractions remained as before, while the enormous crowd present in itself ensured a lively success.

SUNDAY

Sunday night's function at the Parque Lezama Fiesta was no less brilliant and thronged than its predecessors.

Many visitors entered early but the real rush set in later. All the attractions were liberally patronised, the theatre, the Christmas Tree and the Kiosk of the Nations having their special followings. The Boy Scouts "with drum and colours" marched through to great applause which was also bestowed upon the excellent performance of the Band of the Naval Depôt. All evening also the restaurant continued to be thronged and the general animation continued after mid-night.

CHRISTMAS TREAT TO CHILDREN

Every year poor Spanish-speaking children to the number of two thousand have a Christmas Treat provided for them through money raised by the Pastor of the American Church.

This takes the form of "caramelos" supplied in bounteous quantity and sent to some eighteen or twenty centres in the city and vicinity for distribution through the Pastors having charge of various Methodist missions and schools. The distribution has been actively going on this week and will continue for some days to come.

Besides the two thousand children, two hundred more in the Lazaretto will receive a still more bountiful supply and variety of good things. Here also two hundred and fifty poor tuberculosis sufferers—many almost in articulo mortis—will receive "caramelos," rosy American apples, boxes of "galletitas," etc.

The permanent colony of some fifty lepers will receive the same with addition of games, etc., and for the thirtieth time will enjoy the brightest day in the calendar—to them. This annual treat for the thirtieth time will take place next Friday (Dec. 31) afternoon at the Lazaretto itself, just beyond the British Hospital. It is the largest hospital on the Continent, covering over thirteen city blocks, and the grounds with their shrubbery and flowers are the most beautiful of any hospital in the city. Incidentally it might be said that the above is only a small part of the work which the Methodist Church in this district is doing all the time for the children. Including the annual appropriation from the home Church, it spends on the children in school and orphanage work in this vicinity annually some fifty thousand dollars.

CHRISTMAS AND THE POOR

SALVATION ARMY FESTIVITIES.

THURSDAY

The Salvation Army festivities commenced last night at the Barracas men's night shelter, where dinner was given to some two hundred and fifty men. The dining-hall as well as a large hall at the side, was decorated with flags, plants, etc., and illuminated prettily with electric light.

The bill of fare was as follows:—Soup, roast beef and potatoes, rice pudding, biscuits and cheese, and lemonade. Whilst the men were enjoying their meal, music was provided by the headquarters band. After the meal everybody settled down to the programme, which was full of interesting items: recitations, vocal solos, English concertina solo and duet, selections by the band and songster brigade. The speeches were short and bright. Col. Palmer presided. The function was a real success. Ensign Snell once again showed his catering abilities by supplying a first-class meal which was appreciated by all the men who were present.

FRIDAY

DINNER TO WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

On Dec. 24 the Salvation Army gave a free Christmas Dinner to the inmates of their Women's Home in Calle Humberto Primo No. 3046.

Colonel and Mrs. Palmer presided, assisted by Mrs. Brigadier Deverell, the Headquarters Staff Band, and Songster Brigade. Several friends were present, and expressed themselves as highly gratified with the evening's programme. The large patio was decorated with flags, electric lights and scenic adornments. Over 60 women and children sat down to the meal, and seemed to enjoy the "spread" thoroughly. It consisted of the following: Soup, beef and vegetables; salad; rice with milk and figs; almonds and raisins; biscuits, cheese, lemonade and tea. During the meals the Headquarters Band and Singing Brigade gave some interesting items, and this was later followed by recitations and happy speeches. Mrs. Col. Palmer spoke most earnestly to the women, and her words were greatly appreciated.

The children were not forgotten. There was a Christmas Tree, also some moving pictures, which everybody enjoyed. A parcel containing a useful present was given to each child and each working woman.

MONDAY

After a series of dinners and entertainments to the poor of both sexes during the Christmas holidays, the Salvation Army directed its attention to the elderly men at Nueva Pompeya last evening. The Army's section of Industrial branch, usually utilised for paper sorting, was transformed into a large dining hall, and was decorated in a manner worthy of the festive season. Some 200 men—90 per cent. of whom were too feeble to be of value in the labour market—were entertained to an excellent meal, consisting of soup, roast beef, potatoes, salad, rice, almonds and raisins, bananas, cheese, lemonade, and tea.

The headquarters' band and the songster brigade rendered music during the evening, and a number of recitations were given by children present. A concertina solo by Adjutant Richards and a vocal solo by Staff-Capt. Booth were both received with enthusiasm.

Col. and Mrs. Palmer were in charge of the arrangements, assisted by Brigadier and Mrs. Deverell. The Colonel gave a short address, and introduced Staff-Capt. Jayet, the Manager of the Institution.

Among those present were Comisario Sanchez, of Section 36, and several officers attached to section 9.

CHRISTMAS DAY

SPECIAL SERVICES IN THE CHURCHES

St. John's Pro-Cathedral.

At St. John's Pro-Cathedral there was as might be supposed at Xmas morning an overflowing congregation. Christmas is so associated with home and home traditions that many who for one reason or another, good or indifferent remain away, make a point of attending on Christmas Day, remembering that they are propter amnem Babylonis.

The Church had been decorated with flowers, the pulpit having a perfect bank of them round it and nowhere is the effect more exotic than in church at Christmas.

The customary Christmas hymns and anthems were rendered and Bishop Every preached from the text "Fear not, behold I bring you tidings of great joy that shall be to all people."

First American Church.

At the American Church, Corrientes 718, there was a large congregation to hear Bishop Stuntz preach at the Christmas morning service. There was a full service of Christmas hymns and appropriate anthems also and the interior had been decorated, not with holly and ivy, but with palms and flowers. Bishop Stuntz discoursed from John 1 and 14. "The word was made flesh and dwelt among us." He dwelt strongly on the Divinity and Humanity of the Saviour; pointing out that those who professed themselves unable to comprehend such a conjunction, were also unable to explain the simplest daily events of their own lives and even the first cause of their corporeal motions; much less could they the Infinite and Incomprehensible. The dominant note of the Sermon was an exhalation to Faith, Courage and Hope.

St. Andrew's Church.

At St. Andrew's Church, Calle Belgrano, yesterday, there was a special Christmas service very largely attended. The music was specially chosen and appropriate to the occasion including the customary Christmas hymns "Christians Awake," "O Come all ye Faithful" and anthem "Hark, Hark my Soul."

Dr. Fleming said that many scoffers and even some Christians of feeble faith asked that on these times.

Christ himself warned us that he came not to bring peace but a sword, although one might have supposed after 2000 years of Christian teaching that this stormy period had passed. Many wonder why God permitted such carnage and the deadly effect of men's evil ambition. It was the eternal question of the existence of evil and sin. He exhorted his hearers to faith and courage and reminded them that the peace of Christ will be the ultimate goal. In future times, this age may be an inspiring example for Christian living even as now is the memory of the early martyrs, reformers and covenanters. Christ is the great consolator and the future of the world without Christ is unthinkable and that the world knows. There are many faithful even amid the materialism of the age and he looked forward to the recrudescence of the Christian spirit irresistible and consequent secure peace.

Salvation Army!

The Salvation Army celebrated a very interesting meeting in their central hall, Rivadavia 3280, yesterday morning.

Colonel and Mrs Palmer were assisted by Mrs. Brigadier Deverell, the headquarters band and songsters brigade. The newly formed boy band and children's singing brigade also took part. The spacious hall was very prettily adorned with ivy, plants and flowers, and the up-to-date arrangement of comfortable chairs, instead of the hard forms "of the first Salvation Army days," helped to make one feel quite at ease in this meeting. Both Colonel and Mrs. Palmer gave short but interesting discourses appropriate to the occasion, and a good and appreciative congregation joined heartily in the singing, thoroughly enjoying the service.

FESTIVITIES AT AMERICAN CHURCH

PERSONAL VISIT BY KING CHRISTMAS.

Among the places in Buenos Aires visited by Santa Claus (who is more popular at present by the less Germanic and more English name of Father Christmas) was the Hall of the American Church at Corrientes 718. The Young People assembled there have not been brought up on the miserable materialistic belief that "there ain't no such person"; in fact, a more devout collection of "True Believers" it would be scarce possible to find. In his scarlet robes and "miniver" he emerged from a little forest house (whither he had, no doubt, previously arrived by aerial reindeer sledge transit), and gave away many desirable things. The juvenile collectors had amassed the sum of $65, but the Christmas tree and the fruits thereof were naturally the principal points of interest. The Hall had been suitably decorated, and the similitude (luckily with the reigning temperature it was similitude only) of "the heart of a great fire at Yule" and a view out on snowy landscape gave an air of verisimilitude to the proceedings which not even the fact that Father Christmas had a suspicious resemblance to Mr. Tom Leeds could destroy. Blessed is the age of illusion, and a murrain on him who would prematurely dispel it. The Hall was very full, and the youngsters of the Sunday School were in great force. The proceedings other than already mentioned were as follows:—

Opening prayer, Rev. Dr. McLaughlin. Hymn, "O Come all ye Faithful." Piano duet, Carrie and Elsie Van Domseelaar. Recitation, "Santa Claus," Bessie Westmoreland. Recitation, "Arvice to Husbands, Eddie Aarhe. (From this young gentleman's age, the advice must be hearsay, and not the result of experience.) Recitation, "Precocious Children," Henry Junor. Dialogue, Bonnie Storer and Bessie Westmoreland.

As it was Innocents' Day, all this was very appropriate. Happily Herod has not been able to get here. He is busy in Europe.

THE DIAGONAL PROPERTIES

Dr. Gramajo, Municipal Intendente, has issued an ordinance recently sanctioned by the committee on the subject, directing the liquidation and payment of certain Municipal assets consisting of property situated in the North and South Diagonal Avenues and in certain suburban districts, in order to cover a debt amounting to $53,622,210.13, being the floating debt of the Municipality.

The value of the Communal property has been computed at about $172,772,647.68 which should be liquidated within the term of five years.

L'INFORMATION UNIVERSELLE

The Adversary (who may be either the Devil or his Vicar-General the Hun) ceases not day and night propagating lies and seeking to do evil. Happily there is now no lack of vigorous counter propaganda, and among those deserving of most honourable mention are the publications of L'Information Universelle. The numbers for Nov. 19 are to hand, and contain interesting articles on: "Argentine Meat in France," "Rapid Sea Transit from France to Latin America," "General News of Latin America," "The German Peril in Spanish America," every one of which is a vigorous bayonet stab into the quivering carcass of German falsehood.

MR. J. L. GARVIN

A Great Leader - Writer

HIS ATTITUDE ON THE WAR

The Evolution of a Journalist.

Mr. J. L. Garvin's decision no longer to support the Government must be a severe blow to those loyalists who never tired of thrusting him forward as the one good boy of the Unionist Press School. Those who know Garvin will not be surprised that he has taken such a step; the only wonder is that he did not do so before. J. L. Garvin is a great journalist; one of the greatest in Britain to-day; and he is still a young man. Of Irish parentage or descent he went through the mill in the eighties and at the age of 23—in the year 1891—was appointed leader writer on the Newcastle Daily Chronicle, which has for decades been a steady, sober journal taking a pride in its sane, scholarly editorials. Garvin held this position until the year of the Boer war, 1899, when he joined the political staff of the London Daily Telegraph. In his early days he had been closely in touch with the Irish movement, which was supported by the Newcastle Chronicle, and was popularly known as "a Fenian," although in those times the term was applied by the ordinary Englishman to every staunch Home Ruler. When Garvin became a member of the staff of the Telegraph he modified his views. The birth of the Tariff Reform movement coincide with Garvin's conversion to Imperialism and he was one of the first of Chamberlain's great supporters. In 1905 he assumed control of the Outlook, and contributed extensively to the great monthly reviews. His pen was untiring and he produced thousands of words in support of the Protectionist cause.

On the "Observer."

Then Garvin was given the editorship of the Observer, the largest most aristocratic, and by far the most literary of the Sunday newspapers. Not a "popular" sheet, it resembles more than anything the Times or the Telegraph. In addition, the Observer possesses characteristics which lent themselves to an untiring worker of Garvin's temperament and ability. For one thing, the journal is not content with an ordinary leading article; it also devotes from four to six columns each week to a special article, which is nothing less than a gigantic "leader" broken up by sectional headlines. It was in these columns that Garvin revelled. When the recent Home Rule controversy came into being, Garvin threw himself whole-heartedly into the Unionist cause. His early days had given him a sound knowledge of the tactics and aspirations of "the other side" and it was easy for him to thrust at the weaker joints of their armour. He was vilified and old Irish workers in Newcastle sought to discredit him by recounting statements that he was supposed to have made in his pre-Telegraph days. But their voices did not reach far, while Garvin had a powerful journal in which to give vent to his opinions.

"The Dollar Dictator."

When the fight was becoming strenuous, John Redmond and a body of supporters received special campaign funds from the United States. That was Garvin's opportunity. In an article of amazing strength, he attacked the party that sought "to dismember the Empire" and hurled at Redmond the epithet: "the Dollar Dictator." The phrase at once became popular; other Unionist journals adopted it; Home Rule organs replied to it; and music-hall comedians "gagged" it. Garvin was specially invited to contribute editorials against Home Rule to the columns of the Daily Telegraph— his old journal—and was then offered the editorship of one of the most literary of London's evening newspapers—the Pall Mall Gazette. This paper had been undergoing a period of crisis, principally because it had not kept abreast of the times. Mr. Garvin believed that "Names and Views" carried almost as much weight as news. On the latter side, he could never hope to defeat his powerful rival—the Evening Standard—but he could gain a sound footing with the second-largest circulation and at the same time strengthen the reputation of the paper for the quality of its literary contributions. In this effort he succeeded. The names of the men who have written for the Pall Mall during the last three years have been among the greatest in London; the dramatic and literary criticism have been equal to anything published in the Metropolis; and the news-service has been strong. Politically, any forecast appearing in the columns of the Pall Mall Gazette has been kept in mind and the sequel awaited with eagerness.

The Faithful Garvin.

Then the war came. In the first few weeks of the campaign it was difficult for the London journals to "straighten themselves out." At any moment the time might come when violent attacks on the Government might be considered necessary; on the other hand there was always the possibility that such attacks—even if justifiable—might be resented as unpatriotic. Garvin first of all contented himself with giving such news and information as he could obtain. He then, in company with the Daily Telegraph, adopted a policy of loyalty to the Imperial Government engaged in guiding the nation through a great war. Meanwhile, the Liberal journals had, been impressing the people with the almost supernatural ability of that Government, and the Northcliffe journals were convinced that the majority of "Whitehall's swans would turn out to be geese. That marked the cleavage between Garvin's journals and the Northcliffe press, all of which had in pre-war days been bitter opponents of the Asquith ministry. Mr. Garvin was at once seized upon as the one really patriotic anti-Liberal, and was invited to lecture at the National Liberal Club, when Mr. J. A. Spender, editor of the Westminster Gazette—the most influential of London's Liberal organs—acted as Chairman. This lecture was given only a few weeks ago and Mr. Garvin was regarded as a sound patriot who had discarded political beliefs and editorial policy in his desire to assist the Government. And now he has joined the critics. Why? Has Garvin become insane? Is he a pro-German? Are all those who have preceded him traitors to Britain? If so, then Mr. Asquith and his friends are the only really patriotic people in Britain. Granted; but there are yet other journals that will come round and join the great majority of to-day. It will then be pathetic to witness the "trust-the-Government people in this country and in Britain. They will be very, very few—and very, very wrong.

DOCTOR NAON RETURNS

RECEIVED BY PRESIDENT AFTER VISIT TO CHILE.

Early yesterday afternoon, Dr. Romulo Naon, the newly appointed Argentine Ambassador Extraordinary to Chile arrived in Buenos Aires after his brief visit to Santiago. Dr. Naon proceeded at once to Government House for an interview with the President of the Republic.

Dr. Sanfuentes, the Governor of Chile, has entrusted the Ambassador with a verbal message of greetings to Dr. de la Plaza.

To-day Dr. Naon will be received in formal audience of the President in the Salons of the Casa Rosada, where a number of officials and members of the Chilean Mission have also been invited.

Agricultural & Pastoral

Camp Notes

(By Our Agricultural Editor).

The past week has been remarkable for the varied climatic conditions experienced, and which were not generally favourable for harvest operations. The strong wind storms experienced towards the end of the week would have the effect of shaking the grain to such an extent as to cause very serious loss, especially on over-ripe crops.

Reports from the camp are all unanimous in reporting a bumper crop which is also threshing out very well, and giving a well filled grain. The great outcry in the native Press at this moment is the want of proper storage facilities for this country's great harvest. It is surprising to me how very little the farmers here really do towards erecting storage sheds for their grain when necessary, sheds to be used after disposal of the grain, for the better conservation of their valuable agricultural machinery. The latter is generally left out in all weathers to take care of itself.

I do not believe that in any other part of the world is such wastefulness practised in threshing or handling the crop as is generally followed here. The Government, as also several of the railway companies have issued instructions in the form of leaflets for distribution amongst the colonies, regarding the most theoretically correct way to stack and generally handle the crop. These instructions are most commendable in their way but the theoretical side predominates and in some cases concise details are lacking regarding vital points, which I hope to go into more fully in a future article.

The exportation of horses from this country offered so favourable prospects for the amassing of enormous profits, that many men or firms outside the trade were induced to embark on this generally recognised as a risky business. Not the least prominent among the many exporting houses was a firm whose business here is very distinct from the live stock trade, in any form. To ship horses was to participate in the great "boom," as the big prices on the home market calculated against what horse flesh was costing here left untold wealth awaiting those who had the available capital to "put up." To buy horses at a low figure and sell them at the big prices ruling on the British market was theoretically the most obvious way of making money; but the buyer's acceptance of the class of horses was apparently the least thing considered by these new men to the horse trade and evidently "new" to the standard of horse flesh most acceptable or saleable on the British market, as determined by the values realised. A rather remarkable sale of Argentine horses was held somewhere in Britain lately when a well-known auctioneering firm sold 100 Argentine horses at the remarkable figure of £13.6/- of an average. The top price of this consignment was £40 which was obtained for one solitary specimen. Only two other animals realised over the £20 line while one was actually sold for 12/6. The freight charges then ruling would be about £10 per head so, if this remarkable consignment cost any thing at all here they were sold at a loss, as an 8 per cent insurance has also to be taken into consideration. I am at no time a party to gloating over misfortunes in live stock speculation but as this remarkable sale has been the theme of conversation during the week among exporters or those interested in the great live stock trade of this Republic, I may be excused for referring to the matter in these columns. I have on so many occasions expressed my opinions regarding the class or stamp of horses likely to be most acceptable on the home markets, as judged by the prices realised; but evidently this consignment was not selected with any knowledge of the requirements of the home trade, as was most emphatically demonstrated by the prices realised. The lot already referred to were not the only consignment from this part of the world that did not fulfil the great expectations of their purchasers built up by office calculations on this side. Other firms of capitalists were forced to forego their great hopes of forming a "corner" in the horse trade, as was propounded to me under a bond of secrecy at the time by one of the best known financial magnates in the city. They have also suspended further shipments as they were operating at a loss. The native Press would have some very far fetched reasons to account for the non-acceptance of Argentine horses on the British market. The real reason is simply that the shipments referred to did not embody the reorganised type or quality which home buyers were prepared to purchase as likely to answer well their requirements for the diverse use to which horses are used in Britain, and under the different conditions be it borne in mind, all varying greatly in the value of work performed and thereby ruling the value of horses according to their suitability for such tasks.

More interest was shown this week by the various "freezers" in acquiring cattle, with the result that values were well sustained, and the market closed firm for all classes. The present prices being paid for good quality cattle in the camp would be about 26 cents. The sheep market has not shown any marked improvement from last week's trade, though all best quality pens readily found purchasers. Values for secondary quality were easier. Pigs, if of a suitable class and quality readily found purchasers at firmer values.

So satisfactory has been the results obtained by the Armour firm in the curing and sale of their hams and bacon, that by the advent of another season an active demand is likely to be experienced for porkers, or all suitable pigs for handling here or for export to the Smithfield market.

BUTTER SHIPMENTS

The 189,166 cases of Argentine butter shipped this year compare with 124,855 cases in 1914, 135,352 in 1913, 140,572 in 1912, 48,569 in 1911 and 110,361 in 1910. Like every other kind of produce, Argentine butter has gone up in value since the war. The present average price of £155 per ton compares with an average of about $135 per ton last year and the demand for Argentine butter in England to-day is only limited by the supply. Present freight rate is 1 1/4 d. per pound, after having been as high as 2d. per pound; normal (peace time) rate was 1 1/2 d. per pound.—Review of the River Plate.

ARGENTINE MEAT IN FRANCE

Dr. Santamarina, who has been in Paris, recently sent a statement to the Argentine Minister of Agriculture relative to the sale of Argentine frozen meats in France. The trade is great and constantly increasing, the quality of the meats being as highly appreciated by the civil population as by the troops. It is deeply interesting to know that the French Government has decided to construct a great depot for frigorifico purposes in Paris with a capacity of 5,000 tons, and that similar erections are being made at different points in France. Frigorifico vans will be used to transport the meat from the ports of disembarkation to the centres of consumption. These are to be of a capacity of 20 tons, and are to be maintained at a constant temperature of 15 degrees below zero.

THE CATTLE TRADE

Our contemporary, the Review of the River Plate, thus deals with the cattle trade outlook:—

"Cattle prices have dropped appreciably in the last month or two, the average, which Frigorificos are to-day paying for steers being on the basis of 26 cents per pound compared with an average of about 35 cents in August and September. It is believed in some quarters that prices will fall still lower yet. Freezing companies profess that on the present (25 cents) basis they are just about covering expenses. The needs of the British Government, so far as Argentine frozen meat is concerned, do not appear to be distressingly urgent. The standing contract allotted pro rata amongst the local freezing companies is for 25,000 tons per month. Shipments just now are not averaging more than 18,000 tons per month, due to the lack of tonnage to transport the whole 25,000 tons. We hear that the British Government consider Argentine meat to be quite sufficiently dear and that there is a possibility—not to say a probability—of still more refrigerated tonnage being withdrawn from this route unless prices drop appreciably. As we mention in another note, preference has recently been given to butter shipments in some refrigerated steamers, which does not suggest that the British public or the British Expeditionary Armies are in urgent need of Argentine meat for the time being. The home demand for meat in the United Kingdom has fallen off very appreciably from all accounts, due partly to the absence of so many men at the front and partly to the economy which is coming more and more into general practice every day. The following paragraph from a late London exchange bears this out:—

"Salesmen at Smithfield were almost unapproachable yesterday morning. Trade was very bad all round, and the huge stocks of meat without buyers had put the men in bad tempers. 'The weather has had something to do with it,' said one of the most prominent salesmen in the market, 'but the chief cause for the bad trade is the excessive supply of English produce—beef and lamb. When I say excessive supply I mean that it is more than we have got demand for. We are, perhaps, some hundreds of tons short of our normal supply, but the demand is so light now on account of the millions of men who have gone away and the practice of economy in the household. The prices all round are about 2d. per lb. less than they were a month ago. Frozen meat is only a fraction lower in price and the reduction in English and Scotch meat may eventually have the effect of the authorities having to lower the price of frozen meat unless they keep it in store until the new year, when we shall have to raise the price of English meat.'"

NATIONAL NIGHT ASYLUM

OFFICIALS DISCHARGED.

Owing to serious faults and derelictions of duty, the Committee of Asylums and Hospitals, whose President is Dr. Cabred, have requested the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Worship to discharge the director of the National Night Asylum.

Consequently, yesterday a decree was issued dispensing with the services of the director, Sr. Eugenio Winter, and the sub-inspector, Señor Guillermo Jericka.

The Garden and Orchard

HINTS TO AMATEURS.

(BY THE RUSTIC)

Garden.

The end of the month being at hand a thorough overhauling of the garden is advisable. All bulbs of plants which have finished flowering should be dug up and stored away. A general clearance of weeds should be made and lawns should be mowed and rolled. All season plants which have finished flowering pulled up and the beds dug up and prepared for the new plants. Where the ground requires it, manure should be added and mixed well with the soil. Evergreens should be trimmed and pruned and rose bushes cleaned up of dead flowers, etc.

Orchard.

The same practices as indicated for the garden as regards weeding, digging up, etc., should be carried out in the orchard. Where the regular practice of ploughing or harrowing is followed this should be done in January for the last time. Fruit thinning cannot be continued any longer with success, except in the case of grapes, pears or apples.

Plagues and Insects.

The persecution of black ants is one of the principal occupations of the gardener at present, and as I have already given particulars as to the manner in which this should be done, I need not repeat them here. The "mosquita" or young locust is putting in its appearance. This insect in the shape of "mosquita" is about one-eighth of an inch long and of a very dark green, almost black colour. It does a considerable amount of damage, though, of course, not as much as the adult insect. The "mosquitas" are comparatively easy to destroy, as in the evening they cluster in large colonies and remain until the following morning, in the early morning, before the sun rises and when the "mosquita" is still wet with dew and has not commenced to spread out, it can be destroyed with wire brooms, locust burners, or sprayed with insecticide sprays and then buried or removed to prevent the smell from the decayed insects.

General Notes.

It may interest readers to know something about dry-farming and its application in this country. It may not be known that only about twenty-five per cent. of the surface of the earth is suitable for ordinary cultivation with natural irrigation and that the remaining seventy-five per cent. could only be cultivated by artificial means of irrigation or by dry farming.

Dry farming, therefore, is the profitable production of useful crops on lands that receive an annual rainfall of 20 inches or less and where artificial irrigation is not possible. This means that large extents of ground in this country which are at present unproductive could be utilised probably by the system of dry farming. Also lands which receive a larger rainfall, but irregularly distributed, could be cultivated by this method. The principle is to store in the subsoil the water which in ordinary circumstances disappears by evaporation. It is well known by agriculturists that if the surface of the soil is allowed to form into a crust, this makes an excellent capillary system which draws the moisture in the ground to reach the surface and evaporate by the action of the sun or the dryness of the atmosphere. It is also known that the deeper the ploughing the deeper the water will soak into the ground. Therefore, dry farming consists in deep ploughing and continual cultivation of the surface of the soil, and requires deep soil, that is land where the subsoil is deep down or not impermeable if near the surface.

Many of these arid sandy soils which appear unproductive are rich in nutritive matters and if properly cultivated would produce very good crops indeed. If after making borings to discover the class of soil and subsoil it is found that this is deep down or the amount of gravel, if there is any, is in a lesser proportion, and it is ascertained that the rainfall is between 10 and 20 inches, such land can be considered good for dry farming. It must then be ascertained at what time of the year the heavier rainfalls occur, so as to have the deep ploughing finished in time for the broken up ground to receive the water and allow it to soak well down into the lower parts and there be stored away to supply the plants which are to be cultivated with the necessary moisture. The next care would be to keep the surface "worked," so as to avoid the capillary action as already explained. In due season, the preparations are made for sowing or planting as the case may be. In the case of grain, this should be sown in bands, alternating with bands of uncultivated land of equal width, so that half the surface is sown and the other half remains bare. In the case of permanent plantations, the trees or shrubs are planted in the usual form, provided that they are so planted as to allow the ploughs or harrows to work in between the rows. The cultivated ground is then continually worked so as not to be allowed to crust, and to keep the weeds down.

By large extensive cultivations the conditions of the climate are very soon changed, and in regions where the rainfall originally was very limited, in time it would become regular and normal in quantity.

LOANS TO FARMERS

BANCO DE LA NACION AND CEREAL WARRANTS.

The President of the Banco de la Nación had an interview yesterday at Government House with H. E. the President of the Nation regarding the facilities which the Bank is giving to agriculturists and merchants in the camp. Special credits in the form of warrants on cereals bagged and stored are arranged to enable the growers to evade the pressure of greedy speculators, usurers and middlemen. Special instructions have been sent to all camp branches of the Bank in this sense. The Bank has made a computation as to the probable cereal production of the country, and estimates that it may profitably employ about $150,000,000 of its reserves in the credit scheme referred to.

MILLING COMBINE IN CORDOBA

A NEW GERMAN CONCERN.

From Cordoba comes the information of the sale of some mills to a wealthy combination which has purchased these for the sum of eight million dollars.

The Letizia mills, the property of Messrs. Minetti Brothers, and others about Marcos Juarez are those concerned.

The new combine will trade under the name of Messrs. Minetti and Company, the company being represented by Messrs. Domingo, Juan and Bartolo Minetti, José Colombo, and Ciro Penazzi.

The Messrs. Minetti are represented by a capital of $2,150,000.

The concern, which commences business in January, is a German one and backed by German capital, and the combination of mills is, it is stated, sufficient to absorb practically all the produce of the surrounding districts.

CEREAL SHIPMENT AND STORAGE

Trouble Threatens Through Unpreparedness

MORE LACK OF FORESIGHT

Carpe diem, enjoy the present day and leave the least possible to the future, might well be taken to be Argentina's unwritten motto in things commercial. Prevision, save on the part of a few individuals, who as a rule profit very largely by their acumen, is not a trait of the national character. Many instances might be brought forward to support the assertion; the question of road transport springs at once to the memory. Given a difficulty, and schemes galore are brought forward in the public Press or the legislature whereby it may be instantaneously remedied. Nothing is done, and the effluxion of time, or the passage of the seasons, allays the trouble for a moment. Whereupon schemes and suggested legislation are alike forgotten. It is however very clear that this policy of laissez faire-laissez aller is dangerous, and one very much fears that its effects on the economic result of the actual harvest may be very serious.

The crops have done well, so well that according to the estimates of a contemporary, the Times of Argentina, a journal whose statistics may usually be relied upon, there will be close on 11,000,000 tons of cereals (wheat, oats, linseed and maize) to ship. Will the necessary tonnage be forthcoming and will the country in general be able to check a very heavy loss through deterioration if it is not? These are two pertinent questions that are now being ventilated in the columns of the Argentine Press, when as a matter of fact they have been matters of immediate moment any time during the past three years. The same journal to which reference has been made calculates that there is a possibility of the Republic having to store some 25 per cent of her crop. How is she going to do it?

Frankly, no satisfactory answer appears to be forthcoming. Yet this is not a thing that has come upon Argentina without warning. Even in normal years, when shipowners from all the Seven Seas were sending their ships Plate-wards for January-March loading, much waste occurred in both wheat and maize owing to the lack of up-country storage accommodation, temporary accommodation at that. The terrible losses suffered by last year's maize in the troja or stack owing to wet must recur to every thinking person's memory, but one fails to hear that any general action has been taken to avoid a repetition of a similar loss this year, save in a few individual cases. Wheat, haggard and even un-bagged, has been known to be utterly ruined on the very farm where it was grown, not even tarpaulins being available to protect the grain until it was transported to the only local store, the railway company's shed. To-day an eminently sensible suggestion is made by La Prensa regarding the possible use of Government bonded stores, now half-empty, by cereal growers. At the same time the coupling thereto of the warrant principle is admirable in theory but unworkable in practice. If the warrant is to have a real value as a good credit security it must represent not merely so much wheat, or other cereal, in bulk, but, must also stand for a certain weight and quality. Which implies some system of grading and drying the cereal.

The pity of it is that for the past ten years, and possibly for a still longer period, able men have been trying to implant in this country a system of local deposits, and both the official world and the farmer have behaved towards all such schemes with a dog-in-the-manger attitude that is now costing them dear. A fair profit, a good profit, is deserved by any individual or company that implants a system calculated to save millions to the community, but that profit would have been so hampered, and probably restricted, by unworkable regulations, as to come near vanishing point. Hence nothing on a general scale has been attempted. And the worst of it is that to-day, at this moment of greatest need, nothing can be attempted that will in any way influence this year's crop. All that Argentina can do is to pray for a dry summer and try to get as much of her crop under cover as she is unable to sell. The credit facilities to be given to the grower are all very well in their way; at any other time they would be worthy of study, elaboration, and general adoption. To-day they may very easily serve to make confusion worse confounded.

It is all very well for misinformed journals to misinform the public by saying that the machinations of the grain speculators and exporters are at the bottom of all the trouble, but facts are against them. Argentine cereal shipments may be handled by a group of large firms, and the system may be capable of improvement, but now is not the time to make the change. If anyone can get the crop away it is the man who has been in the business before, and even he cannot do it if the ships are not forthcoming. The freight position is too complex to go into here, but it may be remarked that even a big drop in freights will not perforce bring more tonnage to the Plate. There are excellent reasons, financial and sympathetic, that dictate the purchases of the Allies to-day; and the Allies are practically the only buyers.

These are but a few sketchy arguments of a general character, and one hopes that they will be confuted by the logic of events. In many individual cases that will certainly happen. The man who has sunk his money into barns, bagging, covering, and so forth, will have reason to bless himself. But unfortunately 'twixt crop and crop money has not been plentiful, whilst materials for the buildings requisite to good storage have soared to unheard of prices. If the camp in general has taken warning by past experience, then the outlook may not be so black after all. But unfortunately all the information one can gather serves to confirm the belief that through want of foresight or lack of means, this has not been the case.

BAHIA BLANCA NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

December 26.

The Bahia Blanca Gas Company.

Although the Bahia Blanca Gas Company have now been in existence over eight years, the results obtained financially have not come up to expectations, as it was hoped that the increasing number of residents would give at least a return of four or five per cent. on the capital invested, but owing to the bad years the population here has decreased on account of so many families removing to other parts of the Republic, and their places not being filled by new-comers. The actual profit at present does not exceed two per cent. Owing to the war the price of coal delivered here has more than doubled, although it is argued that the sale of the coke will compensate for this, especially as the price of the latter article has been raised also $8, but, as it takes two tons of coal to make one of coke, this small difference is very little in comparison with the present price of coal. Owing to the municipal regulations the company are not allowed to charge more than 24 cents paper for a cubic metre of gas, on which up to the present considerable discount has been given. It is now proposed to reduce these discounts in the effort to make ends meet.

Derailment of the Pringles Train.

On Friday several very exaggerated reports were afloat as to the delay of the Pringles train, when it was stated that it was off the line, and over 27 people had been killed. Fortunately, however, no one was seriously hurt, although one or two people were rather badly knocked about. It appears that as the train was entering the station of Las Hermanas, at about 5.20 a.m., near kilometre 430, the points not being in their position, the engine was thrown off the line. Luckily the speed of the train, which was 25 kls. per hour, was only moderate, otherwise the accident would have been much greater. As it was, the engine was thrown off the line, doing considerable damage to the waggons close behind it, a wagon of goods, two brake vans, and a first and second-class coach was totally destroyed. On the train were some 450 passengers, but only four of them received injuries. The engine-driver named Uzabel, had his arm broken, and the fireman, guard and postman were knocked about considerably. Special trains were at once sent out to the spot, one leaving here with a large breakdown crane at 8 a.m. The passengers by the damaged train eventually arrived here on Christmas Eve at 7.20 p.m. It is said that the altering of the points was the work of someone with criminal intentions.

A Daring Escape.

Two men named Frorini and Reyes, who had been detained in the prison here for some time, suspected of a robbery, were finally freed, as sufficient proof against them was not forthcoming. In the prison with them was a man named Juan Rodriguez, who had been condemned to 12 years' imprisonment for the assassination of a police agent. On leaving the prison the two men put the man Rodriguez in a mattress, and on arriving at the door asked the warder if he wanted to revise their mattress before they were let out. This he refused to do, as only the property of those who are admitted is examined. Shortly afterwards these men passed one of the principal officials, who, although he noticed that they were carrying a very heavy "mattress" very carefully, concluded that this had been examined before the men left, and did not take any further notice of them. Outside the prison a motor-car was waiting for them, and they were at once taken to a house in Calle Terrada. The escape of the prisoner was shortly afterwards noticed, and information was at once sent to the town police, who proceeded to arrest the two men and the "chauffeur" of the car which had taken them away, and at the same time to make active search for the missing criminal Rodriguez.

District Notes.

Several complaints are being received from the town of Goyena against the men who are awaiting the harvest, as it is said that they are going to private houses there at all hours asking for food, and stating that if it is not given them they will help themselves. They are able to do so on account of the police service there consisting of one man only.

On December 30 a sale of 4,000 head of cattle is to be held in the station of Laprida by the Society of the Agricola Ganadera.

A sale of 1,000 hectares of land took place last week near Azul belonging to Senora Ferrer. This was bought by Señor J. T. Collet for the sum of $105,000.

At the sale of livestock held by the Agrícola-Ganadera last week at Ayacucho, and belonging to Senores Sotero and Beheran, the following prices were realised: Steers of two and a-half years, $135 and $140; half-bred cows, $90 to $135; yearling steers, $110 and $88.80; cows with calves at foot, $60 to $93; heifers $86.50 to $101; the total realised being $315,356.

A meeting was recently held at Tornquist of the newly-formed company known as the "Rural," whose object is for general assistance to the colonists there. The sanction of the formation of this company has been granted by the Provincial Government, and at the meeting a board of seven directors was elected.

At the show recently held at Ayacucho, a ram from the estancia of Señor Iraizos was sold for the sum of $900.

On Thursday last the weather here was more like that of England at this season, as a storm came up from the south, and the wind was bitterly cold, causing people to appear again in their winter clothes and overcoats. Several sharp showers of rain continued to fall throughout the day. The evening was worse still, and the temperature fell to 45 degrees.

An information office has now been opened here by the paper, "La Nacion," in Calle Alsina 141, where the latest telegrams from the Capital may be seen. This office is under the direction of Señor J. A. Blanco.

CONCORDIA NEWS

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

December 22.

Weather.

Last week the great heat wave was making itself felt very much in these parts, 13 degrees being recorded in the shade. In one house where the owner kept a room shut from early morning 38° was reached. As was expected such heat could not last and on Saturday, December 18, it was broken by a rain storm, after which the temperature was extremely cool. On December 21 and 22 it became warmer again but yesterday evening a storm was brewing and swept over the district early this morning. It turned so cool with a strong south wind, that summer apparel had to be left on one side. At present it appears changeable.

Nurse Cavell Fund.

The local branch of the Women's Association had arranged to have a fête on December 18 in aid of the Nurse Cavell Fund and the lighting of St. Thomas's Church. Everything had been settled in the grounds of the Victoria Park in the morning but rain in the afternoon somewhat spoiled the affair. It was then decided to continue the fête on the Monday following. Nevertheless the results on Saturday were highly satisfactory, the receipts being over $350, and the total realised after Monday's efforts reached the respectable sum of $1,463.45. The following were the results of the different sections of the fête:—General Stall, Mrs. Stuart and Mrs. Neville. $703; Refreshment Staff, Mrs. Fiedler, Mrs. Kellard and Mrs. Taylor assisted by Miss Smith and Miss Ross, $225.95; Entertainments, concert party "The Snowballs" Mesdames Cowper Coles, Castle and Miss Roberts and Messrs. R. A. Colls, T. Bentzen, C. Todd and A. Williams who gave three performances in all, being loudly applauded for the excellent manner in which the many items on their programme were fulfilled, and the theatrical group composed of Mesdames Sketch and Neville and Messrs. Sketch, Fiedler and Neville, who produced that well known comedy "Why Women Weep," which, as the critics said, was surprisingly well done. The entertainments brought in the sum of $168.70. The Christmas Tree for children managed by Miss Truncoso and Miss Acosta realised $22. Children's races attended to by Miss Birdsall and Mr. Edward Morley resulted in $4.80, the entrance fees being very small. Last but not least was the good work done by little Miss Lorna Sketch, dressed as a Red Cross nurse, and Master Duncan MacKenzie as a wounded "Tommy" in full regimentals, who paraded about selling small photographs of themselves as mementos. Their efforts were so well appreciated that they netted $44. Whilst on Saturday, due to the change in the weather, only a small number of people attended the fête, such was not the case on Monday afternoon and evening. The large crowd assembled with the idea of enjoying themselves and supported the fête with a real good will. Many gave $5 and $10 bills for tickets worth 50 cents. For the success obtained, including those who helped at the stalls and concert and theatrical groups, who had a lot of work in preparing their parts, the Committee desire to thank Mr. Henry Bell for erecting the stage and helping to arrange the stalls; Mr. Ritchie and Miss Birdsall for giving up their time in preparing the production of "Why Women Weep"; the Victoria Park and Concordia Tennis Club Committees for facilitating the use of the Park and pavilion and tea utensils, etc.; Mr. Knight for the excellent electric lighting arrangements made. For gifts and donations received for the "Edith Cavell Memorial Fund," Mr. Flemming, Mrs. Sinclair and family of Chajari, Miss McKinnen, Rev. Mr. Bate, Mrs. Edwin Brown of Bai-biene, Mrs. Scott of Yofre, Mrs. Hogg of Tari, Mrs. G. O'Dwyer, Mr. Jack O'Dwyer, Mrs. Soady, Mrs. Cooper Coles, Mrs. Mackenzie, Mrs. Morley, Mr. E. F. Beasley, Mr. Burgess, Mrs. W. G. MacKern of Buenos Aires, and Messrs. Auld, Nevin, R. Grant, Simon, Feeney and Barlow of Buenos Aires. After deducting expenses a clear profit of $1,240 is at the disposal of the Committee of the Women's Association, who are entitled to all praise for the excellent manner in which the whole affair was carried, especially the Honorary President, Mrs. R. H. F. Stuart.

Social.

Mr. H. Bishop, who for some years worked in the Province of Corrientes and left for good some four months ago to live in the United States, has again returned to practice in Mercedes. His many friends will be glad to hear of this as he was always considered a first class dentist, and was badly wanted in these parts.

Mr. Fred. Dickinson left Concordia a short time ago for Matto Grosso, where he will look after estancias on behalf of his firm. He will be missed not only on account of his sporting character, he was the first captain of the cricket eleven of the recently formed Victoria Athletic Club and would have been a strong help to his side, but also for the fact that he was to his friends a "good fellow."

CHRISTMAS EVE SKIRMISH

"THE ROARING BOYS" WITH KNIVES.

People have different methods of celebrating the season of good will (when a great deal of rancour is frequently loose), and a fight with knives is one way of doing it. At the corner of Saenz and Ministro Brin, on Christmas Eve, Manuel Chirvo and José Marineri sat down in a café to cards. Fortune proved ungracious to one, as is often the case; he became angry which is not uncommon; the cards flew about the room, which is also not unprecedented. Finding that these methods of appeasing the fickle goddess were ineffectual, he tried a little cheating, but his opponent had been there too and recognised some of his favourite manœuvres. This led to language, the upsetting of the table and the brandishing of the cortaplumas. After a brisk attack, Marineri feinted in seconde and making a high thrust cut Chirvo in the face. At this point, the police interfered and declared that honour would have to be satisfied. The damaged Chirvo is careened for repairs at the Rawson Hospital, and Señor Marineri is repenting being "so cunning of fence" in the cold shades of Comisaria 24's calabozo.

CAJA DE CONVERSION

BUSY ISSUING FRESH PAPER.

The end of the year and the movement which it invariably brings in its train both in Banking and Commercial business makes the need for fresh currency more sensibly felt than ever.

There has been for some time past a complaint of the scarcity of the issues of notes of smaller denominations, inasmuch that a clean new dollar bill has been something of a variety and, veterans have remained in circulation which should have been honourably retired some time since before they dropped to pieces or became illegible. Not all the resources of gum and stamp paper can make them other than disreputable.

The Caja de Conversion has been exceedingly busy during the current month and it has been fulfilling the demands of the country districts as well as those of the capital and great cities. It has been computed that the Caja has issued about two millions of $1 bills; one million of $5 and eight hundred thousands notes of ten dollars. This ought to be a slight appeasement to the "sacred rage" for paper.

DAY BY DAY IN ROSARIO.

(From Our Correspondent).

Dec. 28.

Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Crouch have gone to Mar del Plata for a holiday.

The Rev. Canon Pepys is expected back at the end of the month.

St. Bartholomew's School will reopen at the end of February, according to present arrangements.

The Sunday School prize distribution and Christmas Tree at Alberdi will take place on the 30th for the English children; and, on New Year's Eve, similar functions for the Spanish children. The last named occasion will include an impromptu concert, and a conjuring entertainment which Mr. Montgomery has kindly promised them. Tea will be provided each day, and the chair will be taken by the Rev. S. C. Deacon, who is striving hard to make this Christmas a memorable one for parents and children alike.

Very soon there is bound to be a change in our local chaplaincies, for the return of Canon Pepys and the departure of the Rev. S. C. Deacon for the Chaco, which I understand has been arranged for March, will necessitate certain readjustments.

Much sympathy is felt with Mr. C. Thomas, the well-known ship's chandler of Rosario, in the death of his mother, which sad event occurred last week. The funeral was very largely attended, and some beautiful flowers were sent.

Funes Tennis Club was in a gay mood on Sunday with visitors from all the neighbouring centres of population, the occasion being a tournament. Two prizes were offered, consisting of handsome photo frames. Some of the play was quite good, although on such occasions it is rare that the local cracks are on top form; there is this to be said of tennis, however, that it is exceedingly easy to meet with a worse player than oneself. Time did not allow for the tournament to be concluded, and play is to be resumed on Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Marston and Miss Brewer should be back in Rosario this week; the ladies have come out from Europe on the Desna, and Mr. Marston journeyed to Rio to meet them.

The prize distribution in connection with the Methodist Church Sunday School took place on Christmas eve, and proved most enjoyable, the attendance including practically the whole muster on the role, not to speak of the parents.

Mr. Werner has had a specially busy time lately, since the death of Mr. Turner, as the bulk of the work of the Northern Section has fallen upon his shoulders.

ACCIDENT TO DOMINGO TORTEROLO

It is unfortunate that the last day's racing of the present year will not see Domingo Torterolo in the saddle, and that for the year he will have to be content with his 106 wins.

The reason is that he received a nasty fall yesterday morning when exercising a young filly called Speranza, a full sister to the luckless Smasher. Mingo Torterolo was exceedingly lucky in not receiving more than a severe shaking. Apparently the filly cannoned into the rails, and threw her jockey, who was fortunate enough to fall in soft and wet ground. The ambulance removed him to the infirmary, from whence he was later taken to his home.

The accident, it is understood, is not serious, and will only keep the famous jockey out of the saddle for a couple of days.

The filly Speranza was unhurt.

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN

CONCERT

Wednesday, Dec. 29

Mrs. C. H. White deserves much credit for the excellence of the concert arranged by her at the Seamen's Mission last evening, and for her untiring work as the accompanist for the numerous artists.

It was a rattling good concert, and thoroughly enjoyable. Consisting of musical, humorous, dainty and serious items, the programme possessed a fullness of variety which pleased every one.

The ladies of the evening were Mrs. H. R. K. Richards and Mrs. J. Evans.

Mrs. Richards, as usual, was in excellent form, and gave of her brightest and best, which she had to repeat again and again. Three songs in each half of the programme barely satisfied the audience.

Mrs. Evans, too, met with most hearty applause and encores for her songs.

The humourist of the evening was Mr. Humphreys, of Lomas fame, who was full of energy and so clever in his songs. The more strictly musical parts of the programme fell to the share of Mr. Adolfo Segall, with his violin. He plays with expression and taste, and with a really excellent control of his instrument. In both parts of the programme he met with encores.

Mr. Parry and Mr. Bevan bore the brunt of the more serious songs of the evening. These names are sufficient in themselves to show what a very excellent and enjoyable concert was given.

The programme was as follows:—

Part I.

1. Song, "Nirvana," Mr. Parry.
2. Song, "Jack Brilton" (encore "Un-til"), Mr. Bevan.
3. Song, "The Lads in Navy Blue" (encored, sang another verse), Mrs. J. Evans.

THE NAPHTHA TAX

ANOTHER PETITION AGAINST INCREASE.

Being nearer than before to the obnoxious increased duty upon naphtha, another petition against it has been sent to the Chamber of Deputies. The feeling of opposition, very strong from the first, has, if anything increased, and the latest signatories against the higher tax include the inhabitants of the Islands of the Delta and the islands of the Parana and Uruguay, proprietors of launches, motor boats, lighters and the riverside population generally: the motor interest is, of course, bitterly opposed to it, and with the best reason. Agriculturists, fruit growers, wood dealers, all in fact whose goods will be affected by increased cost of carriage, are in the protest, pointing out how prejudicial to the progress of those localities the impost must be, and how great a part naphtha plays both as a combustible and a propellant in the development of the Tigre district. The hideous possibility of return to water traction by oars and sail generally is actually hinted at, with the conjoint inconveniences and greatly increased expenditure.

THE FAILURE OF THE FORD MISSION

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24 1915.

It may still be too early to speak definitely of the failure of the peace mission on which Mr. Ford and his colleagues proceeded to Europe, but there is almost a certainty, in view of what has happened, that this failure will have to be written against the new Peacemaker's efforts. According to cablegrams Mr. Ford himself is keenly disappointed at the chilliness of his reception in Europe. One member of the party has died, and others are reported to have broken away. We are not with those who find it a kind of pleasant sport to cast ridicule and abuse upon the man who set out to bring peace to Europe, although we feel that in the case of the Ford mission no success could have been looked for, and that the American millionaire manufacturer was foolish to have set out on such an undertaking. Nevertheless he is entitled to all the credit the world can give him for honesty and nobility of purpose, and should his mission end in complete and ignominious failure, then we believe there still will be more sorrowing friends than hilarious critics of Ford and his party.

It is customary to look for all motives other than the avowed and ostensible one in such a project as that upon which Mr. Ford and his friends ventured. In some quarters it has been suggested that the whole idea was a smart piece of self-advertisement, and a desire on the part of a man risen from humble circumstances to loom largely in the field of international politics on which the fierce light of publicity shines. Some people have endeavoured even to assert that in some way the mission was to be a money-making adventure. For our part we can see nothing behind it other than the sincere belief of a man that by acting boldly and quickly he and his colleagues might be able to do what the warring nations themselves cannot do, and that is draw attention for one moment from war to thoughts of peace.

There are in the United States many men of great strength of character who regard this war as a colossal crime against civilisation. They have not been able to see, as many of their countrymen have seen, that for the sake of civilisation and the future peace of the world, the war must go on to the bitter end. They do not want to know who is right or who is wrong. All they can see is the hideousness of war for any purpose or any cause, and the thought that armies should be pounding each other to pieces strikes them as a horror to be stopped at any cost. These men—and women—feel that if they could they would throw themselves between the contending parties and demand that the war should cease. In following out this line of thought it never occurs to them that it may be quite right for the war to go on until the wrongdoer is thoroughly thrashed and humbled. In effect they see only brothers fighting, and no matter the cause they must intervene, even though they be advised not to do so, and though they be warned that intervention means only danger to the person intervening.

The Ford party has been imbued with this spirit which, no matter where it leads, must be admired and respected, even though it be generated from entirely mistaken conceptions of right and justice as involved in the struggle which it is sought to terminate. The utmost limit to which critics might fairly go in discussing the Ford mission is in our opinion to describe it as Quixotic, but to be Quixotic one does not have to be ridiculous, and to apply this latter term to the purpose of Ford and his friends, or to their failure is not warranted. The true test of the motives and intentions of the mission is to ask ourselves what we would have said had the mission been crowned with success. In that case is there any doubt that there would not be a newspaper in the world that would not hasten to belaud those responsible for the movement that had brought about harmony and concord? Neither success nor failure can affect a purpose or intention, nor give a different character to motives. If a man proceed upon a laudable mission from good and worthy motives, his mission and his motives remain laudable and good, if he fail or succeed. Therefore we do not think that the intellects of the world will see in Mr. Ford's failure anything upon which to ridicule the man or in his motives anything on which to malign him.

CHRISTMAS OF NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN

SATURDAY, December 25, 1915.

Hallowed custom demands the suitable recognition of the day sacred throughout Christendom as that of the nativity of the founder of the faith to which almost all civilisation proudly claims adherence. On this and the last anniversary of the birth of Christ it has neither been possible nor consistent with the spirit of Christianity to re-echo with sincerity the earliest message which came to the world with the advent of the Man of Sorrows. "Peace on earth; goodwill toward man," sounds like a hollow mockery in these times when the earth is weltering with the blood of men who entertain toward each other as individuals, no ill-will, but who in groups of nationalities, slay and slaughter with the lust of hatred after nearly nineteen centuries of Christian influences upon them. It is a paradox which we may leave to the theologians to explain that such things should be, but we have to face the facts as they are, and recognise that it is impossible as communities and as nations to feel that goodwill which is the guiding principle of the faith we possess.

It is equally insincere for us as communities or nations to wish that conditions were otherwise than what they are, because in those capacities or characters we have convinced ourselves that we are engaged in a just and necessary war against what we believe to be evils menacing not only our sacred rights and liberties, but also the real tenets of our faith. We may in all sincerity wish that the causes leading to the estrangement of one half of Christendom from the other, and the engagement of the two halves in devastating war, might never have existed. To this we may add the devout hope that with the quick passage of time these causes will have been removed, and that once again and for all time there may be peace and concord throughout the world. There is no man in whose breast the kind and generous feelings evoked at Christmastide have ever dwelt who cannot at this moment regret the strange course which events have taken, and who would not, if he could do it honestly and sincerely, take the enemy by the hand and agree to live in obedience to the divine behest.

With conditions as they are; and whether we are right, or whether we are wrong, we find it impossible in our hearts, beating true to our national traditions, truths and aspirations, to entertain toward our foes, while the clash of battle is in our ears, and our fellows are dying at the hands of those foes for a cause which we have made sacred, those tender and gentle thoughts which ordinarily flow from us to all in the season of the Nativity. The utmost that is possible to us is to feel kinder and more tender to ourselves, and to lessen in some degree the bitterness of our thoughts towards our enemies. We shall hear of the peculiar influence of Christmas sentiment upon the very armies engaged face to face on the war-worn fields of Europe, for the humanising effect of the period pervades even the battlefield which up to the moment has known only the "reeking tube and iron shard"; the bitterness of murderous enmity, and the din and tumult of mortal combat. The soldiers in the trenches take pause at Christmas and even toward their foe exhibit the softening influence of the festival commemorated on this day.

Toward ourselves and our kind we feel more strongly drawn on this Christmas than perhaps we have ever been on any other. Common danger and common trouble create a closer bond of fellowship in a nation as in a family, and when over all desire to draw together there rests the influence of Christmastide, softening hearts and sweetening thoughts, the wish to be united is irresistible. It is so with Britons and with all whom they claim in these times as friends. The influence of Christmas is not lost nor is the voice of the Master unheeded, even amid the "horror of war and the battle's confusion." As we have said it will be visible among the armies in the fields. It should be predominant in the lands which still know the blessings of peace, and it should be most visible among those who by common birth and national heritage find themselves drawn together. It is the misfortune of the world at large that it cannot unite on this day to celebrate heartily the great occasion which the day marks, but it is still left to all to hope fervently that before another year shall have passed it shall be possible for all Christendom to echo the message with which the founder of the Christian faith was heralded, "Peace on earth; goodwill toward man."

AN APOLOGY THAT IS AN INDICTMENT

SUNDAY, December 26, 1915.

Lord Robert Cecil's speech in the House of Commons is the most serious indictment that has yet been brought against the British Government, and its gravity is accentuated by the fact that the noble lord is himself a member of the Government. We are aware that the speech in question was intended to be an apology for the Government, and a scathing attack on the Northcliffe press and critics generally, but when we examine it closely we are compelled to regard it in the light of a confirmation of the worst that has ever been said against Mr. Asquith and his colleagues, and a final proof of the unfitness of the Government to hold office.

To start with the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has stated that the Cabinet is not responsible for the situation depicted in sombre colours by certain newspapers. This will be news to the Nation, which has hitherto been under the impression that the Cabinet is entirely responsible for the conduct of the national affairs, and that whether the situation, in so far as the war is concerned, be good, bad or indifferent, the Government must take the credit, or accept the blame. If the Cabinet is not responsible, then who is? Is France, or Russia, or Serbia responsible? Are the people, or the army to accept the responsibility, or is it to be placed on the shoulders of that Germany which is "commercially ruined and defeated"? This is the most extraordinary statement that has yet emanated from a Minister, and a member of a Government that has all along claimed that it is completely in control of the whole situation, and enjoys to an unlimited extent the confidence of the Nation.

Perhaps Lord Robert Cecil intends to convey the impression that the critical press, or perhaps Lord Northcliffe personally, is responsible for the situation. Then who transferred the responsibility to the press or to Lord Northcliffe? If the Government did not do so, then the press and Lord Northcliffe must have assumed it, or usurped it. In that case the Government stands condemned of malfeasance in office and a breach of a constitutional and sacred trust, for it was its duty to retain the responsibility or to resist its usurpation by others. The Minister asserts that Lord Northcliffe is at the head of a conspiracy to overthrow the Government; to bring about conscription, and to betray to the enemy secrets of national importance. Then what is the Government doing in the matter? There are three counts in this indictment made by Lord Robert Cecil, each one tantamount to a charge of high treason. To conspire to overthrow the constitutional government of Britain is treason. To betray information of use to the enemy is punishable with death. Either the Government has evidence on which it bases its charges against Lord Northcliffe, or it has not. If it has, then it is the duty of the Government to place Lord Northcliffe and his co-conspirators in the criminal dock, or stand them before a firing squad in the Tower and put an end to their treachery. If in possession of the evidence to warrant this course the Government does not act, then it is guilty of treason itself. If not in possession of such evidence, then Lord Robert Cecil and other ministers who make such charges, should be requested not to make themselves and their Government ridiculous.

Then Lord Robert Cecil goes on to make the astounding confession that the Government itself has, under pressure from the conspirators, divulged facts not only to the prejudice of the country's interests, but of such a nature that they are capable of being made use of by the enemy. We can only gasp in astonishment at such a confession, but then we have to remember that the same minister who makes it has already disclaimed for the Government the responsibility that should rest upon it. But refusing to admit that the Government can shirk its responsibility, what are we to think of a Cabinet that, under any kind of pressure, and especially that brought by a gang of cowards and traitors, reveals national secrets calculated to assist the enemy?

Who is Northcliffe that he should be able to make the Government false to its trust? The Government has frequently told us he is the "half-penny marshal"; a sensational journalist without any following; a discredited, traitorous, calumniating scoundrel, guilty of offences for which he should, if there be any justice in England, be shot. This characterisation is evidently not quite correct. We would tell the Government that Northcliffe is merely a private individual who owns or controls a number of newspapers, and that he and they are subject to the law of England and the special provisions of the Defence of the Realm Act. If Northcliffe, either as a lord or as a more humble subject of the law, has broken the law, let the Government do its duty and make him suffer its penalties. If his papers have overstepped the bounds of decency or legality, let the Government do its duty, as it should have done long ago, if it understands its duty and is sure of its facts, and suppress them.

For a minister to stand up at this stage of the war, and say that conspiracy is afoot; that treachery and treason prevail; that traitors and scoundrels can force the Government to aid the enemy, and that the malefactors are still at large, is to confess that the Government is quite unfit for its duties and should be relieved of them. Lord Robert Cecil's statement is an insult to intelligence.

LOOKING FOR A LEADER

TUESDAY, December 28, 1915.

When in the last days of July Mr. Josiah Wedgwood, M.P., prayed in the House of Commons for a man who would really lead the great British Nation through the crisis of this war, he found few to say "Amen." To-day conditions are different, and we find a most respectable and hitherto unimpeachable—from a Government point of view—journalist like Mr. J. L. Garvin, asserting that the country is anxiously awaiting the uprising of such a leader. Mr. Garvin goes further and says "Week after week passes; month after month, and every time a difficulty arises, its solution is deferred. The country will stand it no longer." This may be heresy and treachery, but if so it must not be forgotten that Mr. Garvin has only turned heretic and traitor after seventeen months of patience, relieved every now and then, by outbursts of applause for the Government of which he has now turned critic.

Mr. Garvin is the editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette," and of the "Observer," a Sunday paper. Both journals are eminently respectable, and until Mr. Garvin spoke as reported above, they were regarded in Government circles as the shining lights of decent journalism, and Mr. Garvin was held up to public approbation as the one good boy in the class. Prior to the war he was a violent critic of the Liberal Government, particularly on the Irish question. On the outbreak of war Mr. Garvin joined with many other Tory critics in a hatchet burying contest. From the pen which hitherto had emitted gall, there came an effusion of honey. "The Government was quite wrong in peace, but in war it must be right, and so right that everyone must support it." Mr. Garvin did so. He described with eloquence the virtues and capacities of the coalition ministry. We believe he even denounced the critical press. A few weeks ago he was paraded at the National Liberal Club as a paragon of journalistic and political virtue. He was the one man above his old personal political prejudices.

Now Mr. Garvin has "kicked over the traces," and goes so far as to suggest that if the Government does not mend itself, and put Mr. Lloyd George in charge, the country will end the Government. What is the reason for this outburst? The answer we shall most probably hear is that the pernicious Northcliffe has corrupted Garvin. Will we ever hear the real truth about these continual defections from the ranks of the Government servitors and adorers? The real truth is just that which Mr. Garvin has suggested, and he like the country, is tired of the weakness of the Government. It cannot seriously be urged that all these men are traitors and villains. A man like Mr. Garvin does not praise a Cabinet for seventeen months and then suddenly turn and attack it without good reason. He knows as all journalists know that the way of the Government is difficult and hard. He and they understand full well that the war descended upon Britain like a thunderbolt, and that their country would require all the unity of party, purpose and principle to enable it to overcome the great advantage which Germany possessed. He and they knew that the Government must be backed up loyally and solidly, at least until such time as it had, so to speak, pulled the Empire together for the fray, or on the other hand till such time as the Government showed itself incapable of handling the war.

If we admit this very last point, then we have at the one time the end of the obligation of a journalist like Mr. Garvin to support the Government and the reason for his declaring his opposition to it. There can be no other explanation than that which Mr. Garvin does and must give. The Government has evidently in his opinion failed to fulfil the hopes expected of it. What it did, or did not do, in the first six months of the war, probably neither Mr. Garvin nor Lord Northcliffe, nor ourselves have any right to criticise, though we have done so. It is what it is doing, or is not doing to-day that must be discussed, especially when there are no signs that it has yet taken that firm grip of the situation which it should have obtained by now. People more patient than Mr. Garvin may "trust the Government" for another twelve months, but there is clearly a rapidly-growing party in the United Kingdom that has waited long enough, and has given the Government ample time to show itself capable or incapable of handling the war. This party is looking for a leader, and so surely as a party or an occasion requires a leader it will find one.

A NATIONAL POLICY OF ROAD-BUILDING

WEDNESDAY, December 29, 1915.

Turning a moment from consideration of the all-absorbing problem of the war, we may be permitted to discuss a question of considerable local importance, especially to the rural industries of Argentina in which such a large proportion of the British population is vitally interested. This is the proposal to formulate a national policy of road construction. It is an evergreen subject, perennially taken up with enthusiasm and dropped in disgust or allowed to lapse through apathy on the part of the powers that be. Ordinarily the question is widely and vigorously debated only when the rainy season is on, and it will interest those who know the pressing needs of this country for good roads, to learn that some attention is being paid to the matter in the height of summer, and that a paper like "La Nacion" is counselling the Government to attack the problem in earnest. Anything in the way of a defined policy is desirable, even though there be little or no chance of its being put into effect for some time to come.

The road problem in Argentina is a serious one, and it is also of great magnitude. It is recognised by "La Nacion" and all sound students of a country's internal economy, that roads are just as essential to the development of Argentina as are the railways, and port works. In point of time and importance good roads take priority over railways. One should be there before the other, and while a country may manage to struggle along without railways, it certainly cannot make any progress without roads. The very interests of the railways and their owners are dependent upon what we now classify as the subsidiary channels of communication. A railway through the heart of a fertile belt of country which has no roads worthy the name, is useless both to its owners and to those who should be served by it. In one or two rainy seasons we have witnessed the spectacle of a railway having little or no freight either to or from the city, simply because the supposed roads along which goods had subsequently to be hauled were impassable bogs. The railway might not have existed for all the good it was to the agriculturists or the business houses of the city.

In the past the problem has not been resolutely grappled with, because from the fountain-head of all public movements there has emanated no definite lead. Purely local bodies have spasmodically approached the subject and have dropped it as soon as they have seen what its ramifications are. Like most other big projects that of providing the country with main roads, and subsequently with the necessary "feeders," must be taken in hand by the National Government, or at least by the provincial governments brought into agreement under the aegis of the National Government as to the programme to be followed. In the United States and in Australia the construction of main roads is generally carried out by the states, and the branch roads are built either by district councils or road boards, or bodies similar in character, whose locally raised funds are augmented by government grants in aid.

To provide even the most thickly populated districts of rural Argentina with a sufficiency of good roads involves the expenditure of a vast sum of money, and the passage of many years. Obviously the time is not propitious for financing such an undertaking, but that is no reason why a policy should not be evolved now and plans prepared for carrying it into effect when the opportune moment arrives. We know how long it takes for the wheels of government to be set in motion. The present is the right time in which to assail the problem. The financial position of the country is not good, and any plans prepared for the carrying out of public works are most likely to be well prepared and with a keen eye to economy in their execution. If we wait till a "boom" sets in, it is more than likely that the road problem will be taken in hand hurriedly, and money will be flung about reckless of consequences. That sort of public works policy nobody wants. Everyone has seen enough of it, and if applied to the roads problem it will mean only keen disappointment and wilful waste.

THE CASE OF THE PRESIDENTE MITRE

THURSDAY, December 30, 1915.

The news that the British Government has decided to release the steamer Presidente Mitre will be received with mixed feelings by the local British community, and it is as well that the same good sense and calmness which we urged should prevail on the occasion of the seizure, should prevail now. It is to be presumed that the seizure of the vessel was not merely a wild escapade on the part of an over-zealous British officer, but that it was a deliberate act performed in conformance with definite and clear instructions from the Admiralty, which in turn takes its orders from the Government, whose orders are issued in compliance with a fixed policy, or on substantial representation that action is called for. As to the policy, we have the pronouncement of the Government, conveyed to the world by medium of a special Order in Council, that Britain intended to seize all vessels which were in fact German property. As to special causes we have only rumours that the Presidente Mitre was engaged in a contraband traffic.

Whatever may have been the causes responsible for the seizure of the ship, whether they arose from policy, or from special circumstances, it was clear from the outset that the action of the naval authorities was still open to review by the proper diplomatic authorities of both the British and Argentine nations. It was incorrect then, as it is now, to assume that the seizure of the vessel was not open to review, or that Britain had committed herself to an action, or an attitude from which she could not recede with perfect justice to Argentina and with her own dignity fully preserved. Reasonable people recognised that there was much more at stake than the mere value of the ship, or the necessity for convincing the enemy that he could not take shelter under a neutral flag. Predominating everything was the maintenance of the most friendly and frank relations between Britain and Argentina, but qualifying even this desideratum, were Britain's moral and legal rights, and her own dignity.

Our own views, which we would not express at the time because we desired to observe our own advice that the least said is soonest mended, in the absence of definite information the better, were that while the seizure of the Presidente Mitre might have been perfectly justified in virtue of the Order in Council of October last, the seizure, unless there was ample evidence that the ship was assisting the enemy, had no military value. Further our view was and is that were the seizure made in the absence of specific cause, such as that which was rumoured as being existent, it was a mistake, because it tended to jeopardise the good relations which have all along existed between Britain and this Republic. These opinions were based on the point of view that if the seizure of the Presidente Mitre were justified to-day in the absence of specific cause, such as her traffic in contraband, then her seizure twelve months ago was ten times more justified, and it should have been made then. Then there was presentable the strong presumptive case, in justification, that she was liable to assist actively the enemies of Britain. When she was seized—unless as we have said the Admiralty has definite information to the contrary—it could not be represented that she was capable of actively assisting the enemy.

We are very glad to know that the matter has been amicably adjusted. Britain has not released the vessel unconditionally, nor has she done so in the face of compulsion. She has apparently done what is perfectly consistent with her reputation for straight, frank, and honourable dealing. On representations made through proper quarters, and in a perfectly friendly spirit by Argentina, Britain has investigated the case. The proper assurances have been given her that the vessel will be effectively registered and controlled as a vessel of a neutral and friendly nation; evidence has apparently been produced that the Presidente Mitre cannot in any circumstances be used to the prejudice of Britain's interests, and that she shall secure and preserve the character of a neutral vessel. While technically Britain might have retained the ship, and in so doing have stood upon perfectly legal rights, she has undoubtedly yielded whatever rights she had, not alone because insistence on those rights meant little or nothing to her from a military point of view, but because her friendship for Argentina dictated a desire to yield any point, not involving her own honour, dignity and self-defence.

Public Opinion as expressed in the Argentine Press.

TORPEDO PRACTICE IN THE RIVER PLATE UTILIZING THE CUSTOMS STORESHEDS

(La Prensa.—December 23).

In order to carry out a series of experiments the Ministry of Marine has ordered the preparation of six torpedos of the 1890 type, the intention being to afford the navy an opportunity of practicing with this instrument of modern warfare. The torpedos will be discharged at an old hulk formerly known as the corvette La Argentina. The idea says La Prensa is commendable it being undoubtedly necessary to familiarise the navy with the use of this arm under conditions similar to those of actual warfare. Nevertheless some of the details of the scheme of practice are not above criticism. It is well known that the manipulation and launching of live torpedos is a very delicate operation, and the danger to navigation in the River Plate should any of those launched fail to find the target is considerable. The Whitehead torpedo used by the Argentine navy explodes on contact with the object aimed at. There are many causes however which might combine to avert this contact and if through a defect of the mechanism, or imperfect aim, the torpedo sank without exploding a powerful menace to shipping would thus be created. Washed about by the currents the torpedo would in all probability drift aimlessly and the possibility of its eventually reaching the track of shipping is too great not to give cause for serious consideration. Very minute and well thought out instructions will require to be given to avoid the possibility of such consequences. The torpedos selected for this practice are to be those "most deteriorated by use," and in the opinion of La Prensa this is a distinct error of judgment. If the deterioration refers to the air chamber it follows that the torpedo will not travel the distance necessary to give a fair test under real conditions. If on the other hand the deterioration be in the mechanism the results as regards aim will be erroneous, and the tests from a practical point of view will be futile. For the experiments to have any value the torpedos selected should be thoroughly overhauled and put into perfect working order. As to the site of the experiments La Prensa opines that for the reasons stated these should be conducted away from the Plate, and suggests a zone anywhere between Cape San Antonio and Cape Corrientes.

SOUND FINANCE

(La Prensa.—December 24).

The extensive and diffuse preliminary discussions as to the budget, says La Prensa invariably leave as a result nothing but the mass of figures by which it is proposed to maintain the balance between the yearly expenditure and the income—everything else being subordinate. As has been proved time and again the last days of the year are inadequate for a thorough and exhaustive study of the reforms and economies necessary in the present state of the country's finances, and the inevitable result will be that the budget as drawn up will become law. Ever since the beginning of the present crisis a policy of restriction and of economy has been necessary. In the pruning process at last about to be adopted the reduction by about one half or one third in the number of Government employees is an expedient which will have its immediate economical effect, but it is an expedient which La Prensa deprecates as inhumane, and also unnecessary. In a moment of supreme

(La Prensa.—Dec. 25.)

There is nothing that leads one to hope for an early modification of the existing position as regards freights and cargo space, remarks La Prensa, and the difficulty is likely to weigh heavily on the crop, creating a serious economic problem for this country. With limited tonnage, cereals are bound to be held up in the railway stations and on the chacras, since facile transport to the loading depot is not readily determined, and this brings in its train difficulties with regard to selling of the grain by the farmer, who nevertheless counts on thus liquidating the indebtedness of the year. Agrarian pledges, and the warrant are, as La Prensa remarks, the two instruments of credit that might be utilised under these circumstances; the former by the grower, and the latter by the cereal dealer in such cases as may arise wherein the grower does not dispose of his grain direct.

The pledge has, however, its drawbacks: one cannot let the produce lie indefinitely at the chacra, exposed to the risk of the weather. It must be sold if heavy loss, due to various reasons, is not to be incurred. Here the pledge is supplemented by the "warrant," but that implies the authorisation of suitable storage depots where grain might lie until its shipment. If such authorisation were granted, La Prensa is of opinion that the agriculturalist would, by reason of the warrant, be able to stand on an independent footing in so far as the actual commercial organisation of the trade is concerned, no longer being compelled to resort to precarious sales to meet his immediate needs. Given the fact that many of the customs stores, in the riverine provinces are empty, and like to be so for a considerable time through the very same reasons that are causing shipping difficulties to the harvest, the situation might easily be remedied by habilitating these deposits as grain depots, thereby solving the credit problem by making it a simple matter to emit warrants. Banking aid will be of little use to the farmer if in a short space of time he has to sell his crop at bargain prices to pay for his loan. In short, concludes La Prensa, choosing between a short-date loan and a loan on warrant, the latter has the preference as being eminently more practical.

necessity such rigorous methods might be excusable even desirable, but that moment has not yet arrived. The Argentine Republic like most other countries at the present moment is passing through a violent storm, but luckily, through exceptional circumstances, the ship of state is well ballasted, and there is every assurance that she will reach port safe and sound. Future prospects are exceptionally bright, and the finish of the war and of the crisis will mark a new era for the Republic. The influx of European capital, attracted by the natural riches of the country can be hopefully expected. Once the war is finished few countries will be in such an advantageous position as Argentina, certainly none will have brighter prospects for a glorious future. In the forthcoming year says La Prensa the Government will have the opportunity of discussing problems of economical reform and it will then be faced with the duty of presenting a sound and sober budget which will guarantee the solvency of the Nation's finances, and will recompense for the privations due to the present one.

THE INUNDATION AT ANDALGALA

(La Nación.—December 24).

The Ministry of Public Works, says La Nación, received yesterday detailed information regarding the inundations at Andalgalá, and the destruction caused by the great avalanche of water. Never in the existence of the town has there been experienced such enormous floods. The water in the river increased 2,000 times its normal volume, and the Andalgalá became converted into a veritable torrent carrying everything before it. The flood was unexpected and surprised the population at night, destroying part of the town and the irrigation works camp, many of the workmen having lost their lives. The damage caused to the irrigation works, on which some $400,000 has already been expended is calculated at $100,000. For the moment some provisional work at the canals has been ordered to avoid the possibility of the cultivated crops in the district suffering through subsequent scarcity of water. This will entail an immediate outlay of $10,000. There remains the urgent necessity of a minute inspection and the adoption of a plan of defence against the recurrence of such a catastrophe, though as La Nación points out, the calculations need not necessarily be based on the recent inundation which has been altogether unprecedented. Nevertheless the direction of the irrigation works consider that it will be desirable to ask the Ministry of Public Works to include in the budget for the forthcoming year a sum of $100,000 destined to repair the damage done to the existing works.

SOUTH COAST COMMUNICATIONS HINDERED

(La Prensa.—December 27).

Once more complaints are being made, says La Prensa, concerning the difficulties put in the way of the shipping companies working the South Atlantic coast by the Port Prefecture owing to the veto on Sunday and feast day labour imposed by an ordinance promulgated in 1907. It is even said that this ordinance has been merely revived in order to spite the ship-owners, who refused to accept the intervention of the Minister of Marine in the matter of their tariffs, whilst it is also maintained that although the question of postal privileges is still awaiting government decision, the Minister of Marine has taken the decision for granted, prohibiting the ships from working save in ordinary working hours.

Whatever may be the reason that dictates this attitude of the Minister of Marine, there is no getting away, as La Prensa justly observes, from the fact that it is prejudicial alike to the shipping companies and to the many interests bound up in intercommunication with the South. Ships arriving at a port with goods and passengers on a Sunday, must perforce lose a day, besides throwing out the whole itinerary of the voyage. Yet the great aim in maritime transport is to cut down port delays, and this, says La Prensa, is particularly necessary in the case of the ports on the South Atlantic coast, which, to all intents and purposes are the only means of communication for the vast extension of the interior, whence all roads lead to the sea. The mere mention of the matter is sufficient to indicate its importance, concludes La Prensa, and to demonstrate the need for calm consideration of all the circumstances involved. Far from putting obstacles in the way of navigation, the government ought to do all that lies in its power to facilitate the trade, and hitherto that has always been the guiding principle of the state. It is to be hoped that the whole matter will be considered in this light and a resolution reached without further delay.

BOLSA PRICES

(La Nación.—Dec. 25.)

Some days ago, remarks La Nación, it drew attention to the brusque movement in the prices of certain stocks quoted on the Bolsa, attributing said fluctuations to the announcement of an early auction which was to be held in order to fix an official price for redeeming the said values. When the tenders were opened in the Public Credit Office of the province concerned, the prices offered were found to vary between $94.25 and $99.87 per cent, thus being in a certain measure in relation with the price of $99.50 registered on the Bolsa as the official price. La Nación, without discussing the legality of such an operation, says that it ought to be pointed out that yesterday the same stock marked a drop of eight and a half points, without any apparent justification, since both before and at the time of the public auction the official price was maintained.

As may be seen, these are anomalies that are somewhat frequent, and the Bolsa gives a quotation that actually corresponds only to special circumstances, when the actual current, either in pro or in contra, may be quite otherwise. If the authorities of the Bolsa think that no measure ought to be taken, then La Nación declares that they can only adopt one attitude, namely, refuse to consider the prices thus obtained as official, as was recently done in connection with the auction of a certain lot of shares.

THE BANKING POSITION

(La Nación.—December 27).

A recent report of the Minister of Finance dealing with the banking position and the general state of the circulating medium led to the conclusion that it was advisable to create national stocks duly guaranteed as a means of making use of the surplus funds, either through loans taken directly from the banks, or in the form of public investments. If, remarks La Nación, the general public were only accustomed to this class of investment, with its multiple advantages, an internal loan would be an excellent arrangement both for the Government and for the people, but unfortunately the general ignorance, coupled with the extensive propaganda made by the banks on behalf of the safety and advisability of their deposits, makes any such plan more than doubtful.

Nevertheless La Nación thinks that if it was carefully proved to the people that a national bond, enjoying 5 per cent interest and free from all danger of fluctuation, would prove a more profitable form of investment than depositing money in establishments paying a lesser rate and making huge profits by investing on their own account in Government paper, then the small investor and depositor would take confidence. Naturally the wealthy capitalist would not be interested, because, so says La Nación a country in the full tide of development calls for money always at call; and public bonds are not always realisable at will. But there are large sums made up of small deposits, sums that might be of mutual benefit to the treasury and to the individual, if they were only invested in national securities. Dealing with the figures embodied in the report, La Nación points out that whilst deposits increased by $27,774,933 from October to November, discounts only increased by $22,135,938. Nor has this difference gone to increase the cash in hand, whence La Nación opines that it is due to a transfer of accounts from discount to the section Old Debts. In short, the figures of the last report show yet again the increase in funds that was to be expected from the sale of the national products, and also prove that the market is inactive owing to the lack of suitable fields for investment.

CONSCRIPTS AND THE HARVEST

(La Prensa.—December 28).

On October 15 some 50 per cent of the 1894 class of conscripts were released from further service owing to motives of economy. Now, according to La Prensa a further 30 per cent are to be released a month earlier than was originally fixed, preference being given to rural workers in order that they may help with the harvest. The idea is good, La Prensa continues, but it does not go far enough, since if the 30 per cent to be released on December 31 only refers to the total of the class it will not include more than 3000 conscripts, since the total of the 1894 class on October 15 was under 10,000. If it refers to those actually serving with the colours the proportion is even smaller, being under 1500. Hence La Prensa maintains that its previous arguments in favour of a total release still hold good.

The calling up of the 1895 class is in its opinion a mistake. It takes men away from the harvest field and submits them to military exercises in the heat of the summer, whilst it is not absolutely proved that under existing circumstances a full year's service is necessary. Moreover from motives of economy the Government would do well to reduce the time of training to that which is strictly necessary, taking into account the fact that the period of training coincides with the busiest time in the camp. The 1895 class might therefore be called up, classified, and at once released until such time as the harvest has been carried. Admittedly this plan carries with it the drawback of having to count on the retention of skeleton units, but at the same time this is compensated by the economic advantage obtained by the nation as a whole. Moreover even this difficulty is easily remedied by classifying the conscripts according to their trades or professions. Thus the conscripts who are not agriculturalists, such as the students, might very well be called up during the vacations in order that they may receive the three months preparatory training. This only implies more work for the instructors, but even that can be met by establishing turns with the help of the reserve officers who as La Prensa concludes, can very well do with more practice in command.

NATIONAL ROADS

(La Nación.—December 28).

The proposal to endow the country with good roads is the most important matter that has been before the Government, remarks La Nación, and justifies every effort that may be made in its favour. First came the Railway Law, designed to connect up the local roads with the great arteries of traffic by calling upon the companies to contribute to their upkeep, the idea being that the local roads, the national roads, and the rail, should form one continuous system, since however costly might be the task of construction, the net results would mean cheaper carriage, since at the present time it is not unusual for local freight charges to be so high as to make various local products dearer than they would be if sold in a European market.

Until these deficiencies stand uncorrected by a co-ordinate plan, there is bound to be a hiatus between the functions of carriage by rail and road. The railways cannot go outside their accustomed route in a country which is sparsely populated, since any such extension would perforce weigh heavily on the charges of freight as a whole. Hence it follows, as La Nación justly remarks, that the railways are actually sufferers through the lack of good roads. Indeed railway policy may be said to be dependent on the extension and maintenance of the roads, but to improve the roads funds are needed, hence the need for seeking resources for a work that, though carried out gradually, must embrace the widest extension possible in the shortest possible time if every point of production and traffic is to benefit thereby. The magnitude of the work is beyond dispute, as are the advantages arising therefrom, and its solution cannot be reached by taking short views. It is rather, concludes La Nación, a vast and vital project that ought to be the theme of an all-embracing technical study by the Minister of Public Works, revised subsequently by the Minister of Finance, whose functions in this case are of almost equal importance, seeing that to him must fall the task of pronouncing as to the possibility of obtaining the necessary capital as well as of providing for the taxation necessary to meet its service.

PETROLEUM BONDS

(La Prensa.—December 29).

From the very outset, La Prensa has consistently urged upon the country the need for giving preferential attention to the question of making the most of the Comodoro Rivadavia oil deposits, and but a few months back ventured to draw the attention of Congress to the advisability of exploiting the fields in a businesslike manner. Now that increased duties on naphtha spell increased prices, the need for taking the matter up seriously is if anything increased. At the present time there are actually eighteen perforating machines at work, thirty-two wells have been sunk, and twenty-two are in exploitation. In the coming year fifty wells will be working and the year after, a hundred. The average daily output per well is 16 tons, from which may be deducted, for various reasons, at least 15 per cent.

Three months ago La Prensa stated that the Minister of Agriculture had contracted for a tanker with the Fore River Company, with a capacity of 4,500 tons, and the actual Minister of Agriculture, Dr. Calderon, has obtained a sum of 390,000 dollars wherewith to order another vessel from the Great Lakes Company capacity 3,200 tons. This self-same gentleman has, says La Prensa, held several conferences with the President relative to the exploitation of Rivadavia oil, and the conclusion has been reached that it is absolutely necessary to provide funds wherewith to carry on the work. To finance the idea an issue of Petroleum Bonds is projected, for a sum varying between sixteen and $20,000,000; an Internal Loan carrying good interest and at the same time giving the holders preferential rights to receive Rivadavia oil. The money thus obtained is to be used for the purchase of machinery and for the general exploitation of the field. At present the production reaches an average of 8,500 tons per month, which will be largely and continuously increased by the new perforations.

MARKET PRICES OF FOOD

(La Nación.—December 29).

The dearness of foodstuffs arising out of increased land values was says La Nación, a phenomena that might have been expected, but at the present time, given the paralysation in land transactions and the general decrease in values, another cause must be sought. This the Buenos Aires Municipal authorities are endeavouring to do, and as far as can be seen much of the dearness is directly attributable to the inefficiency of the existing sales organisations. The producer sells to a middleman, who in his turn supplies the large stallholders in the markets, they then passing on the fruit, greenstuffs, fowls, or whatever the produce may be, to smaller dealers or itinerant vendors, a lengthy chain of transactions that ends in the consumer being burdened with half a dozen different profits that ought not to be necessary.

Sr. Anchorena's idea of free markets was decidedly plausible; it meant the suppression of various intermediaries, the reduction of dues, and other savings. Unfortunately the original idea has been lost, and the actual producer no longer attends the fairs, leaving that to buyers who go round the farms and buy the produce on the spot. These latter also do their best to keep prices more or less on a level with those ruling in the regular markets. Hence, sums up La Nación, the free markets are not giving the results that were originally expected, since the direct advantage of dealing between producer and consumer has been lost. This error is now to be remedied by the formation of an association styled the National Association of Producers, and the Minister of Agriculture is giving the concern special facilities which should enable it to cheapen the cost of the goods supplied and at the same time improve their quality. Markets at the railway termini are projected, and other advantages, but, says La Nación the most important feature is the granting of credits to the associated producers in proportion to the amount of shares they subscribe, or, as an alternative, the amount of goods they send to market. This scheme is tantamount to giving a discount on the strength of the goods, and it needs no argument to show how effective it will be towards cheapening the cost of merchandise to the consumer.

OBITUARY

MR. EDWARD BENNETT LUMB.

News has been received of the death in London of Mr. Edward Bennett Lumb, formerly very well known in business circles in Buenos Aires.

The late Mr. Lumb, who was 54 years of age, was born in Montevideo, but lived in this country till about five years ago when he retired from business and took up his residence in London.

The late Mr. Lumb was a brother of Mr. Charles Lumb, one of the oldest members of the Bolsa, and with him conducted the brokerage business of C. P. Lomb Hijos for a period of over 20 years. His retirement was due to gradually failing health. He revisited the Argentine some little time ago, but returned to England in May last year.

The late Mr. Lumb's large number of friends in the Republic will deplore his loss.

SEÑOR MARIANO REYNA.

The death has occurred at an early age of Señor Mariano Reyna, who for many years has been the leading football legislator in this country. At one time he was a member of the famous Alumni team.

He had been ill, on and off, during most of the winter and in October, when accompanying a football team down to Montevideo, contracted a chill, the occasion being a very wet day. He leaves a young wife and daughter to mourn his loss. The funeral leaves Calle Montevideo 1560, this morning at 10 o'clock.

On hearing the sad news, the Superior Council of the Argentine Football Association held an Extraordinary meeting and adopted the following resolutions, after all present had stood in silent respect:

1st: Place a bronze plaque on his grave.

2nd: Send a note of sympathy to the family of deceased:

3rd: Appoint the President to speak at the graveside in name of the Association;

4th: Invite all the affiliated clubs to assist at the funeral;

5th: Communicate his death to the Uruguayan Association and affiliated Leagues;

6th: Suspend all matches down for the 25th December.

7th: Appoint Doctors Cullen, Mignaburu and Messrs. Carbone, Negri and Susini to watch the body.

Bs. Aires, Dec. 24, 1915.

DR. BRUM'S DIVORCE

CONSISTENCY OF SIX-DAY WEEK ADVOCATE.

The Uruguayan Minister of Interior, Dr. Baltasar Brum, the great exponent and supporter of the six-day week idea in Montevideo, is taking advantage of the recently promulgated Divorce Law of Uruguay, and has solicited from the Courts a divorce from his wife, Doña Sara Narbondo Brum, on the grounds of incompatibility of temper. The plea seems probable; moreover to keep abreast of ideas so rapid and so advanced as are Dr. Brum's opinions, must be rather fatiguing and liable to induce mental shortness of breath.

MUNICIPALITIES AND J. P.'S

The Governor of Misiones has decided after consulting the Minister of Interior, to make changes in the method of appointing Jueces de Paz in his territory. There has recently been a lively conflict between the Juez de Paz and the Municipal Council of Concepcion de la Siena, and the Council threw out the J.P.

The National Procurator General has stated that the Council were quite within their rights, and in fact a decree has been issued by his National Executive informing the Territories that the Powers of suspending or ejecting Jueces de Paz are vested in the Municipalities of their respective districts.

ALLIES' DAY OF PRAYER

AT ST. JOHN'S PRO-CATHEDRAL.

At the request of H.M. the King, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York have ordered Sunday, January 2, to be observed in the Church of England as a Day of Prayer to Almighty God for the British nation and its Allies. Other religious bodies are following the same course. In St. John's Anglican Pro-Cathedral in this city the Morning Service at 10.15 will therefore be of a special character, including hymns and intercessions bearing on the war.

BRITISH TRADE FAIR

Mr. H. G. Mackie, H.M. Consul-General, announces that a British trade fair will be held in the Victoria and Albert Museum in London on the lines adopted at the last fair.

Samples of British manufactures will be exhibited by the manufacturers with a view to placing contracts. These will be limited to toys, fancy goods, China, earthenware goods, glassware, printing and stationery. The fair will be opened on February 21, and remain open for 12 days. Likely buyers should communicate with the Board of Trade (British Industries Fair, 32, Cheapside, E.C.) on arrival in England.

K. OF K. UNSTARRED

RECEIVES LORD DERBY'S NOTE ASKING FOR ENLISTMENT.

An extraordinary recruiting blunder was described at a meeting of the Newcastle Chamber of Commerce by the secretary, Mr. Shaw, who stated that he had attended a meeting of gentlemen, all or most of whom were over the recruiting age, addressed by the Earl of Derby.

Lord Derby informed them that they must not be surprised if any of them received a copy of his invitation now being circulated throughout the country to join the Army, because by some chance Earl Kitchener himself had that morning been the recipient of such a document.

There has been little demand for wool during the past week, says the "Times of Argentina," shippers operating sparsely owing to the difficulty of securing space on the liners. WAR TIME MEAT PRICES

RESULTS OF BLOCKADE RESTRICTIONS.

A Montevideo report mentions that according to statements current four hindquarters of choice Uruguayan beef sold in London last week went at 40 cents gold wholesale. In Copenhagen the same day, prices equal to $1.13 (Argentine) were paid in the public markets, thus showing the effect of the restriction imposed by Britain in the exportation of beef.

In October superior Uruguayan beef sold at from $1.07 to $1.32 (paper), ordinary at 84 centavos to 1 peso, and inferior at from 73 centavos to 87, per kilo.

RUMoured SALE OF STEAMERS

ARGENTINE LIGHT VESSELS FOR BRITISH WAR PURPOSES.

Recently rumours have been afloat on more than one occasion to the effect that large drafts by purchase were about to be made in the Argentine fleet of fishing trawlers, tugs and coasting craft, and visions of Darsenas bare of tugs have been presented to the shuddering mind. "La Razon" raises a kind of Coronach over the bier of the Argentine merchant marine which it considers dead and killed entirely, as unfortunately people cannot be prevented from taking good prices for their boats if offered. "Woe, Woe! Woe!" says the Jeremiah of the Avenida, "beloved what we prophesied has come to pass." Those British have taken six more ships (by the purchase method this time), which will shortly leave (or rather return to) for England, and will there change their flags, and be armed for submarine scoutings or mine sweeping, etc. While it may be said that the lamentations are a little premature, there is no doubt that a general departure of tugs, launches, steam lighters, trawlers, and light steamers, would be very inconvenient, but if as this contemporary says, their owners are so anxious to sell the moment they hear of a chance, it must be because they expect to do better than they do now, arguing that the vessels are unprofitable servants. It is certain that they would be at present expensive and difficult to replace. "La Razon" does not name either the proprietors or the names of the vessels sold, but confines itself to a general statement that the sale has taken place.

HIGH FREIGHTS

COAL.

Owing to the scarcity of tonnage, freights for coal from the United States were quoted yesterday at 90 shillings per ton for sailing vessels.

From Cardiff for B. Aires steam freights fluctuate around 50 shillings, with a tendency to rise.

To this has to be added the price of coal, bringing it up to a total of about double the cost of pre-war days (32 shillings placed in Buenos Aires, i.e. $8.07 gold per ton). To-day the same costs 72s. 6d., or $18.15 gold per ton.

OILS.

Machine oil before the war paid 0.12 cents gold per cubic foot freight from U.S. ports. It has risen steadily to 32 cents gold, this being a recent quotation. A new surcharge has been fixed recently on cotton seed oil of 25 per cent., bringing the total freightage up to 48 cents gold per cubic foot, or $19.20 gold per ton, in place of $4.80 which was the former cost.

SHIPMENT OF HORSES FOR FRANCE

After loading a cargo of cereals the s.s. Globe yesterday morning took on board a large consignment of 540 horses for the French army.

The Globe which has loaded in Dock 1 will proceed immediately to La Pallice, where the horses will be landed. The vessel will then continue her voyage to England with her cereal cargo.

CHRISTMAS TREE

AT ST. SAVIOUR'S, BELGRANO.

Wednesday.

It may seem strange, at a first thought, to hear of some hundred and fifty to two hundred little children enjoying a Christmas fete, with a Christmas tree, a Santa Claus, and all the good things of the season, and yet for there not to be a single present hanging from the branches of the tree, not a single toy, or the like, loading up the bag that Santa Claus carried over his shoulder, and yet these things happened at St. Saviour's Church Hall, Belgrano, last evening, and the explanation is both creditable and simple.

All the children of the Sunday School which comprises the branches of San Isidro, Villa Urquiza and Belgrano, had voluntarily decided to give up their Christmas gifts and the money that would have been expended for this purpose was voted to the Belgium Fund. Could anything have been more seemly? And not the least pleasure was lost through this generous action.

The hall was nicely and prettily decorated, and the paper festoons, arranged by a number of lady helpers, made the room all the more attractive.

The Christmas tree standing in the centre of the room was daintily lit with coloured candles and hung with decorations.

Proceedings opened with a hymn and a prayer, and then the Vicar told the story of the meaning of Christmas and the Christmas trees.

The fun commenced with the distribution of crackers, and suddenly the hall went dark all but the Christmas tree and its twinkling lights. Presently Santa Claus made his appearance in all the gorgeousness of his red coat and from his bag he produced crackers and sweets and the fun proceeded apace.

Then came refreshments, and all and every kind of children's games. The motor-car, musical chairs and the like. These were divided into two sections, the senior and the junior divisions, and nothing more enjoyable could have been imagined.

At 9 p.m. the Vicar called for cheers for the lady helpers, and for all who had done so much to make the evening a bright and happy one. Cheers for the Allies followed the singing of the National Anthem, and after "Tipperary" more refreshments were taken.

The little ones then went home, and their more elderly sisters and brothers enjoyed an impromptu dance, with Mrs. Brown untiringly accompanying them at the piano.

AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

PROVINCIAL BANK ACTION.

In pursuance of the plan formulated by the Banco de la Nacion for assisting Agricultural credit, the Banco de la Provincia will also probably make similar arrangements on special conditions and is at present considering how best to give effect to these proposals. Instructions will be issued to the Branch establishments regarding amounts and terms to be given to merchants or cereal growers on a basis of 90 days, current discount.

MUNICIPAL BUDGET

Under the Presidency of Sr. Mauri the Municipal Budget Committee met again yesterday.

The salaries of the Administrator and Accountant of the Clearing Dept. have been raised by $1100 total increase.

The subsidy to the Naval School is raised to $400.

For the Municipal Orchestra, which is certainly worth its upkeep, the sum of $170,000 annually was asked to be assigned, although Señor Quintana, who would appear to have no music in his soul, said he voted for its total suppression.

CONTRABAND OF WAR

A CARGO OF SALTPETRE IN DANGER.

The steamer Samainda, which sailed from Montevideo on Thursday afternoon for Rotterdam, has a cargo of 10,000 tons of saltpetre shipped at Corobel.

In shipping circles there is a strong opinion that she runs risk of capture by British cruisers, which will assuredly consider her lading as contraband of war destined for Germany.

The Mihanovich Year

POSITION SATISFACTORY; PROSPECTS FAVOURABLE

London, Dec. 24.

The annual report and balance sheet for the past financial year of the Argentine Navigation Company (Nicholas Mihanovich) shows that the gross profits were £189,671 as against £246,748 the previous year.

The Board proposes after meeting debenture interest and expenses to pass £50,925 to reserve, distribute £41,208, credit £16,645 to insurance and reserve the balance for reducing the debit of the company.

The report says that at present the company is in a fairly satisfactory position, considering the very poor revenue, and if trade revives the next six months should make a more favourable showing.

Shipping Notes.

S.S. AVELLANEDA.

Messrs. Mihanovich received a cable message yesterday from their s.s. Avellaneda, stating that she arrived at Puerto Deseado on December 25, and that the Port authorities refused to allow her to discharge either on that day or on December 26. Discharging commenced on December 27, and she left on the following day. The passengers protested against the unjustifiable delay, and signed a declaration to that effect.

SCHOONER'S ADVENTUROUS VOYAGE.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT].

Bahia Blanca, Dec. 26.

The American schooner Edith S. Cummins arrived here on Friday week after a prolonged trip of 135 days, from Pensacola, Florida. She was becalmed several times on the voyage, and in the Gulf of Mexico got into the outer edge of a hurricane in which it was reported two steamers and two sailing vessels were lost. The master (Capt. Hooper) had a lookout kept after the storm had passed, and, after coming across considerable wreckage floating about, the lookout man reported something to windward of the ship, but could not make out what. It transpired to be wreckage to which four men were clinging. As they saw the ship tacking away from them, they thought that, like several steamers they had seen in the distance, she had not seen them, and were greatly relieved when the captain ran up a flag to signify that they were to be picked up. About two hours afterwards the vessel found two other men on more of the wreckage. These men were part of the crew of nine who were on the schooner "Lydia M. Deering," of Bath, Maine. Some of them were in a very bad condition, having been knocked about considerably and repeatedly washed off the "house" to which they had clung. The mate had had his finger broken, as well as several other cuts and bruises. The shipwrecked men had been three nights and three and a half days floating about without food or water. The captain of the vessel (Capt. Murphy) was hit on the head with a piece of floating timber and drowned before the others could get to him. The other two members of the crew were also drowned when the ship foundered. The second lot of these men were picked up at 10 a.m., and two hours later the Edith S. Cummins sighted the s.s. Comus, bound for New Orleans from New York, and she stopped and took off the wrecked men with her.

THE only people who really believe that the imitations give as much satisfaction as genuine LEA & PERRINS' are those who do not know what a true sauce should be.

A true sauce is not merely an added flavour. It must bring out hidden flavours that are in the food itself—flavours which otherwise you would never taste.

Every person of refined tastes knows this.

That is what makes the difference between all the imitations and the genuine Lea & Perrins.
